Before dismissing this lesson, we should perhaps say that God made known his will in Abraham's day that the Canaanites should be dispossessed eventually as the most wicked of the nations, holding by their swords this most beautiful land (Gen. 15:16). It may not be by the same methods but it is quite as true that any nation, Turk, Mexican or Apache, that habitually lives by violence will, in the providence of God, be driven from its strongholds and destroyed.

"Justice, though moving with tardy pace, has seldom failed to overtake the wicked in their flight." "Nor is there any law more just, than that he who has plotted death shall perish by his own plot."

DEVOTIONAL SERVICE

BY EDWARD ARTHUR WICHER

Week Beginning October 12, 1913

Topic—The piece of money. Luke 15:8-10.

The likeness of this parable to that of the lost sheep is inescapable; so much so that some writers have treated them together, as if they taught but the one lesson. The likeness consists in this—that something has been lost, that after a diligent search it has been found again, that its recovery has been the cause of great joy not only to the owner but also to the friends of the owner, who join in the celebration over the finding.

But no two of Jesus' parables mean quite the same thing. There are differences here also. It was a man who was the owner of the sheep, and a woman who was the owner of the coin. The sheep was one of a herd of one hundred, while the coin was one piece out of ten. In the case of the lost sheep it was the quality of compassion in the heart of the shepherd that sent him forth into the storm and desolation of the wilderness to find the missing one; but in the case of the lost coin it was the preciousness of the coin itself that became the motive of the search. The two parables supplement and fulfill one another. In their totality they point to the reasons of the divine search for lost souls. These reasons lie in the infinite compassion of the heart of God, on the one hand, and on the other, in the exceeding great worth of the human soul.

The Palestinian story vividly reproduces the life of the common people. The woman has ten coins, which doubtless constitute her modest dowry and are worn as a headdress. One of these comes loose and is lost, leaving the other nine incomplete.

This oriental house is dark inside. It probably derives all its light from the doorway. Even in the daytime, if search is to be made a candle must be lighted. And the house is so full of rubbish that the coin has been lost in it. A great deal of dust must be turned over before the precious drachma can be regained. The story might as well be spoken today in any village of the Holy Land.

Whom does this woman represent? The answer doubtless is, the church. The church, as the company of believers, is here the seeker after the lost.

The mere choice of a woman to carry such a part is in itself significant. There are three seekers after lost things in this chapter—the shepherd, the woman and the yearning father. The woman, too, may save souls. The very symbolism is indicative of Christ's complete break with the traditions of rabbinical theology.

But the woman is also responsible for the loss of the coin. It is "the piece which I lost," as distinguished from "my sheep which was lost" in the former parable (v. 6). She has kept an untidy, dusty house, where a candle is needed even in the daytime. The whole trouble begins with the dust in the house.

It is "in the house" that the coin is lost, not on the street, or in the wilderness. And within the outward organization of our church there may be a lost soul. There may be a child that has been born into a Christian house, baptized in infancy, taught in the Sabbath school, received into full membership in the church of our Lord, and then lost. It is a beautiful child, bright and shining, bearing the image and superscription of the King, created in the likeness of God, and yet it is lost and blackened beneath the dirt and rubbish.

Perhaps the woman was one of those who can never bear to throw away anything. Or she may be simply one of those lazy people, who, knowing that rubbish is rubbish, do not take the trouble to clear it away. There are times when the living church needs nothing so much as a house cleaning, to get rid of dead customs, outworn expressions, lifeless genealogies and old wives' fables.

The first thing to do is to light a candle. By means of darkness is nothing found. Let us have the truth; the clear, brave truth; the reality of life and the knowledge of the condition of our house. Then may we diligently seek.

The next step in our search will be to raise much dust. We possibly would not have thought about the dust being there unless we had had to seek a soul. But now we must brush aside all that is dead and formal in our church's religion, all that is jejune and barren, and leave only that which is truly framed for use and beauty. When we are in the business of seeking for a soul we cannot allow anything to remain that may hide or dim that soul.

To this poor woman the lost drachma is exceedingly precious. If instead of a woman there had been given us a multimillionaire, the loss would mean nothing. But now her drachma is one out of ten—and that, too, in a condition of life where there is no margin to cover a possible loss. She needs this coin, and she must find it. The coin is unspeakably valuable. And so is a single soul; begrimed and dimmed though it may be in the dust and ashes, it is of inestimable worth in the eye of God.

The coin cannot find itself. The prodigal can come to himself and turn his steps homeward. Even the sheep can bleat and try to pull itself free from the tearing thorns; but the coin can only lie inert beneath its rubbish heap.

There are some souls that seem to have lost all power of aiding themselves. It may be that their whole course of wandering and their condition of lostness has been beyond their own control. Christ recognizes such outcasts. If they are found at all, they must be found by a power that is higher and wiser than they. When they cannot help themselves, or lift themselves, the church of God, inspired by the Spirit of God, can find them. There are some of us who are God's coins.

The woman did not ask her friends and neighbors to help her find the coin; she did that herself. But she asked them to come in and rejoice with her when the coin was found. The painful care and seeking of that poor woman typify the anxiety of the church of God as she seeks the souls of her own child that has been lost in her midst. And the joy of the woman when she has found her coin dimly shadows forth the exultation of the church and the angelic hosts, her friends, over the recovery of a wandering soul into the family of God.

The lost souls are not all in the heathen lands. Some of them are very close to us at home—in our own city, our own streets or, it may be, our own house. It is better to save one soul to God than to gain all the money of all the rich men of the earth. For no accumulation of wealth by Christian men could ever cause the joy in the presence of the angels of God that is known when one sinner repents of his sin.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SERVICE

COMMENTS IN BRIEF BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS

October 19, 1913

THE ACTIVITY OF ASPIRERS

Topic—How to make this the best year in our society's history. Phil. 3:7-15.

What the supreme courts of the church say is less important than what the young people of the church are thinking and doing.

Ecclesiastical enactments will never transform society. But new purpose in the heart of youth may. Wise statesmanship in religion would concentrate more and more upon the church's children and young people. We need not worry about many of our present problems if only we may be assured of their solution by the next generation. It appears eminently reasonable that Christian leaders should focus more attention on the work of the young people's societies and the Sunday schools.

Both politics and religion have a big stake in the training of the young. Let any single generation be early imbued with a dominant idea concerning citizenship or church membership, and it will in time make over the whole order according to their thinking. At the present moment efforts are afoot to quicken the activity of Christian Endeavor along lines of good citizenship. If a flaming, knightly passion of patriotism fires the heart of these young people throughout the land during this present winter we may expect immediate results in the realms of good citizenship.

What the young people today are thinking, the men and women of tomorrow will be doing.

Apparently we are to have a revival of young people's work. That is well. More may be wrought thus for kingdom welfare than by a national "campaign." This means more societies—at least one in every church—and the vitalizing of those now in existence. It involves a seriously thought out scheme of definite work; for no young people's organization can succeed while it is a mere talk society. Also it implies a definite campaign, with church officers participating, for new members, the brightest and best young people of the community. And it needs, first and last, a clear, compelling statement of objectives. The church must be able to give a reason for the faith that is in her concerning young people's work.

The school is not the only educational agency. Many young persons never really become aware of this world and its problems until they begin to study missions in the Christian Endeavor society.

No young people today escape the pressure of present problems. The burning questions of women's dress and of the proportion of men's interests which shall be devoted to sport are near at hand instances. How shall these perplexities be solved in a sane, normal fashion, by young people who are neither prigs nor fanatics? Well, just as every hotel has a "master key" which will open all doors, so the Christian Endeavor society has a master idea which settles all questions: "Trusting in the Lord Jesus Christ for strength, I promise him that I will strive to do whatever he would like to have me do." That "whatever" is the touchstone of the Christian Endeavorer. It fits every possible condition. By it he may determine his course in the presence of every problem of these new days.

Aspiration is steam without an engine, unless it be directed into channels of practical activity.

A great year for an organization, as for an individual, is made by giving Bible study a first place in its program. "The entrance of thy word giveth light." "Wherewith shall a young man cleanse his way? By taking heed thereto according to thy word." A wisely run young people's society will put plans for systematic Bible study into its winter's work.

Every going forward is also a growing outward and an advancing upward.

Let us be thankful that our sorrow lives in us as an indestructible force, only changing its form, as forces do, and passing from pain into sympathy—the one poor word which includes all our best insight and our best love.—George Eliot.

Do not think of your faults; still less of others' faults; in every person that comes near you look for what is good and strong; honor that, rejoice in it; and, as you can, try to imitate it, and your faults will drop off like dead leaves when their time comes.—Ruskin.

MISSIONARY WORK

Warning Girls Against Chinese Romances

Frank E. Bible, father of Rev. Frank W. Bible, the well known Presbyterian missionary working at Hangchow, China, lives in the same city with his son and is engaged there as a government teacher, lending his personal influence to the support of Christian work in that city. Mr. Bible, senior, has just addressed to The Continent a very earnest letter seeking to give emphasis to a warning that has recently been printed in many American secular papers against marriage between American girls and the Chinese students attending universities in this country.

American residents in the Far East have frequent and painful occasions to note the practically infallible tragedy resulting from such alliances when young Chinamen return home with American wives. Doubtless in many cases the Chinese students have all honorable intentions. They imbibe during their American stay American conceptions of the right of a man to make his own choice of a life partner, and imagine themselves entitled to repudiate the betrothals, or even the ceremonies of marriage, contracted for them by their parents before they left China. But Chinese custom is invariably too strong for them when they do get back to their native heath, and the enforcement of old betrothal rites puts the American wife in a most equivocal position. If the husband rebels against custom, the ostracism which immediately befalls both himself and his foreign bride makes her situation ever more intolerable.

The case of Dorothy Dorr, married to a Chinese Yale student in Hartford in 1910, which has been widely exploited in the secular press, is, according to Mr. Bible, no isolated experience. He urges therefore that American girls should be plainly told that proposals of marage from Chinese students intending to return to China ought to be taken as proof that the young men lack either the honor or the practical good sense to make proper husbands, even if all prejudice against interracial alliances were dismissed. According to Mr. Bible's view, public sentiment on this subject should be sharpened to a degree of keenness that will absolutely forbid the solemnization of such a marriage by any gospel minister or civil magistrate anywhere in the United States.

Another Volunteer for Immigration Work

The Board of Home Missions has added another most promising young man to its list of "immigration fellows" who are sent abroad to live eighteen months among European peasants, and who are under contract thereafter to return and serve at least three years preaching to immigrant communities drawn from the population with which they have thus familiarized themselves. This newest "fellow" is Rev. H. B. Yergin, the son of Dr. V. N. Yergin, pastor of Calvary Presbyterian church in Auburn, N. Y. Mr. Yergin graduated from Yale in 1908 and from Auburn Seminary in 1913, and four days after the latter commencement he married, in Allentown, Pa., Miss Ida Flohr. For the summer they went to Trinidad, Colo., where through fourteen weeks continuously they held evangelistic services.

The success of Mr. Yergin's preaching abundantly justified the Home Board's confidence in his future usefulness, and at the beginning of October Mr. and Mrs. Yergin sailed away happily for their year and a half of stay in Italy. They will go to Florence until they have begun to master the language fairly, and will then go out into the country districts and live among the people.

Five Thousand Attend Church at Elat

The last letter from Miss Verna E. Eick of Elat, Africa, missionary of South Dakota Synodical Society, tells of "another high water mark" in church atendance, when over 5,000 were in and around the church building, besides an overflow meeting in the schoolhouse. Telling of four days spent in a heathen town with Mrs. Hope and her little daughter, she wrote: "The people are always anxious to hear the gospel, but they have many difficulties in the way of confessing. Often a woman gives as her excuse for not being a Christian that she is still unmarried and hunting a husband. It is a great compensation to see the transformation in heathen lives after they have confessed. One old woman apparently near death dreaded to die, but now all that fear seems to have passed away, and she is patiently waiting for her release. As I was passing through a town a woman called from her door for me to come and see her. Upon reaching her house I found her sick, as usual covered with redwood powder, and very thin. She said she could not attend the meetings, but had confessed and was hungry for the words of God, and wouldn't I tell her 'just two words.' It was near night and I had to hurry, so it was necessarily 'two words,' but she looked grateful even for that little."

More About Sam Higginbottom

Superintendent Sam Higginbottom of the leper asylum at Allahabad, India, whose work was described in The Continent of Oct. 2, is vastly rejoiced at receiving from the British government in India a grant of $1,500 which will supplement a recent appropriation from the leper committee sufficiently to provide a suitable and sanitary new barracks building for the 250 lepers now crowding the asylum. Mr. Higginbottom has long recognized that the inmates under his charge have been huddled together in the old buildings in a way far from suitable, but the pressure for admittance has been so great that he could not keep the number of his charges down to the capacity of the home. With the new buildings it is hoped that overcrowding can be prevented. The donation from the government was the immediate result of a visit from Sir James Meston, the provincial governor, last spring. The governor at the same time has provided a site for a new home for the untainted children of leper parents.

Although Mr. Higginbottom is so largely occupied with the leper asylum, he finds time to promote with practically equal zeal the agricultural department of Ewing Christian College. Among his twenty students there are three Brahmans who, by immemorial caste rules, are forbidden to undertake any manual labor. The government officials who are watching the development of the agricultural department, and even some of the missionaries, have told Mr. Higginbottom that he would never get Brahmans to go further in agricultural study than the book knowledge of it. He was assured on the knowledge of many "old hands" in India that whenever it came to getting out with shovel and plow to actually dig in the ground all his Brahmans would balk on him. And so some of them did. But the three named above disproved the generalization at least, for they are hard at practical work.

Some Remnants of Heathenism

Miss Margaret Duncan of China wrote during a visit to Mr. and Mrs. Shoemaker of Yuyao: "We took a walk to a hill outside of the city to a Buddhist temple in which there are about 500 idols and the representation of a Buddhist hell. The temple itself is in bad repair, and the idols that stand outside in the courts are badly dilapidated. There were gods fierce and gods gay, the god of thunder, the god of lightning, gods of happiness, prosperity, long life and jollity; goddesses for the mother to worship; gods supposed to heal all manner of diseases, etc. In the place of honor was an immense Buddha, with places for kneeling and burning of incense all around him. In front of each idol was a great bowl with partly burned incense sticks left by the last worshipers. One of the most interesting sights was a huge bronze bell, from the top of which were hanging many bunches of women's hair. This was hung there by the families of women whom they supposed to be in hades. The ringing of the bell and the vibrations thus caused in the hair are supposed in some way to pull them out of purgatory."

Porto Rican Workers—Personalia

Missionaries under the Home Board in Porto Rico are naturally under furlough regulations considerably different from those that are kept by workers for the Foreign Board. The Porto Rico rule is that missionaries are brought home for a three months' visit every three years. During the summer such furloughs have been enjoyed by Rev. and Mrs. Edward A. Odell of San Juan, who have been staying with relatives in Baltimore and Philadelphia, and Rev. James A. MacAllister of Mayaguez. Both of these missionary families have now returned to their posts and resumed their work refreshed by the summer's rest. Meanwhile, for the fall and early winter Rev. and Mrs. A. Roy Thompson of Lares and Rev. J. W. Harris of San German are coming home for their appointed time of respite.

New reenforcements for the Porto Rican work are Mr. and Mrs. George Harold Ellis, who have just gone out to Mayaguez. Mr. Ellis will preach in the English speaking church of Mayaguez and will also teach in the mission schools there—work for which a considerable teaching experience has well fitted him. Mr. Ellis graduated last spring from the Omaha Theological Seminary and has been rated by his teachers there as a man of very conspicuous promise. Mrs. Ellis is particularly interested in and adapted for the Porto Rican work, because of Spanish ancestry.

Missionary Brevities

—M. C. Allaben, superintendent of schools for the Women's Board of Home Missions, has just returned from a tour of the institutions maintained by the board in Arizona, New Mexico and Oklahoma.

—In the October number of The International Review of Missions, Secretary Arthur J. Brown of the Presbyterian Board contributes a leading article on the relations of the native church and the missionaries in Japan. President Howard Bliss's article on the Balkan war and Christian work among the Moslems is one of the up to date contributions.

—Work among untouched African heathen is felt by the missionaries to justify rather unusual homiletic methods. Rev. John Wright of Benito, Africa, has found his gold tooth an excellent text to start with in trying to attract the attention of an African crowd. Missionaries doing this work are never quite certain that they have had a favorable reception until the chief announces a dance in their honor. That demonstrates that the people are pleased.

Board Notes and Announcements

—The October meeting of Chicago Presbyterial Society Friday morning, Mrs. Edgar P. Hill presiding, was addressed by Rev. George S. and Mrs. McCune of Syen Chun, Korea. The latter, who is the only daughter of the founder of Park College, showed the need of educating the young married women and widows in Korea. "One most interesting class in the woman's school," she said, "is formed of the wives of our academy boys." She made grateful mention of letters received from Maine and California and various places between, all saying "We read of your school in The Continent." Mr. McCune, whose sister is the Korea representative of Westminster Guild, and who was one of the Coe College faculty before his missionary appointment eight years ago, told much in a few minutes about the answers to prayer during the conspiracy trial, when all of the teachers and a large proportion of the students in his academy spent a year and a half in prison. The injustice they suffered, no, even seventy kinds of torture, was not enough to embitter them. They say, "We are Father's youngest child; the youngest is always in danger of being spoiled; we need whipping."

—One-half of the fiscal year of the Board of the Northwest closed Sept. 15. Eight of the eleven synodical societies report an increase as compared with the first six months of last year. Although Illinois has made the greatest increase in amount—$2,705—it is interesting to note that it has not made the highest percentage of increase. Michigan leads with a gain of 61 per cent, then follow North Dakota with a gain of 41 per cent, Minnesota, 40 per cent, Illinois 26 per cent, South Dakota 23 per cent, Indiana 16 per cent, Colorado 11 per cent and Iowa 4 per cent.

NEW BOOKS

Humor Under the Microscope

The Psychology of Laughter, by Boris Sidis. Any such work as this immediately challenges comparison with Bergson's recent but perhaps already classic work "Laughter." Professor Sidis deliberately challenges comparison by referring to Bergson's views as erroneous and based on a false generalization. According to the earlier writer laughter was a social corrective, turned against all those individuals who permitted the merely mechanical and external to hinder or stop their personal, spiritual activities. This view substantially agrees with that preached—and very notably practiced—by George Meredith. Holding it, one must draw a distinction between comedy and satire, which deal with types of behavior, and tragic or at least descriptive art which deals with individual characters in reaction with circumstances. Professor Sidis thinks the distinction an artificial one, and refers laughter to a number of sources, such as a feeling of superiority to the person laughed at, a release of motor energy due to any sight that stimulates our sense of energy, and a number of other causes. But the reader cannot help feeling that these could be further analyzed and found ultimately to depend on Bergson's criterion. The author also discusses, not very illuminatively, some of the attitudes akin to laughter, such as the rather kindly but sarcastic utterances of the Hebrew prophets against what was base in the life of their times. The actual jokes he reproduces as examples are the most foolishly peurile attempts at funniness that the reviewer has ever come across anywhere and they suggest that the author tackled his subject in a most academic and remote manner. [D. Appleton and Company, New York. $2 net.]

Llewellyn Jones.

Of an Educational Nature

Both Sides of 100 Public Questions Briefly Debated, by Edwin DuBois Shurter and Carl Cleveland Taylor. These questions all deal with present-day problems of political, economic, industrial, social, educational and international significance. The leading arguments on both sides of each question are given, supplemented by references enabling further research. The wide utility of such a book is obvious. [Hinds, Noble and Eldredge, New York.

The Ways of the Planets, by Martha Evans Martin. This is a most useful little book which describes in a simple way the many interesting facts relating to the solar system. The meanings of the few technical terms which are necessarily used are carefully explained, and directions are given for locating and identifying the planets. The book would serve well as an introduction to a larger work. [Harper and Brothers, New York. $1.25 net.

Method in Teaching, by A. R. Osborn. In these days of scientific pedagogy no Bible teacher can afford to lag behind, for the Bible deserves at least to be as well taught as any other subject. This valuable little book is well adapted to aid the Sunday school teacher in making his teaching practical and effective. [Oxford University Press, New York. 50 cents.

Drama and Verse

Irish Plays and Players, by Cornelius Weygandt (Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston; $2 net), presents an admirable survey of the newer Irish dramatists—Yeats, Edward Martyn, George Moore, George Russell, Lady Gregory, Synge and many others—and a critical estimate of their work. New Comedies, by Lady Gregory (G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York; $1.50 net), contains "The Bogie Man," "The Full Moon," "Coats," "Damer's Gold," and "McDonough's Wife." Perhaps even more interesting than the plays themselves is the section of notes at the end, in which the history of each little comedy is revealed. Both these notes and the plays themselves emphasize Lady Gregory's interest in the folklore of the simplest of simple lives—the interest to which can be traced the essence of her success and popularity. Sardou and the Sardou Plays, by Jerome A. Hart (J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia; $2.50 net), purports to be an exhaustive study of the Frenchman and all his dramas. August Strindberg's Plays, translated by Edith and Warner Oland (John W. Luce & Company, Boston; $1.50 net), contains "Comrades," "Facing Death," "Pariah" and "Easter," besides an appreciation of the great Swedish playwright. The latest volume added to the "Plays of Today and Tomorrow" series is Turandot, Princess of China, described as "a Chinoiserie in three acts," and translated from the Chinese of Karl Vollmoeller by Jethro Bithell. The plot resembles the casket story of "The Merchant of Venice," and is carefully developed, the atmosphere of intrigue and mystery being highly effective. (Duffield and Company, New York. $1 net.) The Necessary Evil, by Charles Rann Kennedy (Harper and Brothers, New York; $1.25 net), is a sensational effort to solve the social evil. Its point of view is sound, but its treatment rather silly. Patriots, by Lennox Robinson, and The Drone, by Rutherford Mayne (John W. Luce and Company, Boston; each 75 cents net), are two of the one-act plays recently put on by the Irish players. The first is a beautifully written thing dealing with the tragedy of rebellion; the second is rich in comedy.

Tales of the Mermaid Tavern, by Alfred Noyes. This sheaf of rollicking tales in verse is an attempt to reproduce the spirit of that celebrated tavern where Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, Marlowe, Beaumont and their cronies assembled to hold those conversational bouts which are the breath of life for literary men, and indeed, which one of our foremost critics claims have their best results in spiritual stimulus when they are given the whole night's swing—which Mr. Noyes's protagonists doubtless often gave them. The tales here told are supposed to have passed between these great story tellers and critics of life of the Elizabethan age. They are all good tales, told with that lyrical swing which never deserts Mr. Noyes, but we can imagine a subjective intensity in these men which is a little beyond Mr. Noyes as yet. The emotional range of the stories is wide. As a romantic treatment of the Elizabethan age, if not as a full psychological interpretation of its heroes, these tales may well be commended to the lover of rather full blooded romance. [Frederick A. Stokes and Company, New York. $1.35 net.

Uncle Sam in the Philippines

The Philippine Problem, by Frederick Chamberlin. The change of administration at Washington and at Manila has again made the Philippines a live issue, and an intelligent understanding of the situation confronting us in Asiatic waters must be based upon knowledge of the facts. Mr. Chamberlin has investigated conditions in the Far East, apparently knows exactly what he is talking about and claims to have given readers all that is necessary for a mastery of "the problem" on broad lines. He tells what America has tried to accomplish and has actually attained in the islands since 1898, paying tribute to the American executive personnel. "Miraculously, as if out of the skies," the author finds, "the Filipinos have been given the attributes of modern civilization without one struggle or any insistent desire to obtain them. . . . Until they develop a national spirit that calls for, yes, demands even, a modern civilization, it is idle to compare their future with that of a nation which has done that very thing" (Japan). The conclusion is that the logic of events "may" compel us to continue as we have begun. Mr. Chamberlin's volume is comprehensive and excellent, except for a failure to recognize the work of the missionaries whom Christian people have sent to the Philippines. There are numerous illustrations. [Little, Brown and Company, Boston. $1.50 net.

The Hibbert Journal

The Hibbert Journal for July gives space to four American contributors. The first is Professor A. C. McGiffert of Union Theological Seminary, who writes on Christianity in the light of its history. His main contention is that the rediscovery of Jesus means the rebirth of Christianity and its redemption from the outwardness and artificiality of mere public and official expression. The second is Professor Preserved Smith, who contributes "A New Light on the Relations of Peter and Paul." The gist of the article is that the stories of St. Mark's gospel concerning the conduct of Peter towards Jesus are due to his hostility to the Pauline doctrine of Christ. Professor Thomas C. Hall is interested in the social problem of the treatment of offenders and writes on the significance of coercion. J. H. Larned of Buffalo writes on "Evil: A Discussion for the Times." The review also contains an article by the Hindu philosopher, Rabindranath Tagore, on the problem of evil. There are a number of other papers, and a report on some fragments of an ancient gospel used by the mediæval Cathari. [Sherman, French and Company, Boston. 75 cents net.

Popular Presbyterian History

The Burning Bush, by J. R. Fleming. Every Christian church has its inspiring chapters of history. Few of them can be more inspiring than the Presbyterian, but there are only a few books which tell the story as a continuous one. This is admirably done by Dr. Fleming in a new story of the Presbyterian Church in all lands, told mainly for young people. We hope there are many pastors waiting for this book, for use in their young people's meetings and for illumination of sermons. Reading of it will give an excellent background against which one may see the local church. The test question will arise, Is our church here in this place worthy of such ancestry as it has? [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. 75 cents net.

Stories for Young People

The Junior Trophy, by Ralph Henry Barbour, is a real boy's story of athletics and baseball, with plenty of wit and humor. As a climax "Kid" Fairchild helps to win a cup for his team by a wonderful catch and a hard hit. The book seems to be one of Mr. Barbour's best. [D. Appleton and Company, New York. $1.25 net.

St. Dunstan's Boy Scouts, by Warren L. Eldred, is the fourth volume in this series, and tells of some private school boys who organize a trip, unravel a mystery and assist in the conversion of a gang of "toughs," who become "true scouts." It is a story of manliness and honor. [Lothrop, Lee and Shepard Company, Boston. $1.50 net.

The Torch Bearers: A Camp Fire Girls' Story, by J. T. Thurston, tells of a girls' Indian camp and presents a remarkable plan for such organizations. The idea is one of great value to girls who long for a larger outdoor life. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1 net.

Jackie and Peetie Bow Wow, by Howard R. Garis, contains thirty-one dog stories in which a white and a black puppy have splendid adventures. [R. H. Fenno and Company, New York. $1 net.

Sinopah, the Indian Boy, by James Willard Schultz. Mr. Schultz married an Indian woman and lived for a long time with the Blackfoot tribe. His story of this little Indian boy is thus made doubly interesting. There are charming illustrations by E. Boyd Smith. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1.10 net.

THE TWIN SCOUTS, by Joseph A. Altsheler. Ned Fulton and his friends, who appeared in "The Texan Star," here play a big part in the defense of the Alamo. [D. Appleton and Company, New York. $1.25 net.

LANTERN STORIES, by Lena Leonard Fisher. Designed to implant an interest in foreign missions, these little stories are so well told as to be sure of success. [Eaton and Mains, New York. 50 cents net.

MOTOR BOATING FOR BOYS, by Charles G. Davis. Instructions in all phases of motor boating by an expert. The illustrations and diagrams are very helpful. [Harper and Brothers, New York. 50 cents net.

Miscellaneous

THE AMERICAN SPIRIT, by Oscar S. Straus. Mr. Straus has been lawyer, merchant, diplomat and cabinet member. His diplomatic experience began twenty-five years ago when Cleveland appointed him minister to Turkey, a mission which was again bestowed upon him by McKinley. In 1906 Roosevelt made him secretary of commerce and labor and in 1909 President Taft sent him to Turkey once more. Last year he was the candidate of the Progressive party for governor of New York. He has also been a member of the permanent court of arbitration of The Hague. His scholarship and wide public service have well equipped him for the discussions of various manifestations of the American spirit and of the problems treated in this collection of essays and addresses. He urges that the forces of evolution now at work be so regulated that they shall not narrow but widen the highways of opportunity for the average man and woman of this and the coming generations, and keep wide open the gateway to economic betterment. "The trials of adversity fell upon the fathers; the trials of prosperity are ours," says Mr. Straus. Naturally he gives considerable attention to commerce. He believes the much decried commercial spirit has contributed tremendously to the community of nations and is the surest guaranty for world peace. One address discusses religious liberty in the United States from the standpoint of an enlightened American Jew thoroughly familiar with the American history of the subject. ROMAN FARM MANAGEMENT is described as "the treatises of Cato and Varro done into English, with notes of modern instances, by a Virginia farmer." It may be doubted whether these two Latin writers on agriculture have ever before had so sympathetic an editor as this Virginia farmer, who hides his identity and unduly depreciates his own scholarship. To make more familiar to English readers the less known ancient classics is a real service, and the "De Agricultura" of Cato and the "De Re Rustica" of Varro are in this class. The modern footnotes are illuminating and occasionally amusing, and, thanks to his wide reading on ancient farming, his expert knowledge of modern farming and his love for the noble language of ancient Rome and the treasures which it has preserved, the editor has succeeded in producing a most charming book. The binding in imitation vallum and the typography are tasteful and in keeping with the character of the volume. [Macmillan Company, New York. $2 net.

BIBLE STUDY UNION GRADED LESSONS. To this series, formerly known as the Blakeslee system, is unquestionably due much of the credit for the present rapidly increasing use of graded Sunday school lessons. The first publications, issued more than twenty years ago, covering the Old Testament, the life of Christ and the apostolic church, were a long step in the direction of scientific grading and they gained popularity and success in many schools. The later series, fully graded, seem to meet every requirement of modern Bible instruction. There are new courses on the life of Christ. Of special interest are the supplemental course on "Young People's Problems as Interpreted by Jesus," and the full course for the senior grade, "The Modern Church." All courses are provided with literature both for pupils and teachers. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

Dr. M. Woolsey Stryker, President of Hamilton College, Clinton, N. Y.:

I think your HALLOWED HYMNS, NEW AND OLD, an unusually good book for the purpose it follows; that is, to combine with bright melodies the more available of the excellent modern church hymns, and thus to lead along, not abruptly, toward a better and deeper accent of praise.

Rev. E. J. Meacham, Pastor, First Presbyterian Church, Portsmouth, Ohio:

HALLOWED HYMNS, NEW AND OLD, ought to be exceedingly popular. I spent the whole afternoon looking over the songs in this book and am delighted. It is a fine collection, perfectly splendid. I know of no collection of songs so complete and so choice. I shall do churches and Sunday Schools, wherever I can, the favor of recommending this book.

256 Pages. 100 New Songs.

The Open Hearth

[Writers of letters to The Open Hearth are reminded that excessive length of their contributions operates to shut out other participants in current discussions. Three hundred words is an acceptable maximum. Communications of greater length will be cut down, or will be returned if marked "in full or not at all."]

Vacation Sabbath-Breaking

It is surprising that so many persons who at home are punctual in their attendance at worship and industrious in church activities throw off restraint while on vacation and take temporary leave of everything that interferes with personal indulgence.

The Sabbath is a day that does not seem to count in our summer gathering places, and few and far between are the ones who make any attempt to keep the day as they would under the restraints of home environment. The frequent arriving and departing, the pleasure jaunts, the jolly intercourse, the entire neglect of any religious duty marks the conduct of many who fall in with others doing these same things.

One has no right, of course, to prescribe rules for the individual observance of the day, yet we are told "by their fruits ye shall know them," and surely the atmosphere created by these transgressors is not helpful to the preservation of the day's sanctity. The fourth commandment has never been expunged from the decalogue, but stands yet with as much authority as does the sixth or eighth.

The selfishness of such neglect is not apparent to these pleasure seekers. That the breaking down of this day entails upon others less fortunate an additional amount of labor does not enter their calculations. Six days for labor is nature's law; they thoughtlessly increase it to seven. That the little country church near them needs their moral help is a great surprise. The annual visitation of the city guest is hailed as a help by these more remote people of the mountains, and how often, alas! are they disappointed by the indifference or entire neglect and more often by the bad example set by some who know better.

Says Marion Harland Was Right

Anent "Was Marion Harland Right or Wrong?" manifestly E. C. M. completely misapprehended Marion Harland's meaning, intent or motive. Clearly general attack upon the Protestant ministry was as far from her mind while writing that article as the east is from the west.

Her scourge was aimed very accurately, too, at us members of Protestant churches for willfully, continually, persistently violating the law of God as laid down by Paul, as well as our own pledges and sense of common honesty, by so "muzzling the ox that treadeth out the corn" as to starve him and his family, and consequently ourselves to spiritual emaciation.

Doubtless she supposed a celibate ministry suggestion would more effectually get under our cuticle and sting worse than anything else that occurred to her mind at that instant, so she fastened it to the tip of her whip.

Our only legitimate plea is "guilty as charged," and our only manly course to bow, grit our teeth and take it; then profit by it, support our church and pay our preachers as we do all other honest debts.

"America" Fits Pennsylvania

The son of a Scotch Presbyterian clergyman and the descendant of two great-grandfathers who fought in "the days of 1776," and bearing the surname of the secretary of noble John Knox, I protest against the tenor of your remarks in regard to our national hymn "America" in your issue of Sept. 4.

It is almost unbearable to have Rome trying to suppress the singing of it, but to have a Presbyterian journal virtually on their side is amazing. Dr. Henry van Dyke may call it "too New Englandish," but that does not make it so, because the word "Pilgrims" occurs in one line.

Well for our country at this time, if the spirit of the Pilgrims was abroad in our land, and some of their laws in force.

Am sure that in this beautiful mountain region we can sing,

> "I love thy rocks and rills,
> Thy woods and templed hills,"

as well as among the "White Hills" of New Hampshire or the "rock bound" coast of Maine.

General Lafayette is credited with saying that "if ever the liberty of America is destroyed, it would be by the church of Rome." Step by step it is trying to destroy our civil and religious freedom, and our prayer should be:

> "Our fathers' God, to thee,
> Author of liberty,
> To thee we sing:
> Long may our land be bright
> With freedom's holy light;
> Protect us by thy might,
> Great God, our King."

Pioneering in Pennsylvania

I am always interested in anything pertaining to Pennsylvania, especially to that part of the great state where I was born and brought up. I was pleased to see in a recent number of The Continent the article by William T. Ellis regarding Wellsboro. There may still be some in Wellsboro who remember the Tracys, the Bullocks, the Martins of Smithfield and the Martins and Birds of Potter county. My parents moved with their young family of twelve from Bradford county to Potter county sixty-three years ago, passing through Wellsboro and toiling up the muddy roads of Pine creek over Sweden hill and down to Sweden valley and settled on a farm covered with heavy timber, hemlock and hardwood. Well do I remember the herculean task of felling those great trees, and rolling them up into piles and burning them—lumber and tanbark enough to make one rich if it were there now.

I passed through Wellsboro several times between our new home and the old one. One time when I was there a circus was in town. The elephant became enraged and threw a negro boy nearly over a barn. It was said that when he came to earth he alighted on a stone pile squarely on the top of his head, which alone saved him from great harm. In those days Pastor Hershey and Father Jordan would have spent at least seven hours climbing over the hills to Corning, with a team, instead of going in two hours in a modern automobile. I am glad to know that that part of the country has kept fully abreast of the times, and to note the democratic and friendly spirit manifested by the people of the town, all denominations and creeds working together for the coming of His kingdom. C. M. BIRD.

Reading Matter for Alaska

Readers of The Continent who desire to forward periodicals and other literature to Alaska are informed that it may be addressed to any of the following:

Common Soldiers Never Did Hate

I want to thank you for the article in The Continent entitled "Only the Church Hasn't Reached Gettysburg." I am a veteran of the "great unpleasantness—served three years as an officer of the union army, coming home with the rank of colonel. I think too much is being made of the "fraternizing at Gettysburg" as evidence of the "buried hatchet."

My own experience taught me that there never was a time when the private soldiers of both armies would not fraternize. I never saw evidence of personal bitterness between the men when they came together under circumstances which enabled them to fraternize. Indeed, as an officer, many times on picket it became my duty to stop friendly interchange of civilities between the men of the two lines—this by orders from headquarters.

Bitterness did not manifest itself until we came in contact with officers and persons of higher rank. Do you realize that only about 6 per cent of the southern people ever had any desire for war or any real interest in its promotion? The awful fact is, that 6 per cent was the slaveholding oligarchy, and it dominated and domineered the South into the war. F. L. HITCHCOCK.

Another Case of Church Union

William T. Ellis, in his article on the union of the Congregational and Presbyterian churches of Owego, N. Y., says, "This church union is probably without a parallel." To the contrary, and as a matter of church history, there was an extremely close parallel to this not far from Owego, at Franklin, N. Y., thirty-four years ago.

The village contained about 1,000 inhabitants and was surrounded by farms and farmers, all fine, intelligent people. There were five denominations in the town, each with neat church and manse buildings. The Presbyterian and Congregational were two of the largest and did not need to unite for financial reasons or from small attendance. Both had excellent pastors. But the spirit of unity came into the hearts of the people, and after due negotiations they came together. The Presbyterian building was enlarged and the other edifice was sold. Both pastors resigned and a new pastor was called to the enlarged pastorate. The new organization, I believe, was Congregational. All was in good spirit and there was not a flaw in the weld. The large Sunday school and congregation were a delight to see. ALBERT ALLEN BIRD.

Where Books Would Do Good

I read in The Continent that some layman is sending copies of the book entitled "Crowds" to individuals. I wish that some good man or men would see that some of us rural ministers that have to exist on small stipends and are heart-hungry for some stimulating sermons and really good up to date literature, were supplied with an occasional book to enlighten him and enable him in turn to endeavor to enlighten his little flock. I am sure that a great deal of good could be accomplished in this way.

Romanism Versus Enlightenment

That was a good one you got off on Rome recently through the case of Archbishop Ireland. And Rome proposes to put that kind of gag on the American people and nation. She has got it on our daily papers, and on our politicians.

Keep your guns in order and your bullet molds busy. There is a life and death struggle between Romanism and enlightened civil and religious liberty, and the battlefield is now shifted to our own country. J. McGAUGHEY.

A Little True Story of Korea

come to the house but Ni Si, and how happy her heart was made, for her child could go to school all the next year!

And this was not all yet. During the year the Meguk Pouin returned to America and when Ruth's mother heard all the tale, she said, "Write back to your friend that we will see that little girl through school—we'll send the money each year. And tell her the people who say it mean what they say."

So the Meguk Pouin was happy, and the little heavily burdened Korean mother was made happy, and as for little Yung Sooni—why, it means that her future is assured. With the education she is now to receive she can support herself some day by teaching other girls, she can be a help to her mother, she will be enabled to care for her own children understandingly in the years to come—her whole life will be a power in the service of the Master.

"Men, Brethren, Fathers, Hear Ye!"

With this salutation, the Apostle Paul began the defense of his ministry before the multitude at Jerusalem. With it, also, Ministerial Relief and Sustentation renews its plea for the Gospel Ministry to-day.

MEN! The ministry depends upon you as well as upon God. It seeks your sons for its holy service. It needs your prayerful support and sympathy during its active days. It requires a tithe of your property for its temporal needs. It pleads with you in the name of Christ for its aged and disabled members, and for its dependent widows and its defenseless orphans.

BRETHREN! The ministry demands your unremitting service. It offers you for His guerdon here "many a sorrow, many a labor, many a tear," but a glorious crown. It reminds you of the inevitable day of disability. It pleads with you to plead before the church the cause of your disabled brethren, who but yesterday walked the way you are now traveling, and who to-day are waiting where you will stand to-morrow.

FATHERS! The ministry honors you because you have honored it. You shall no longer be forgotten or forsaken. Your cry has reached the ear of the Lord God of Hosts. He has heard your patient plea and his church will rise to your succor and support. Your hoary head shall become a crown of glory. Your dependent loved ones, if, and when, God calls you home, shall find refuge and rest in the arms of a just and compassionate church.

MEN, BRETHREN, FATHERS! God has heard the cry of His faithful servants, Hear Ye!

IN THE FIELD OF CHRISTIAN EFFORT

DR. ORTS LECTURES IN NEW ORLEANS

During the week of Sept. 7-15 Dr. Juan Orts y Gonzalez, who was formerly a Franciscan friar and a Roman Catholic priest, gave six lectures in Lafayette church, New Orleans. It was in this church that Dr. Orts made his public profession of Protestantism. He had previously been a Roman Catholic priest for twenty years, having served as such in Spain, Mexico and Mississippi.

After voluntarily leaving the priesthood in May, 1908, and before formally entering the Protestant church, Dr. Orts had written his book, "Roman Catholicism Capitulating Before Protestantism." In the fall of 1909 he entered Union Seminary, Richmond, Va., where he has recently been graduated and where he was last February ordained. Dr. Orts last December conducted a twelve days' meeting in Detroit, Mich.

His recent visit to New Orleans was marked by the hearty indorsement given him by the Protestant Ministers' Association. Another feature was Dr. Orts's large audiences. Whenever he spoke, the auditorium was filled, and on the final occasion there was more enthusiasm than a public Protestant meeting has perhaps ever before stirred there.

Only one of the local newspapers—The Times-Democrat—undertook to report Dr. Orts's lectures. In its issue of Sept. 8 there was a column of very fair outline of the lecture "Romanism and Protestantism Compared." Immediately the Romanists "got busy." They attempted an answer a few days later in the same paper. Then, although there was wide and deep public interest in the matter, no further reports of the lectures appeared in any New Orleans daily papers.

Rev. J. C. Barr, pastor of Lafayette church, says: "The method of Dr. Orts is most commendable. He evinces always a beautiful Christian spirit. His arguments are on a high plane. While merciless in his denunciations of the evils of the Roman Catholic system, he never abuses the Roman Catholic people. Moreover, he is constructive. Throughout his work he is loyal to the Bible and to Christ."

NEWS OF THE TEMPERANCE FIGHT

Kansas Raises Few Prisoners—Forty-six of the 105 counties of Kansas last year sent no prisoners to the penitentiary. Thirty-four counties have produced no prisoners in two consecutive years.

No Billboard Advertisements in Oklahoma—According to The American Issue there is not a newspaper in Oklahoma which will carry a liquor advertisement; neither will any such liquor announcement be permitted upon the billboards of the state.

Children Find Whisky; One Dies—A bottle of whisky projecting from a pocket of a drunken man near Hibbing, Minn., attracted the attention of passing children, one of whom, a 5-year-old girl, died after drinking some of the contents. Three others were saved with difficulty.

Opinion Divided on Law—Senator Kenyon of Iowa in commenting upon a recent decision holding that the Webb law is unconstitutional lists a number of opinions on both sides of this question. President Taft vetoed the bill because he thought it unconstitutional. Shortly afterwards his son in Harvard published an article holding that it was constitutional. Few recent laws have aroused such a diversity of opinion.

Y. M. C. A. STIMULATES WORK OF MEN

Through the efforts of the state Y. M. C. A. commitee, conferences on united training for men are to be held in six cities of Illinois beginning Oct. 14 at Kankakee. Fred S. Goodman and James A. Whitmore of the international Y. M. C. A. committee will be the principal speakers in this campaign. Both were with the Men and Religion Movement. The schedule of dates is:

Kankakee, Oct. 14-16; Decatur, Oct. 17-18; Peoria, Oct. 19-21; Freeport, 24-26; Elgin, 27-29; Rock Island, Oct. 31-Nov. 2.

Each series of conferences will open with a supper attended by local Y. M. C. A. workers, pastors and laymen, followed by short addresses under the general conference theme of "Effective Religious Work for Men and Boys." Afternoon and evening meetings with fathers and mothers, dinners for the older boys and other special gatherings will be included in the comprehensive program.

Benefits of Sunday Meetings Persist

In answer to questions by many outside of Wyoming Valley, "Are the results of the campaign of Rev. William A. Sunday and his helpers proving to be satisfactory and permanent?" an hour was spent by Lackawanna Presbytery in hearing from pastors and elders from Wilkes-Barre and vicinity. Half a day would only have been too short to tell all of the good things that are happening in connection with the work in the churches and Sabbath schools and teams sent out of personal workers. According to local pastors many Bible classes continued all through the hot weather. A class taught by Miss Saxe in Central M. E. church during the pastor's vacation had a thousand in attendance, all bringing Bibles and notebooks. One pastor said that he had had no vacation because there had been no Sabbath since "Billy" Sunday left in which he had not received new members, most of them men and several reformed inebriates. There was not a single pessimistic note in all the details of these recitals in presbytery.

MINIATURE WORLD IN MINNEAPOLIS

Young People of Twin Cities Have Missionary Exhibition in Connection with Synod—St. Paul Churches Are Growing.

ST. PAUL-MINNEAPOLIS—The meeting of the synodical society in Minneapolis Oct. 1 and 2 had a number of unique features, among them being an abbreviated form of "The World in Minneapolis." The various boards were represented in pageant form. Booth displays were supplemented by music and art. The young people of the Twin Cities provided the personnel of the enterprise.

Free Smaller Churches of Debt—The board of church extension of Minneapolis Presbytery has the full amount of its fund pledged so that a number of the smaller churches will soon be freed from debt. Business men have put business methods into this enterprise.

Add to Church Property—Lexington Parkway church, St. Paul, is progressing under Rev. S. V. Sydenstricker of Crawfordsville Presbytery, who began work Sept. 21. A new lot adjoining the present church building has recently been purchased.

Congregation Increases 25 Per Cent Annually—The third anniversary of the pastorate of Dr. George E. Davies in Merriam Park church was marked Sept. 14. Aside from the building of the new church, now almost complete, the congregation has made substantial gains. The membership has grown at the rate of about 25 per cent per year, and the congregational offerings even faster. The rapid growth of the Park makes growth not only natural but necessary.

Colored People Have New Church—October 19 will be remembered in the brief annals of Zion (colored) church. Rev. George Washington Camp has successfully led his people in the erection of a new $4,000 church which will then be dedicated free of debt. The church plans to build a home for the pastor on adjoining lots in the no distant future.

Freedmen's Board Has Exhibit

The Freedmen's Board, headquarters in Pittsburg, is taking an active part in the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the emancipation proclamation, in Philadelphia. Rev. John M. Gaston, field secretary, has charge of the board's exhibit, showing the progress of the work in the schools and missions of the South.

Result of One Student's Work

The Bohemian congregation at Thurston, Neb., during the past summer has completed a brick edifice on which the remaining debt is only $1,800. The organization has been built up through the instrumentality of Jerry I. Stluc, a student in Dubuque German College and Seminary. He has worked there during the last two vacations.

MEMORIAL BUILDING TO DR. SCHAFF

Proposed Structure in Philadelphia to Be Used for Interchurch Agencies—Dr. McMillan as Correponding Secretary to Raise $700,000.

Dr. Duncan J. McMillan, late secretary of the Board of Church Erection, has become corresponding secretary of the Philip Schaff memorial committee and as such has established his office at 50 Church street, New York City. This memorial proposal is enlisting the interest of both Reformed and Presbyterian ministers, because Dr. Schaff was at first a professor of theology in the seminary of the Reformed Church and afterward a Presbyterian professor in Union Seminary. The building commemorating his name is planned as distinctly interdenominational in character with accommodations for the offices of religious, civic and philanthropic organizations of varying denominational names.

The site chosen is at Race and 15th streets, Philadelphia, a few blocks northwest of the city hall. Members of the Reformed denomination have already given a fund which, with accumulations, now amounts to about $400,000. The total cost will be $1,100,000, and Dr. McMillan aims to collect the balance. The building will include on the ground floor an auditorium seating a thousand people. The committee as now organized is under the chairmanship of Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin, pastor of Madison Avenue church, New York City. Dr. Rufus W. Miller, editor of Sunday school publications for the Reformed Church, is secretary. William H. Roberts, Jr., Philadelphia, is treasurer.

WORLDWIDE ACTIVITIES OF Y. M. C. A.

Camp for Iowa Association—The Iowa state committee has purchased twenty-six acres on Lake Okoboji as a site for a permanent camp for the associations of Iowa.

Stop Work for Exercises—Work is suspended twice a day in the offices of the Southern Express Company, Chattanooga, Tenn., and the 700 men rise at their desks and under the direction of the Y. M. C. A. physical director have a short drill. The time consumed is worth $60, but the company says it pays.

Sends Policemen to Gymnasium—The town officers of Montclair, N. J., have for the second time paid the Y. M. C. A. membership of all the policemen of the city. The men have improved their ability to run and are in better physical condition. Citizens have helped to pay the fees of some postmen, all of whom look on the association building as headquarters.

Foreign Associations Growing—The Y. M. C. A. at Foochow added 845 members in two weeks' membership campaign.—In spite of the war the association board in Constantinople has secured pledges of $1,400 a year for support of a new association building there.—The Calcutta Association for 1912 raised more than twice as much money locally as it did two years ago.

PROTEST WEAKENING OF MANN ACT

Ministers of Chicago at the meeting of the Church Federation at Association hall recently adopted a resolution protesting against the weakening of the Mann white slave act. The federation represents 600 churches. The resolutions adopted call attention to the low moral tone existing in certain influential quarters and appeal to men and women to support the law in its prohibition of debauchery. The ministers also asked the President and department of justice to see that the act is enforced impartially.

The Chicago ministers at the same meeting adopted resolutions urging the city of San Francisco and the management of the coming exposition there to prevent the exploitation of the exposition by commercialized vice.

Seven Sermons from One Editorial

Dr. Allen D. Carlile, pastor of Throop Avenue church, Brooklyn, has announced a series of seven Sunday morning sermons based upon the first page editorial of The Continent of Sept. 4, "The Inside of the Cup." The themes of the sermons, which began Oct. 5, are: "What Is the Church?" "The Living Message," "Human Reason and Divine Revelation," "The Marks of a True Christian," "Compassion on the Multitude," "Social Service" and "God's Hatred of Sham."

Gives $100 to Help Every-Member Campaign

An elder of one of the Kansas churches has offered to give $100 to be used by the united missions and benevolence committee in promoting the every-member campaign in synod.

By the terms of the new tariff bill Bibles, which now pay a tariff of 25 per cent, are admitted free.

CENTER INTEREST ON FOREIGN PEOPLE

Los Angeles Churches Prepare for Multitude of Newcomers Expected with Opening of Canal—Will Oppose Prize Fights.

LOS ANGELES—A movement is on foot among the churches of all denominations to increase interest in foreign populations now in the city and to make preparation to receive the multitudes that are expected to arrive when the Panama canal is opened. Nov. 15 and 23 have been chosen as dates upon which every pastor in the city will be asked to preach sermons on the subject "The Foreigners Among Us." Men, women and children will be urged to take up the study of the subject in Sunday schools and clubs. The whole campaign is expected to culminate in union Thanksgiving services.

May Appeal Mason Case—Los Angeles Presbytery spent all of one day and part of a night on the Dr. Mason case, and at the end of that time the matter stood just where it did four months ago. The report of the judicial commission—a complete vindication of Dr. Mason—was filed. An appeal was taken to synod. Formal charges, the first that have appeared so far in the case, were preferred by eight officers of Long Beach church and three ministers. The plaintiffs agreed later to drop the charges, provided presbytery was willing to condemn certain misrepresentations of the public press. The vindication thus stands as the action of presbytery, unless reversed by synod. It is believed that the appeal will not be pressed. Dr. Mason has suffered a complete collapse and has since been taken to a sanitarium.

Plan Effort Against Prize Fights—The church federation of Los Angeles has inaugurated an anti-prize fight campaign to obtain 500,000 signatures to a petition initiating a measure calling for the amendment of existing laws and the enactment of new statutes which will prohibit prize fighting in California. Rev. E. Guy Talbott is in charge of the campaign.

Reorganize Charities—The associated charities of Los Angeles have been subjected to a thorough investigation and reorganization by the municipal commission. Prominent club women of the city have been asked to serve on a commission which will administer the funds in the future. Mrs. Eugene Overton is chairman.

Bethlehem Institute Becomes Congregational—Bethlehem Institute, which was founded by Rev. Dana W. Bartlett twenty-two years ago and conducted under his management during the whole period of its existence, has been turned over to the Congregational Church Extension Society. The property is valued at $20,000 and will continue to be operated for charitable, philanthropic and social purposes.

M. E. Church to Move—The congregation of the First M. E. church has authorized the purchase of a site for a new building. The new location is at the corner of Eighth and Olive streets and cost $340,000. The present structure was erected twelve years ago. At that time is was supposed to be beyond the reach of business development. The church is now surrounded by skyscrapers.

To Inspire Country Boys and Girls

Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert Colgate of Rutgers church, New York City, have been the principal contributors to the erection of a building for young men's and young women's Christian associations, which was dedicated Sept. 21, in East Jewett, a country hamlet of half a hundred people in the heart of the Catskill mountains, five miles from Tannersville, N. Y. Mr. and Mrs. Colgate have their summer home in the neighborhood of East Jewett, and have long been depressed with the very evident monotony of life for the country boys and girls of this mountain region. To bring them new inspirations is the object of the Green County Christian Association, supported by them and some of their summer neighbors. Besides the East Jewett building, the association has bought and fitted up for similar purposes an old schoolhouse in Tannersville. Mr. Colgate is a widely known manufacturer of soaps and perfumes.

REVIVED

Old-Time Health, Eating Grape-Nuts

"I had been sick for ten years with dyspepsia and a lot of complications," wrote an Arkansas woman.

"An operation was advised, change of climate was suggested, but no one seemed to know just what was the matter. I was in bed three days in the week and got so thin I weighed only 89 pounds. No food seemed to agree with me.

"I told my husband I was going to try some kind of predigested food to see if I could keep from this feeling of continued hunger.

"Grape-Nuts and cream was the food I got and nothing has seemed to satisfy me like it. I never feel hungry, but have a natural appetite. Have had no nervous spells since I began this food, and have taken no medicine.

"I have gained so much strength that I now do all my housework and feel well and strong. My weight has increased eight pounds in eight weeks and I shall always eat Grape-Nuts, as it is far pleasanter than taking medicines." Name given by Postum Company, Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true and full of human interest.

RALLY WEEK SPECIALLY OBSERVED

Men Hold Dinners at Commencement of Renewed Activities—Report of Vacation Schools Given Presbytery.

MILWAUKEE—Rally Day and Rally Week were observed by a majority of the churches. In Perseverance church the week beginning Sept. 14 was chosen and an elaborate program was carried out. A most successful feature was the Men's League banquet Sept. 18. The general subject was "A Man's Equipment," and talks were as follows: "His Spectacles," by Rev. C. E. Bovard, Waukesha; "His Overalls," Rev. R. S. Donaldson, the pastor; "His Boiled Shirt," Dr. C. H. Beale of Grand Avenue Congregational church. One hundred men were present.—Berean church, Rev. Samuel P. Todd pastor, selected the week beginning Sept. 28, and each day or night was given over to some department. The second annual men's banquet on Friday night was a decided success, over 100 being in attendance. Rev. W. W. Perry was toastmaster, and one of the speakers was Winfred C. Zabel, who when he was district attorney made successful warfare against commercialized vice.

Presbytery Meets at Somers—Milwaukee Presbytery convened in the newly decorated church at Somers. Frank Nathan of McCormick Seminary supplies this congregation and has been active in securing funds for the improvements. Paul E. Hinkamp, a senior in McCormick, passed a splendid examination and was licensed. Mr. Hinkamp, who was superintendent of the daily vacation Bible schools in Milwaukee last summer, gave an interesting account of that work.

Mr. Idsinga Dies Suddenly—Rev. Bernardus H. Idsinga, who had been in attendance on presbytery, died very suddenly at his home in Cedar Grove. He was a faithful minister, having been retired some years ago. He had held pastorates at Alto, Holland, Milwaukee and Sheboygan in this presbytery.

Other Ministerial Items—The Wycliffe Club, composed of ministers holding the Reformed faith, in Milwaukee and vicinity, was entertained the evening of Sept. 22 at the home of Dr. I. D. Mishoff. The new officers are Rev. W. J. Buchanan, pastor of United Presbyterian church, West Allis, president; Rev. H. C. Nott, vice president; Rev. C. C. Hamilton, secretary and treasurer.—Sept. 20 Rev. Sipko F. Rederus, formerly of Farley, Iowa, was installed pastor of Holland church. Dr. J. W. F. Roth, Rev. L. H. Benes and Rev. R. S. Donaldson took part.

DAMAGED CHURCH TO BE READY SOON

Loss by Waters in Spring Flood Has Been Repaired—Plan to Change River Channel at Columbus.

COLUMBUS — The congregation of West Broad Street church, Rev. W. A. Perrins pastor, has worshiped throughout the summer in the West Side high school building. The church building, which was severely damaged by the flood, has been remodeled and enlarged, and will probably be ready for occupancy about Nov. 1. The experts employed by the city to outline and recommend plans for protection against future floods have presented a series of plans. The plan recommended by the United States army engineers provides for the cutting of an entire new channel 800 feet wide, and the abandonment and filling in of the present channel, which may then be used for a public park. The proposed improvement, it is estimated, would cost at least $11,000,000. The matter is now before council and may be submitted to a vote of the people in November.

University Attendance Breaks Records — The opening of Ohio State University brings an attendance that breaks all records. It is estimated that the total will approach 4,500. Previous to the opening Rev. William Houston, university pastor, had received the names of more than 250 Presbyterians who would enter the freshman class.

New Church Progressing—The new church building being erected by Northminster congregation not far from the present location is making good progress and it is hoped to have the building inclosed before winter weather arrives.

Revival in Summer—A successful tent meeting was conducted through the month of August by Rev. R. M. Gordon of St. Clair Avenue church the tent being located on the lawn adjoining th church. Since the close of the services a larg number of members have been received.

Pears'

Don't simply "get a cake of soap." Get good soap. Ask for Pears' and you have pure soap. Then bathing will mean more than mere cleanliness; it will be luxury at trifling cost.

SUNDAY SCHOOL ARMY PARADES

Convention Attracts 100,000 Scholars to Philadelphia Streets—Church Eighty Years Old Has Its Third Pastor.

PHILADELPHIA—The county Sunday school association held its convention, which was attended with unusual interest, on Oct. 2 and 3. It was presided over by its president, William H. Scott, and an account of the world's convention at Zurich was given by Dr. Alexander Henry, secretary of the Board of Publication. Rev. W. B. Wallace of Brooklyn spoke on "The Sunday School and the Downtown Population." Much attention was given to the teaching of social purity and sex hygiene in the Sunday school class room. Nearly 100,000 Sunday school members paraded the city on Saturday with bands and were addressed by prominent officials.

New Pastor of Historic Church—First Church of the Covenanters had but two pastors in its eighty years of existence. The last pastor, Dr. T. P. Stevenson, who died during the past year, ministered to it for almost fifty years. Its third pastor, Rev. McLeod Pearce, formerly of St. Louis, was installed Oct. 3 in the presence of a large congregation. Dr. J. C. McFeeters and Rev. Findley M. Wilson were in charge. The church was especially distinguished in its earlier years for its labors in the temperance and antislavery movements. Its edifice on Cherry street was the only one in the city that could be obtained for the lectures of George Thompson, who came from England to plead for the abolition of American slavery.

Germantown Items—Members of the adult Bible class of Market Square church, Germantown, together with many members of the congregation, were hosts at a reception recently given the pastor, Rev. H. McAfee Robinson, who has been with the church since April last.—The elders' association of Philadelphia North Presbytery met in Germantown First church, Dr. W. B. Jennings pastor, the evening of Oct. 6 and after being entertained at luncheon by the ladies of the church was addressed by Thomas R. Marshall, vice president of the United States.

Elder Dies; Bequests of Dr. Hutton—J. Layton Register, an elder in Second church, former president of the Presbyterial Social Union and prominent for many years in the life insurance business of the city, died suddenly of heart disease Sept. 29, aged 71. Funeral services were held in Second church.—Dr. William Hutton left bequests to Greenwich Street church, Presbyterian Orphanage, Boards of Home and Foreign Missions, Education and Ministerial Relief and the Presbyterian and Oncologic hospitals.

Coming Events—A normal class for the study of "The New America" is held on Wednesday at 3 p. m. under the leadership of Miss Mary C. Babcock at 221 Witherspoon building, to which all women are invited.—Sir William M. Ramsay, the biblical scholar and scientist, is announced to speak in Bryn Mawr church Sunday morning, Oct. 12. Lady Ramsay will give an illustrated address in the same church on the evening of Thursday, Oct. 15.

Dr. Howard Dies—Much sympathy has been felt for Mr. Philip E. Howard of the Sunday School Times and an elder in the Swarthmore church, in the death of his useful and honored father, Dr. Howard.

Boy Scouts as Citizen Police—Director Porter of the bureau of public safety has under advisement the appointment of boy scouts as citizen police whose duties will be to guard and warn other boys and thus save them from violating the law.

TWO NEW JERSEY CHURCHES MERGE

One of the strongest congregations in the denomination will be created in Montclair by the merging of First and Trinity churches. At simultaneous parish meetings Sept. 29 the congregations both voted with what was, at the end, practically unanimity, to accept the report of a joint committee which had been negotiating for the union—really the reunion—of the two organizations. The combined congregation will be known as Central church.

First church was founded in the thirties as an offshoot of First church, Bloomfield. About twenty-six years ago an internal difference over congregational policy led to the secession of a group who organized Trinity. Soon after its organization it called to the pastorate Dr. Orville Reed, under whose ministry for a quarter of a century the church grew handsomely.

The resignation of Dr. Reed at midsummer to enter the service of the Foreign Board awakened discussion of the wisdom of bringing together again the two congregations. In order to facilitate this movement. Dr. Llewellyn S. Fulmer, who has been twelve years pastor of First church, put his resignation at the disposal of his people.

First church property, which has become highly valuable for business purposes, will be sold and the proceeds invested in a commodious new building on the Trinity site.

DEDICATE CHURCH FOR STUDENTS

Presbyterians from all parts of the state gathered Oct. 5 at State College, Pa., to participate in the dedication of the new church which has been erected after three years of joint effort on the part of the Board of Education and the Pennsylvania Synod. The building is especially adapted to the needs of the students and was erected at a cost of $55,000. There are 500 Presbyterian students at the college, a larger proportion to the total registration of 2,000 than at any other state institution. President Edwin E. Sparks and Professor John A. Hamilton have been earnest advocates of this special work, as has been the pastor of the church, Rev. Samuel Martin. Among a number of special gifts an endowment fund has been started by James L. Wilson of Philadelphia, who made the first contribution of $1,000. It is hoped the fund will reach $100,000. Dr. Joseph W. Cochran of the Board of Education preached the dedicatory sermon. Dr. R. E. Daubenspeck, moderator of synod, preached in the evening. Special exercises were held during the following week.

Cradle Roll Has Parade

A very large and interesting convention of the Sunday schools of Chester county, Pa., was held recently in Downingtown. The cradle roll parade numbered 200 children. All sections of the county, which enrolls 32,650 in Sunday schools, were represented. Among the influential ones present were Charles L. Huston and William H. Ridgway of Coatesville, John H. Cole of Mendenhall, Dr. W. R. Loud and John H. Thorp of West Chester and Dr. Mahy of Philadelphia. An evening address on "Our Incomparable Text Book" was by Dr. Kerr Boyce Tupper of Philadelphia. West Chester will have an organized adult Bible class parade during November.

PUPILS BRING GIFTS ON RALLY DAY

ST. LOUIS—Rally Day was observed at Tyler Place Sunday school by members bringing money, fruits and vegetables as gifts to be later conveyed to Bethesda Home. A special program was given. Bethesda Home is a faith institution, undenominational, with nursery, hospital and a home for elderly ladies.

Dedicate Home Heights Church—Home Heights church was organized three years ago, and the last Sunday in September dedicated its new church building. Doctors W. J. McKittrick, S. J. Niccolls, J. L. Roemer and B. P. Fullerton were present and took part in the dedication. Rev. H. M. Gilbert has been pastor two years.—Rev. Edward Wright, who has been supply at Kirkwood church for some months, delivered the Rally Day address at Markham church Sept. 28. Dr. McKittrick of First church spoke to the Sunday school in the afternoon.

REFORMED CHURCH HAS ANNIVERSARY

The celebration of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Reformed Church in Lancaster, Pa., Sept. 23-30 was a great jubilee event and was largely attended by the denomination and prominent representatives from other churches. Among the latter were Dr. Robert E. Speer, J. Campbell White, Doctors John Fox, Edward Lincoln Smith, William I. Chamberlain, Bishop Moench and J. M. Moore. Vital problems in missions were discussed. The president of the board, Dr. James I. Good, presided at the exercises.

What sort of voters are we making?

Hundreds of thousands of young men become able this fall to participate for the first time in various local elections. Thousands of men born in other lands will also be declared eligible to vote. These electors who have not lived long in this country—

Where do they get their ideas of government?

Plenty of people are ready to exploit for their own advantage the 167,000 immigrants who reached this country during the month of July alone. The agencies ready to lend them a helping hand can be counted easily. Little or no organized effort is made to influence these newcomers with Christian ideals of living after they leave the port cities. They disperse to small quarters in the city's congested regions or to the frontiers of the rural districts. They learn from their fellow countrymen what is expected of American citizenship.

Dubuque German College and Seminary is training men of a score of nations to work among their fellows for their moral well being. This work has enlisted the interest and approval of Presbyterians throughout America

We covet the opportunity to tell you more of it. Will you write us that you are interested? A postal will do.

Address Dubuque German College
and Seminary, Dr. C. M. Steffens,
President, :: Dubuque, Iowa.

OLIVET IS QUARTER CENTURY OLD

Institutional Church Will Observe Anniversary—Italian Men Form Brotherhood with Practical Committees—Men's Luncheon Oct. 14.

CHICAGO—The twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of Olivet Institute will be celebrated Oct. 30 to Nov. 2. According to preliminary plans there will be special meetings for former members of the parish, for the community, and for presbytery. Nov. 2 a historical address will be given by Rev. N. B. Barr. Olivet is now taking a social survey of its parish, which includes about 25,000. It is hoped in the near future to establish an adequate plant for the work of the institution and information now being gathered will be used in determining the new location.

Writes Church History—A history of First church, including the amalgamation with Forty-First Street church, has been written by Philo A. Otis, for many years choirmaster of the old First church. The book includes a history of church music in Chicago.

Various Meetings — Sir William Ramsay gave two addresses at McCormick Seminary the first part of this week—Dr. Robert J. Patterson of Ireland opened the season of the Sunday Evening Club last Sunday and spoke to an audience which packed Orchestra hall.—Rev. W. E. Parker, Jr., at the executive meeting of the C. E. union Tuesday told the officers how prayer broke up high school fraternities in San Francisco.

Miscellaneous News—The enrollment of McCormick Seminary is 171. It was 159 last year at the end of three months.—The various departments of the Y. M. C. A. of this city have given $800 towards rehabilitation of the flooded associations in Ohio.—Boy Scouts of Chicago have been enlisted in the campaign for safety on streets.—Dr. F. C. Wishart of Pittsburg Seminary will speak at McCormick Seminary Friday evening and at Orchestra hall Sunday evening.

New Chicago Heights Church Which Was Dedicated Free of Debt Despite Many Obstacles

Invite U. P. Men Too—Adherents of the U. P. denomination in Chicago have been invited by the Chicago brotherhood to join the Presbyterian men in the luncheon to be held Oct. 14 and each Tuesday noon this fall in a private dining room at Carson Pirie Scott and Company's building. Notices of the coming luncheons, at which Dr. C. B. McAfee will be the speaker, have been sent to all the men whose names were available.

Italian Men Organize—The men of the Church of Our Savior at Chicago Heights have formed a brotherhood under the leadership of Rev. Eugene De Luca. Committees on ushering, invitation and finance, to assist the trustees, were formed, following an address through an interpreter by Dr. F. M. Fox.

See Views of Former Days—At a home coming dinner of First church, Austin, Dr. R. H. Beattie pastor, on Sept. 26, views were shown by Hubert Oram of the early days in Austin. The dinner was given by the men's department of the church and served by the Westminster Guild.

Still After Dr. Cadman—Second church has renewed its call of last spring for Dr. S. Parkes Cadman of Brooklyn. He has said he would not leave his work in the East. It is intimated that a salary of $14,000 has been offered him.

Report on Brotherhood—Dr. W. C. Covert reported to presbytery last Monday at Austin some of the work of the Chicago brotherhood. This is the first report on the local work since it has become part of presbytery's activities.

Celebrate Twentieth Anniversary — Endeavor church will celebrate its twentieth anniversary Oct. 12. Rev. William E. Parker, Jr., and Dr. Cleland B. McAfee will preach morning and evening. Others who will participate in the services of the day are Doctors A. C. Zenos, E. N. Ware and Moderator F. L. Selden.

Finds Chicagoans in Many Places—Dr. O. M. Caward of Normal Park had an unusual vacation experience this year, going first to the Atlantic coast and afterwards reaching Los Angeles, San Francisco, Yellowstone Park, the northwestern cities and the Canadian Rockies in his tour. Almost everywhere in the West he found other Chicago Presbyterians enjoying a holiday on the lines of The Continent's "All Around America" series.

Plan to Get Volunteers—The 115 employed officers of the Y. M. C. A. in this city who meet each month to confer on best methods of work this winter will consider plans to enlist volunteer workers in association activities.

Ninth Church Draws Many—The home-coming dinner of Ninth church recently attracted a large attendance. One of the speakers was Herbert Whitlock, a missionary to India who grew up in the Sunday school of Ninth church. Doctors Frothingham and Hill and Rev. F. T. Barry, former pastors, also spoke.

Celebrate Twenty-Fifth Birthday—Grace church observed its quarter century last Sunday. The pastor, Dr. M. H. Jackson, has been with the congregation from the start. Doctors Covert and Hill took part in the services. Gifts of $6,400 were announced for a fund for a new building.

Churches Plan Additions—Work will begin soon on the $80,000 addition to First church. This extension will provide space for the prayer meeting chapel, gymnasium, recreation room for young boys, parlors and Sunday school rooms.—Evanston First church has purchased two lots next to the church with the expectation that within a year plans will be made for a Sunday school building or parish house.—South Park church has decided that it needs a gymnasium and rooms will be rented for such purposes until an addition is built to the church.

SPEND WEEK ON SCHOOL METHODS

Campaign for Efficiency in Portland Opened with Dinner with Large Representation—Difficulties of Each School Considered.

PORTLAND—The week of campaign in the interest of Sunday school efficiency was started in a very successful way. Sept. 21 nearly every one of the twenty Presbyterian Sunday schools was visited by a field worker, and in a brief address, publicity was given to the meetings in the various churches during the week. In addition, each school was made to feel that it belonged to a larger body that was aiming to do the things it was asked to do.

On Monday night a superintendents' and pastors' supper and conference was held in Calvary church which was remarkably well attended and extremely interesting and helpful. Every church but the newly organized Chinese church was represented by either pastor or superintendent, or, as in most cases, by both. "Building Up the Sunday School" was discussed by James F. Ewing, superintendent of First church school. He dwelt especially on the pastor's enthusiasm and its effect in creating enthusiasm in the officers and teachers, and also on catching those who through family or friendship ties are likely to be interested in a particular school.

Dr. H. N. Mount of Vernon church spoke on "Evangelism in the Sunday School." The importance of the pastor's personal responsibility and the value of his personal influence in bringing the pupils into the church were strongly emphasized. J. V. Milligan, D. D., synodical superintendent of Sunday school work, followed this with some remarks upon the "General Services of the School." C. W. Hays, presbyterial Sunday school missionary, spoke briefly on "Denominational and Interdenominational Responsibilities." Rev. A. M. Williams, educational superintendent for the district, to whom the idea and the success of the whole week are largely due, closed with a talk on "Planning Your Work and Working Your Plan." Each night for a week field workers visited one school and held a conference to plan for the best things for that particular school.

SPOKANE WANTS WHITWORTH COLLEGE

A definite understanding has been reached between Whitworth College, the synodical institution of Washington, and Spokane by the terms of which Whitworth is almost certain to be removed next year from Tacoma to a new location in Spokane's suburbs. The consummation of this plan depends only upon the subscription of $100,000 by citizens of Spokane. To raise this a local committee of nearly thirty strong business men has been formed, and Associate Secretary French of the Board of Colleges is on his way to Spokane to assist.

A local land company which is developing a new suburban addition offers forty acres for the college campus and an additional eighty acres, which are to be sold by the college for building lots. The company also binds itself to devote to the college 45 per cent of receipts from the sale of the remaining 560 acres in the tract.

Dr. Aquilla Webb of Warren Memorial church, Louisville, Ky., has returned to his pulpit after an absence of six months. A stone thrown at a moving train resulted in a paralyzation of the right side of his head. It was feared the accident would result in a permanent loss of sight, but the doctor expects that his sight will soon be normal.

WILL TEACH SUNDAY SCHOOL METHODS

Columbia University Joins with Association in Offering Thirty Lectures—Workers with Boys Confer in Brooklyn.

NEW YORK—The New York Sunday School Association has begun a special course of instruction for Sunday school workers, held in Columbia University every Monday evening at 8 o'clock. The course will consist of thirty lectures, six by each of the following well known Bible teachers: Dr. George Drayton Strayer of Columbia, Dr. Raymond C. Knox, chaplain of Columbia, Dr. George Albert Coe, Union Theological Seminary. Dr. A. F. Schauffler, chairman of the international lesson committee, and Dr. Lewis B. Paton of Hartford Theological Seminary. The lectures deal with the principles of teaching, introduction to Bible study, child study for Sunday school workers, Sunday school organization, and the history of civilization in ancient Palestine. A modest registration fee is required. Applications must be made to Herbert L. Hill, Room 218 Metropolitan Tower, Manhattan.—As has been his custom for a number of years, Dr. A. F. Schauffler has begun teaching the international lessons at Madison Avenue Reformed church every Saturday at 3 o'clock.

Celebrates Fifth Anniversary—The Home Street church, in the Bronx, celebrated its fifth anniversary Oct. 6. The pastor, Rev. H. S. Randall, preached an anniversary sermon in the morning, and Dr. Jesse F. Forbes, stated clerk of presbytery, spoke in the evening.

Coming Meetings—The Morning Watch Movement will hold on Nov. 17 an all-day conference on prayer in Brick church. The president of the organization is William Phillips Hall.—An interdenominational conference for inspiration and Bible study will be held Oct. 10, morning, afternoon and evening, in Gravesend Reformed church. The Presbyterians to address the conference are Dr. Joseph Dunn Burrell, Dr. Albertson and Rev. Andrew Magill.

Confer on Work for Boys—Representatives from the Y. M. C. A., Brooklyn Sunday School Union, Kings County Sunday School Association, Boys' Brigades, Boy Scouts and the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, have arranged for an all-Brooklyn "Conference of Older Boys" Oct. 17 to 19. The theme of this gathering is "The Call to Service." Among those on the program are Dr. A. W. Beavan of Rochester, Raymond D. Hitchcock of Manhattan, Dr. George J. Fisher of Brooklyn and T. A. D. Jones, one-time Yale quarterback.

Dr. Halsey Back; Dr. Crafts to Speak—Dr. A. Woodruff Halsey of the Foreign Board, who was compelled by an accident to his knee to give up work early in the summer, is back at his desk.—Next Monday, Oct. 13, Dr. Wilbur Crafts of Washington will speak before the ministers' association on "Uplifting and Degenerative Forces in Europe as Related to Immigration Problems." On Oct. 20 J. Campbell White will discuss "The Present World's Mission Situation."

Two Presbyteries Meet—At the first fall meeting of Brooklyn Presbytery there was much discussion over the work of General Assembly's new committee on vacancy and supply. No action was taken. The report of the evangelistic committee of the presbytery received applause, and the suggestion was made that every church in the presbytery should cooperate in the committee's work. A minute in tribute to the late treasurer of the presbytery, Henry E. Ide, was adopted.—New York Presbytery met Oct. 6 in the chapel of First church. Reports were received from the home mission committee and the committee on systemmatic beneficence. A committee upon the joint conference with the Classis of New York was named.

Mr. Mott Hesitates to Accept.—Many Christian leaders from New York were in attendance recently for the annual meeting of the Internationa Committee of Y. M. C. A.'s at Atlantic City. The sessions lasted for four days, crowded to the utmost limit. It had been expected that John R Mott would indicate whether or not he would accept the position of general secretary of the committee. Mr. Mott asked for further time.

News of the Metropolis—A series of six Sunday afternoon addresses has been begun by Dr. Samuel C. Schmucker of the Pennsylvania State Normal at Westchester, Pa., at Labor Temple.—The Women's National Sabbath Alliance held its first public meeting of the season in Brick church Sept 29. The alliance has long supported a work among immigrants, printing a message to the incoming stranger in seven languages.—From Oct 12 to Nov. 2 the pulpit of Rutgers church will b occupied by Dr. Patrick Playfair of Scotland. Dr. Playfair is pastor of St. Andrew's Parish church where John Knox preached his first sermon.

Plymouth Church Damaged by Fire—Plymouth church, Brooklyn, famous because of its long association with the name of Henry Ward Beecher came near being burned Oct. 3. Fortunately onl the Sunday school room was damaged. Repair will cost $15,000.

HOLD MEMORIAL SERVICES FOR THREE

Cleveland Presbyterians Honor the Memory of L. H. Severance, Dr. H. C. Haydn and Mrs. Flora Stone Mather.

CLEVELAND—Three memorial services of great nterest to local Presbyterians were recently held. Sunday morning, Sept. 28, in Woodland Avenue hurch there was a service in memory of the late Elder Louis H. Severance. The pastor, Dr. Edward A. Krapp, presided. Rev. W. P. Thomas and Presdent C. M. Steffens of Dubuque German College nd Seminary participated in the devotional serice. Short addresses were delivered by Elder J. T. Sensabaugh, Dr. J. D. Williamson, President Charles F. Twing of Western Reserve University, President Henry C. King of Oberlin College, Presdent Louis E. Holden of Wooster University, and Dr. Stanley White of the Foreign Board. That vening the service in memory of the late Dr. Hiram C. Haydn was held in Old Stone church. Several local pastors spoke. The men thus honored were for many years fellow workers and inpirers of each other to religious and philanthropic nterprises. Sept. 30 there was a formal dedicaion of the Mather memorial in the quadrangle of he College for Women. This elegant college strucure was the gift of Samuel Mather in memory of his wife, the late Mrs. Flora Stone Mather, many years a member of Old Stone church. The nfluence of Dr. Haydn, Elder L. H. Severance and Mrs. Samuel Mather formed a threefold cord of exraordinary binding power in the presbytery.

Presbytery Meets in Akron—The meeting of presbytery in the new edifice of Central church, Akron, Rev. D. R. Reese pastor, was the first for a long ime held outside of Cleveland.

ARTHUR C. LUDLOW.

EVANGELISTIC ACTIVITIES

Stereopticon Shows Songs—In lieu of singing books the large crowd which gathered this summer at the evangelistic union service in Wilkinsburg, Pa., was furnished the words of hymns by the stereopticon. A solo illustrated by moving picures was also given each evening.

Meetings at Beaver Dam, Wis.—Rev. Elmer P. Loose begins a series of evangelistic meetings at Beaver Dam, Wis., Oct. 19 to continue three weeks. These meetings are to be held in the armory.

FOUR LEADERS TO PROMOTE CANVASS

At a recent meeting of the joint executive committee four campaign organizers were appointed o take charge of the development of the united missionary campaign in Presbyterian churches hroughout the country. These are David McConaughy of New York, John B. Hill of Kansas City, A. F. McGarrah of St. Louis and Moses Breeze of Cambridge, Wis. Mr. McConaughy and Dr. Hill are to have their headquarters in New York and will be responsible for the direction of the campaign in the eastern synods. Mr. McGarrah will work in the middle west and southwest, and Mr. Breeze will go to the northwest and the Pacific coast. The men chosen are all already under salary for mission service. The principal aim of their work will be to set afoot an every-member campaign for missionary and benevolent subscriptions in each Presbyterian congregation.

HAS LARGE FUND FOR ORPHANS' HOME

Seattle Presbyterians Have Large Opportunity—Central Church Formed by Two Small Organizations—Eight Branches from First Church.

SEATTLE—Upon the death of the late David R. McKinley, an estate of $500,000 was left to be placed in the care of the deacons of Westminster church for the building of an orphan asylum and for its maintenance. At the same time $5,000 was left for a manse for Westminster and made available at once. The Kenny Presbyterian Home of Seattle gives Presbyterianism an opportunity to make itself felt in a social service way in this city which will be augmented by the McKinley Orphans' Home when established. The Kenny home has a building costing $90,000 and an endowment large enough to maintain at present forty inmates with a capacity when completed of twenty more. The home is for the aged only and there is no charge for admittance. A location has just been chosen on the grounds for a chapel under the auspices of First church and in addition to services for the old people, mission work will be done in the neighborhood.

Two Missions Form Church—Lake Union church and Wallingford mission of First church were united in the organization of Central church Sept. 14 with a membership of 120. A full force of elders, deacons and trustees was elected and Rev. Robert Asa Smith chosen pastor. Half of the members came from Lake Union church and half from Wallingford. This is the eighth church growing out of First church and now doing vigorous work in the city. Another Greenwood Park mission is soon to be organized into an independent church.

HOLD MEMORIAL FOR FORMER LEADER

CINCINNATI—"The Value of a Life" will be the general theme of the memorial service for E. F. Evans, which the union of the Presbyterian Brotherhood has arranged to take place as a tribute to their late president. The service occurs in the home church of the dead leader at Norwood. Robert P. Hargitt will preside and the speakers include Dr. B. F. Lyle, L. H. Blakemore, Dr. Edward Mack, Duke P. Davis, Dr. Donald G. Grant, Rev. Horace E. Orr, Rev. George W. Shields and C. Edgar Wilson. This will be the inaugural of brotherhood activities—a consecration service in memory of a man who loved and followed "the Man of Galilee."

THE BEST NEWS FROM EACH STATE

Pool Rooms Close on Sunday—Partly through the effort of the pastor of Sturgis, S. D., church, Rev. Carrol D. Erskine, the poolrooms and moving picture theaters have been ordered closed on Sunday by the mayor. Pressure was brought to bear through the attorney general. This is one of the results of the fight for decency which the church people have been making.

Educates Church Members—The congregation of First church, Dexter, Mo., previous to meeting instructed its representatives to vote in favor of union with the Reformed Church. Rev. Oswold Helsing, pastor, believes that members can be educated in the larger affairs of the church by bringing such matters before them. This church recently adopted the budget system.

Aid Weak Churches—The Presbyterian churches of Sioux City, Iowa, some time ago formed a Presbyterian alliance to promote the interests of Presbyterianism in the city. The first year the alliance aided in supporting a choir leader for a mission church and in establishing a flourishing Sabbath school. This year the alliance is aiding the most recently established church and the Sabbath school in building up these fields.

Religious Leaders to Speak—An effort on the part of Rev. George E. Barnes, pastor of First church, Battle Creek, Mich., to permit his people to hear the foremost religious leaders of the day has resulted in promises to speak in Battle Creek this fall from Dr. John Timothy Stone, Dr. Charles M. Sheldon, Professor Graham Taylor and Professor Shailer Mathews. Effort is also being made to have Robert E. Speer, Dr. Charles W. Gordon and Miss Jane Addams during the winter.

Will Instruct Young People—The Sabbath school and the young people's committee of Ewing Presbytery are planning to hold four institutes in convenient places in presbytery. The work will be in charge of the chairman of each committee, assisted by Sunday School Missionary Ernest A. Smith of Alton, Ill. At one of the evening sessions they propose giving a stereopticon lecture on Sabbath school missions and having an address on "The Presbyterian Church in History."

Big Bible Class Starts—At Everett, Wash., Oct. 6 the largest organized Bible class on the Pacific coast reopened. It has an enrollment above 600 and meets in the First church. The class is throughly organized, having twenty-seven officers. The leader, Franklin T. Conner, has a pastorate in Seattle and comes via interurban car every Monday night to meet the class. In addition he will have a second class at Madrona church, Seattle, on Wednesday nights. A. N. Thompson, D. D., is pastor.

Hold Services During Winter Too—The summer work of the Adirondack mission, of which Rev. Benjamin B. Knapp is minister and superintendent, has come to a conclusion. Throughout the winter services will continue in the church at Old Forge and in the chapels at Inlet and Fulton Chain. During the past summer Fletcher A. Clark's Sunday morning church boat, running from the foot of Fourth lake to Old Forge, has been a constant reminder of the opportunities for religious worship which summer dwellers in the region may enjoy if they will. Mr. Knapp is the only Protestant minister and his work the only Protestant work in all the region.

SYNOD TO MEET WITH COLLEGE

KANSAS—Emporia College, Henry Coe Culbertson, D. D., president, has opened with the largest enrollment in its history. The girls' dormitory is used for the first time. A new heating plant will be built at once. At the meeting of synod to be held in Emporia in October a vigorous effort will be made to bring a large number of laymen together as guests of the college. First church, under the leadership of W. C. Templeton, D. D., is cooperating heartily with the college in caring for the spiritual interests of the students. A personal workers' campaign will be the main feature of the work of the church during the fall.

Tent Meetings Successful—During August Arundel Avenue church, Emporia, conducted tent meetings at which there were a large number of conversions. The pastor, Rev. S. H. Maxwell, was assisted by Rev. J. C. Beitel. It is in this church that half the membership is composed of children. They contribute as regularly to the church as their elders.—The young people of Independence, Kan., church entertained the county high school recently. There were over 350 boys and girls present under 21 years and over 15 years of age.

RECENT WISCONSIN HAPPENINGS

WISCONSIN—Rev. W. A. Cutler, for many years stated clerk of Milwaukee Presbytery, has been appointed as chaplain of the Soldiers' Home in Milwaukee.

Will Miss Dr. Bigler—First church, Racine, sustains a great loss in the removal of its pastor, B. B. Bigler, D. D., to St. Augustine, Fla. Dr. Bigler has done a large work in Racine and Madison and his many friends regret his going from Wisconsin, but hope that his health will be strengthened in a milder climate.

Plan for Sunday School Convention—The annual meeting of the Wisconsin Sunday school association will be held in Sheboygan Nov. 11-14. An interesting program of addresses, discussions and studies is planned and a large attendance is assured.—The new parsonage at Menomonie will be completed about the first of the year. It probably will cost $4,500.

FLOODED CHURCH TO BE REOPENED

During the tremendous floods of last spring, among the churches which suffered heavily was Westminster, Hamilton, Ohio. The building was completely gutted. Organ, pews, pulpit furniture, and floor were so badly damaged that the condition may be described at a total wreck, save for the walls, which were left standing. The pastor, Rev. Harry G. Finney, lost almost all his possessions. After strenuous endeavor on the part of the pastor and helpers the church is to be opened and rededicated Oct. 2. Moderator of synod, Edward T. Swiggett, D. D., has been invited to preach the sermon. Other exercises appropriate to the day will be on the program. Notwithstanding the calamity which befell this church it received 126 members on confession during last year and forty-nine members on certificate. To crown all it now opens its doors without passing the hat around among all the other churches of synod.

MEMORIAL TABLETS AND WINDOWS

New York—A tablet to the memory of the late Dr. James H. Taylor, pastor of First church, Rome, was dedicated in that church Sept. 21. The sermon was by the pastor, Dr. Philip H. Cole.

New Jersey-Maryland—Two tablets to the memory of Rev. Samuel McLanahan have recently been placed by his wife. One is in Lafayette Square church, Baltimore, the other in the church of Lawrenceville, N. J., in both of which churches he was pastor.

Pennsylvania—A tablet of Carrara marble made in Florence, Italy, and placed on the wall of First church, Pittston, as a memorial to Nathan Grier Parke, D. D., the founder and for fifty-nine years pastor, was unveiled Sunday morning, Sept. 28, by Nathan Grier Parke, Jr., of Scranton, Pa., a grandson of Dr. Parke. The presentation address was by a son, S. M. Parke, Jr. The sermon was preached by Rev. W. J. Day of Luzerne, Pa. The present pastor is Rev. R. A. Rinker.—Three handsome memorial windows, the gift of T. Edward Ross in memory of his father and mother, were recently dedicated in Ardmore church, Rev. E. G. Rawson pastor.

IN HOME MISSION FIELDS

School Grows Into Church—A two-year-old Sunday school at Pleasant Valley, Mont., established by a missionary in front of a little cabin to which the settlers had been invited, was organized as a church recently. Rev. A. B. Minameyer, pastor at large, perfected the organization. The church has twelve charter members.

Students Are Missed — Reserve Presbytery has authorized the organization of two more churches in communities otherwise destitute of preaching. Now that the students who supplied small and widely extended fields have returned to the seminaries the destitution is increased.

Students Work in Wyoming—Reliance, Gunn and Lion: Student G. Walter Lawrence of McCormick Seminary spent his vacation on this field, doing good work, leaving many strong friends. L. E. Saidla followed in the work immediately. Mr. Saidla is a specialist in sociological work, which is much needed among the coal miners.—Centennial and Harmony: Rev. H. E. Brundage spent two months in this field and was immediately followed in the work by T. C. Hackenberg, a graduate of Moody Bible Institute. There are a number of different denominations represented; the hope is to unify all into one strong church.

Dedicate New Church—The rural church near Wilmot, S. D., called Lake and organized only last spring, recently dedicated a $2,000 house of worship free from debt and in the midst of a prosperous farming community. It is grouped with Wilmot and also another rural church all under the care of Rev. M. W. Williams. There is no other public worship near in the English tongue. Rev. C. C. Todd of Aberdeen, the pastor at large, preached the dedicatory sermon.

Consumers Hope New Tariff Bill Will Reduce Cost of Living—Wool to Be on Free List—Bits of Business News.

With the signing of the tariff bill opportunity is afforded for a large amount of speculation as to the actual influence of this new piece of national legislation upon the producers and consumers of the country. The average tax upon imports under the new bill is very much less than it has been for a number of years and the free list has been greatly extended. For example, bacon, ham, fresh meats, prepared and preserved meats and bologna sausages are on the free list now. Under the tariff law which has just been superseded fresh beef, mutton, veal, lamb, pork and all preserved meats were taxed 25 per cent. Coincident with the passing of this bill has been the arrival in the New York market of a large shipment of beef from Argentina, together with a promise of more from that country as well as from Peru via the Panama canal. It is the expectation that this change in the meat prices will lower the cost of living.

Wool will be placed on the free list by Jan. 1. This means, according to many economists, that wool clothing will be lower in price. This is a reasonable argument, but if the difference between future and present prices is to come from the profits of the mill owners the dividend upon stock in the eastern woolen mills will probably suffer a decline. This is another example of the oft recurring illustration of the inherent lack of stability of return possessed by many industrial stocks. An argument for investment in municipal bonds may be found, on the other hand, in another provision of the tariff bill relating to the income tax. Under this new law the interest upon the obligations of the state or any political subdivision thereof is exempted. If the measure has been correctly interpreted this will mean that the tax will not have to be paid by individuals on that portion of their income which comes from municipal securities.

Questions Mean Protection—Bank officials and others who are brought into contact with investors of small sums are constantly impressed with the fact that the hesitancy on the part of possessors of small means to ask questions which will reveal their ignorance has resulted more than once in loss of all the savings. The man or woman who has accumulated $500 or $1,000 from his salary is usually not in touch with places of safe investment. If to such a possible investor comes a friend or the friend of a friend who knows of a new company just being formed which expects very large profits, the temptation is strong to risk the money in the savings bank without troubling bank officials as to their opinion of the stability of the projected company. Very often such an investment results in loss. The Continent is always glad to make careful inquiry and answer either by mail or through this column questions of any sort concerning investments.

Country Has Large Purchasing Power—According to a published statement, the earnings of Sears, Roebuck and Company, Chicago, during September increased 38 per cent. This compares with an increase of less than 1 per cent for the preceding month over last year and probably indicates that the people of moderate resources throughout the country not only have money to spend but have not been deterred by fear of short returns from their harvest from using their current income.

Somebody Will Get an Elephant—An elephant, together with several lions, two tigers and an assortment of monkeys, snakes and other wild animals, was recently left in the hands of the Central Trust Company of Chicago. The animals were called assets by a circus which was forced into bankruptcy after severe competition on the part of the moving picture shows in various cities.

Take Little Federal Money—It is reported that the banks of the Central West have made arrangements to use only $20,000,000 of the $50,000,000 offered by the secretary of the treasury to assist in moving the crop this fall. This is taken to indicate that the banks have been able to finance the matter themselves.

WELL KNOWN WISCONSIN ELDER DIES

Presbyterians of Wisconsin are lamenting with Madison Christ church the death of James E. Moseley, senior elder, who died Sept. 22 at the age of 84. He had been an elder in the Madison church since 1865. He was one of the best known business men in the city and was a leader among the laymen of the state. For many years he was superintendent of the Sunday school and president of the state Sunday school association. He was one of the founders of Monona Lake Assembly. He held important committee places with synod and General Assembly and in 1867 by a single speech swung General Assembly to decide to go next to Madison. For more than twenty years Christ church has had the budget system with weekly offerings due to the foresight of Mr. Moseley.

What the Presbyteries Are Doing

Half of Churches Vacant—Holston Presbytery met with the Philadelphia congregation. Rev. W. A. Crozier was elected moderator. Presbytery voted unanimously in favor of union with the Reformed Church. Candidate George Edward White was licensed to preach. Nearly one-half of the churches on the roll are vacant. Presbytery has lost three ministers by death within six months: Elmer B. Waller, William D. Copp and C. W. Duncan.

Elect New Stated Clerk—Niobrara Presbytery met at Elgin, Neb., and elected Rev. H. A. Brown moderator. J. M. Caldwell, D. D., was replaced on the home mission committee, from which he had been removed last April at the request of Dr. W. H. Kearns. Rev. J. B. Burke was elected stated clerk to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Rev. Francis E. Thompson, concerning whom resolution were adopted.

Receives Two Candidates—Westminster Presbytery at Bellevue church, Gap, Pa., elected Rev. T. G. Baxter moderator; heard J. E. Tuttle, D. D., of York in a plea for the increase of devoted men for the ministry; received Robert L. Clark and J. Barclay Simmons under care as candidates for the ministry; arranged for the organization of a church at Kreutz Creek and also at Brickerville; heard an address by Dr. William H. Foulkes.

Favor Church Union—Mahoning Presbytery met in Ellsworth, Ohio. Addresses were delivered by Dr. James H. Snowden of Pittsburg and by Dr. William H. Hudnut of Youngstown. Presbytery voted in favor of the proposed union with the Reformed Church. The every-member canvass was referred to the executive commission. Resolutions were adopted on the death of Rev. James M. Kelley.

Name Committee on Brotherhood—Binghamton Presbytery met at Marathon and chose John Junkin Francis, D. D., moderator. A permanent committee on brotherhood was created and Rev. Carl W. Scovel, chairman of this committee in synod, was appointed chairman. Union with the Reformed Church was approved, provided the present name of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A. is not changed.

Plan Evangelistic Services—Edgerton entertained Topeka Presbytery. Newton A. Peck of Kansas City Bethel church was received as a candidate for the ministry. Union with the Reformed Church was indorsed. Three "retreats" were arranged for the third Tuesday of November at Kansas City, Topeka and Clay Center. Arrangements were made to insure evangelistic services during the coming months.

May Organize Church for Foreigners—Chemung Presbytery met with South church in Elmira. A committee was appointed to confer with Steuben Presbytery in the matter of the proposed consolidation of the two presbyteries. Rev. Theodore Halenda of Pittsburg addressed presbytery on the work among foreign-tongued people at Elmira Heights, which he had been investigating during his vacation. The proposed organization of a church for these people was placed in the hands of the mission committee.

Meet in New Church—Solomon Presbytery met in the new church at Ellsworth, Kan., which was dedicated on the Sabbath before. Rev. Martin T. Rainier of Manchester was elected moderator. Plans for union with the Reformed Church and also the support of Assembly's committee on vacancy and supply received favorable action. Henry C. Culbertson, D. D., president of Emporia College, addressed presbytery in behalf of the college. Walter M. Irwin, D. D., superintendent of synodical home missions, addressed presbytery on Kansas home missions.

Install New Pastor—Madison Presbytery met at Kilbourn, Wis. An educational conference was the feature of the first session. Rev. O. E. DeWitt was installed as pastor at an evening service. Rev. H. L. Moore, Rev. G. E. Hunt and Rev. E. C. Henke took part. Presbytery realized $300 from the sale of the property at Verona and the money was turned over to the L. C. Smith home mission fund of synod. Presbytery will ask the board for a Sunday school missionary in connection with the presbytery at LaCrosse. Special addresses were given by Rev. R, A. Carnahan, financial secretary for synod, Rev. Gerritt Verkuyl, superintendent of Sunday schools, and Rev. J. R. Muir, missionary to Tibet.

Will Conduct Evangelistic Campaign—Kansas City Presbytery met in Butler, Mo. Plans were perfected under the leadership of the evangelistic committee to conduct an evangelistic campaign practically throughout the presbytery. The conferences on Christian education, Rev. J. N. McGinley presiding, were unusually helpful. Presidents W. H. Black, D. D., of Missouri Valley College and C. B. Boving, D. D., of Westminster College delivered popular addresses. Presbytery passed resolutions commending Dr. Black for his fidelity as president of the college under trying circumstances and felicitating him on the issue of matters affecting property interests. Resolutions commending the Kansas City Star for its temperance agitation were passed. The overture on union with the Reformed Church was affirmed.

Strong Missionary Spirit Present—Sedalia Presbytery met at Gladstone, Mo., and elected Rev. J. D. Prigmore moderator. A splendid missionary spirit prevailed. Presbytery closed with an inspirational address by Rev. J. R. Burchfield.

Release Pastor After Dedication—Alton Presbytery met in Carlinville, Ill. Rev. R. B. Wilson was chosen moderator. The pastoral relation between Rev. James Hickling and Raymond church was dissolved to take effect Nov. 23, after the dedication of a new church now nearing completion. Rev. Charles A. Killie, representing the Foreign Board, and Dr. W. S. P. Bryan of Chicago, moderator of the synod, made addresses. Assembly's question in reference to union with the Reformed Church was answered in the affirmative.

Receive Three Candidates—Columbus Presbytery at Central church, Columbus, elected J. L. Tait, D. D., moderator. There was an earnest discussion on the best method of reaching and enlisting the whole church in the support of missionary and evangelistic work. F. A. Kirker, Floyd H. McCombs and John Berry were received as candidates for the ministry. Presbytery approved union with the Reformed Church. The movement to secure one full day during the Week of Prayer for temperance was indorsed.

Will Stimulate Evangelism—Lima Presbytery met at Van Wert, Ohio, Rev. W. L. Alexander moderator. A conference on "Quickening the Spiritual Life of Our Churches" proved helpful. Otto Hankammer of Van Wert church was received as a candidate for the ministry. A permanent committee on evangelism, with Rev. D. Evans Jones as chairman, was appointed. Presbytery was divided into four sections with a committee of two, a pastor and an elder in each section, to stimulate evangelism in the churches of the group. A brotherhood meeting and banquet was held with 168 men present.

Discuss Every-Member Canvass—Seattle Presbytery met with Brighton church, Seattle, and discussed the every-member canvass. A strong committee was appointed to push the matter. Every field in the presbytery is manned. Miss Ethel Rhoda has for three months acted as assistant Sunday school missionary in Seattle and Central Washington Presbyteries. She is the only woman the Sunday School Board has ever commissioned. Dr. W. O. Forbes, superintendent of home missions in presbytery, has also superintended the synodical Sunday school work for the past year. He reports the synod thoroughly organized during the year and four new missionaries appointed.

Object to Consolidating Work—Bloomington Presbytery met in Heyworth, Ill., and chose Rev. J. D. Murphy moderator. President William M. Hudson, D. D., addressed presbytery in the interests of Blackburn College. Louis A. Boettiger was received under the care of presbytery. Presbytery did not concur in the plan for the consolidation of home missions, church erection and Sabbath school work in the synod. Union with the Reformed Church was approved. The simultaneous every-member canvass was approved and the executive committee authorized to direct the campaign. Stirring addresses were made at the popular meeting by Rev. F. Scott McBride and Rev. S. W. Findley.

Celebrate 175th Anniversary—New Brunswick Presbytery met in First church, New Brunswick, N. J., where the Presbytery had been constituted on Aug. 8, 1738, and where the centennial of the presbytery had been celebrated in August, 1838. Historical addresses were delivered by Rev. George H. Ingram, stated clerk, and by Professor Frederick W. Loetscher of Princeton Seminary. There were greetings from the moderator of synod, Rev. I. Mench Chambers; from the New Jersey Historical Society, Austin Scott, D. D.; from the Presbyterian Historical Society, Joseph Brown Turner, D. D. The following presbyteries were also represented and offered their well wishes: Philadelphia, Robert Hunter, D. D.; New York, Edward Johnston Russell, D. D.; Westchester, Rev. Thomas C. Straus; Lehigh, Rev. William Robinson; Philadelphia North, Rev. Richard Montgomery; Monmouth, James W. Rogan, D. D.,; Newark, William Y. Chapman, D. D.; Elizabeth, Rev. William Parry; West Jersey, Rev. William V. Louderbough; Morris and Orange, Rev. Joseph G. Symmes; Newton, John C. Clyde, D. D. The committee on men's societies was directed to hold an elders' conference in November. An affirmative answer was given the proposition for an assessment for vacancy and supply.

Sermon by a Judge—Oklahoma Presbytery met at Perry. The retiring moderator, George C. Abernathy of Shawnee, judge of the superior court, gave a scientific and exhaustive discussion of "True Christian Development." Rev. Martin J. Millard was elected moderator. Overture on union with the Reformed Church was affirmed. Addresses were made by Rev. J. Herron Miller, Rev. Frank T. Heatly, Rev. L. W. Cunningham. Captain R. T. Jacob of Oklahoma City conducted a brotherhood conference. Phil C. Baird, D. D., of Oklahoma City gave an account of his recent extensive travels in South America.

Favor Vacancy and Supply Committee—Mattoon Presbytery at Lerna, Ill., elected Rev. Campbell L. MacKay moderator and adopted a constitution for Kemmerer Orphans' Home at Assumption, Ill., under the joint management of Mattoon and Springfield Presbyteries. The every-member campaign was indorsed. The appointment for the General Assembly fund was fixed at 13 cents a member, including the request for a half cent for vacancy and supply. Addresses were delivered by Rev. H. W. White, Rev. W. E. Youtsler, Rev. F. Scott McBride, Rev. C. L. MacKay, Rev. R. F. Cressey. Presbytery voted "Yes" on the union with Reformed Church.

Reports Show There Is Yet Work to Do—Newton Presbytery held its fall meeting at Hackettstown, N. J., in connection with exercises celebrating the 150th anniversary of the organization of the church. Rev. James Ferguson was chosen moderator. A popular meeting in the interests of Christian education was addressed by Mr. Ferguson and Rev. J. N. Wagenhurst of presbytery and by Dr. J. W. Cochran of the Board of Education. Presbytery voted for union with the Reformed Church. The reports on evangelistic work and the boards and other agencies of the church showed cause for thanksgiving and encouragement as to results; yet there was evidently in them all a clear call for more earnest prayer and for larger consecration.

Discuss Many Subjects—Emporia Presbytery met in Cottonwood Falls, Kan. Rev. J. K. Miller was elected moderator. Foreign missions, home missions, Christian education, evangelism and the every-member canvass all were prominent at this meeting. A united committee was appointed to prepare for the every-member canvass next year, and a committee was appointed to arrange for a missionary conference at Emporia in connection with this movement. The committee on foreign missions was authorized to arrange a presbyterial itinerary for a returned missionary in the interest of foreign missions. Emporia College reported an enrollment of 175 in the college department, the largest in its history. The question as to union with Reformed Church was affirmed.

WHERE THE NEWS COMES FROM

In this issue of The Continent—in no sense extraordinary—there is news of religious activities from six countries other than our own, originating in twelve different cities. Excluding the Calendar and Record and the reports from presbyteries there are news items in this issue from twenty-six states of the union concerning seventy-eight different towns and cities. In Calendar and Record sixty-six ministers are mentioned.

NEW CHURCHES IN NEW YORK STATE

Spencer—The corner stone of the new church, Rev. Oliphant Gibbons' pastor, was laid Sept. 19. It is expected that the church will be occupied by Christmas. It will cost $12,000 and takes the place of the frame building which was burned in 1911. The former church lacked four years of having been used a century. All except $2,000 will have been raised by the church officers before the edifice is completed.

Olean—The dedication of First church and the installation of a new pastor, Rev. Harry Burton Boyd, occurred Sept. 21. Services of various kinds were held during the following week. Among those who took part in the unusual combination of exercises were President Stewart of Auburn Seminary, Dr. J. Q. Adams, Rev. W. C. McGarvey, Rev. H. D. Bacon, Rev. H. G. Orvis and Dr. A. V. V. Raymond.

ITEMS FROM VARIOUS STATES

South Dakota—A party of Sunday school workers, including Mrs. Mary Foster Bryner of Chicago, Dr. T. H. Hagen of Huron and I. N. Halliday of the South Dakota Sunday School Association, recently held a series of Sunday school conventions in Hot Spring, Rapid City, Sturgis and Deadwood.

Illinois—Six delegates from each church in place of two as in the past will be expected at the synodical society meeting of the women of Illinois at Oak Park next week. It is hoped in this way to get more of the inspiration of the meetings to local churches. The work among foreigners in Chicago will be specially emphasized in the program.

Fall Conference at Princeton

The fall conference of pastors and others will be held at Princeton Seminary Oct. 13 and 14 Monday evening Dr. J. R. Davies of Philadelphia will speak on the life of Robert M. McCheyne Tuesday will be addresses on the minister as prophet, teacher, preacher, pastor and missionary by Doctors J. O. Boyd, John H. Raven, David J. Burrell, W. Courtland Robinson and Rev. George Sherwood Eddy.

SCHOOL AND COLLEGE

By a vote of 28 to 20 the professors of the University of Kansas have declared in favor of the use of simplified spelling.

Oct. 22 the new graduate college of Princeton and the Cleveland memorial tower will be dedicated. The tower has been erected by national subscription.

To fill the chair of pastoral theology, evidences of Christianity and Biblical antiquities in Lincoln University, left vacant by the resignation of Dr. Robert Laird Stewart, the board of trustees have elected Dr. W. T. L. Kieffer of Milton, Pa.

Albert Lea College, Albert Lea, Minn., has opened for one of the most prosperous years in its history. The work in every department is well in hand under the management of Mrs. Gertrude Kingsland, who is entering upon her new duties as dean.

Illinois College at Jacksonville opened with the largest registration in its history. There is an increase of thirty-six students in the college department as compared with the previous year. During the summer several important improvements were made on the campus and in the buildings.

A qualifying examination for Rhodes scholars from Illinois will be held in the Northwestern University building, Chicago, Oct 14, according to an annuncement by President James of the University of Illinois, chairman of the scholarship committee.

Parsons College, Fairfield, Iowa, opened with an enrollment the largest in the history of the institution with a single exception. The pipe organ for Barhydt Memorial chapel is now being installed. The organ is the gift of Theodore W. Barhydt of Burlington. The endowment campaign for $325,000 is well under way, about $90,000 being already pledged.

Occidental College has started with an enrollment very much larger than ever before; almost 300. The old building was crowded to overflowing, every foot of space being taken when the special guest of the opening morning, John Balcom Shaw, D. D., made the first address to the students. Los Angeles Presbytery was in session in Pasadena and journeyed to the opening exercises.

Blackburn College at Carlinville, Ill., opened this fall with an increase of 150 per cent of new students over last year. The self-help plan that offers young people an opportunity to earn a large part of their college expense has proved attractive to many young people and the problem in another year is going to be how to care for the students who wish to come. The new president, Dr. W. M. Hudson, gave a good part of last year to working out the details of the new plan.

MINISTERIAL OBITUARY

Rev. John F. Sundell died at his home at Lake Mary, Fla., on the night of Sept. 26. He was for years a missionary among the German settlers of the peninsula.

Rev. T. Cunning Beattie, pastor of Garvilia, Cal., church, died at his residence Sept. 23. Mr. Beattie was for many years pastor of the church in Albuquerque, N. M.

Rev. Edward Phillips Payson died of paralysis after a brief illness in Tacoma, Wash., Sept. 22. For forty-six years he had been in the active ministry as chaplain in the civil war and pastor of churches in New England and the middle states. Born in Lyme, Conn., seventy-three years ago, of a family of ministers, he was named after his distinguished uncle, Edward Payson, D. D., who had a fruitful ministry in Portland, Me. His father, Rev. Phillips Payson, educated him until he entered Williston Seminary in preparation for Yale College, where he was graduated in 1861. He completed the course at Union Seminary in 1864. He served as chaplain of 146th New York volunteers till the end of the war. For two years he preached in New York City and then accepted the pastorate of the Congregational church in Kent, Conn. In 1870 he accepted a call to the First Union Presbyterian church in 86th street, New York City, where he remained until 1875. In December of that year he was installed as pastor of First Congregational church, Ansonia, Conn., where he labored until the summer of 1886. He then became pastor of Canal Street church in New York City, and in May, 1894, was made pastor of Grace church, Montclair, N. J., where he finished his labors May, 1910. He was moderator of Newark Presbytery in 1903-4, and was noted for his ability as a sermonizer and his fidelity to the truth. * *

Lanman—Rev. Joseph, son of Peter and Catherine (Cook) Lanman, was born April 9, 1840, died at Rochester, Minn., Sept. 11. He was graduated at Yale, class of 1864, had two years of study in Union Theological Seminary, New York, after which he took a third year in Andover, being graduated in 1867. Afterwards he was with intermissions in the ministry of the Presbyterian church: Windham, N. H. (1867-72), ordained there June 2, 1868; Westhampton, Mass., (1873-76); Minneapolis, Minn., (1882-88), where he organized Bethlehem Presbyterian church. He was also pastor of First Presbyterian church, Princeton, Ky., for several years. His last pastorate was St. James, Minn. (1899-1908). At intervals between the settlements mentioned he had preaching engagements at Lynn, Mass., Oakland, Cal., and Newark, Ohio. After resigning in 1908 and in spite of failing health he continued to fill vacant pulpits and do such pastoral services as his strength allowed. He received the degree of Ph. D. from Wooster University in 1893. Dr. Lanman was a diligent student all his life, having an ardent thirst for truth and keen delight in acquisition. He was a faithful preacher, a beloved pastor, a genial friend, a fearless witness, a reverent disciple and he died in trustful expectation of being with the Master whom he so long loved and served, literally entering heaven with prayer.

Randall — The Second Presbyterian church of Cleveland has met with a great loss in the death of Charles Hanford Randall, for twenty-eight years one of its most faithful and esteemed ruling elders. Born in New Milford, Conn., May 2, 1832, he was the oldest son in a family of eight children. When he was 23 years of age he made Cleveland his home, where he resided until called to the better life on Aug. 7 last, aged 81 years. In the early days of the civil war he responded to the call of his country, enlisting in the army in October, 1861, and serving three years in the Army of the Cumberland. Always a patriot, his interest in the affairs of the Grand Army of the Republic was keen to the end. For twenty-seven years as secretary and treasurer of one of Cleveland's prominent industries, his business career was marked by the highest integrity and honor.

But it was in his Christian life and church associations that he will be longest remembered, for these reflected the deepest interests of his mind and soul. In 1868 he was elected to the diaconate in Second church, and in 1885 to the eldership. His high Christian character, his gentle spirit, his knowledge of Christian truth, his fidelity to duty, made him an example to his colleagues in office and to his fellow members in the church which he loved. He had become a Christian and made his profession of faith in 1859 and from that day to the day of his death, like Enoch of old, he "walked with God." No one who knew him ever questioned his consistency as a Christian or his sincerity as a man. For some years before the end came he had been a sufferer, though not prevented from attending church services, but his sufferings were borne with a patience and fortitude which were the outcome of his unfaltering faith in the goodness and love of God. As the end approached the consciousness of the divine presence made his chamber as another Bethel—a house of God.

In November, 1870, Mr. Randall married Cornelia Haskell, who, with one daughter, survives him, blessed with the memory of a beautiful life, a legacy of inestimable value both to them and the church which he served so many years.

Around the Shop

The Around-the-Shop Man is proud to number among his acquaintances a certain man who is commonly rated as in the "self-made" class. All his life he has earned his way and has enjoyed doing it, and today he has no haunting obligations that cast a shadow upon his happiness. Yet, just the other day he said:

"I owe more to friends than to thrift. They are the best capital any young man can acquire. Only the real kind count. But it isn't a simple matter to get them. Many men busy themselves making what they call 'friends,' but they don't get much satisfaction out of such 'friendships.' One must invest his best in his friendships and invest it with greater care than he invests his first $1,000, if he expects his 'principal' to be safe and his 'income' to be permanent.

"Some friends are positive, some negative or at least not active. Once when I was beginning I asked a friend, Mr. A., to 'speak a good word' for me to Mr. B. if the latter should ask about me. A few days later Mr. B. accepted a proposal from me. Some time afterward I remarked to Mr. B. that I appreciated Mr. A.'s service in helping me.

"'Mr. A.?' questioned Mr. B. 'Why, I never said a word to him. I accepted because C. took the trouble to come over to my office and tell me about you.'

"So it appeared that C., who had not waited to be asked, had really served me without even giving me a chance to thank him. That's what I call positive friendship."

Thousands of Continent readers believe that their friends ought to subscribe for and read the paper. If each one of these will take the positive step in only one case each year, the Around-the-Shop Man promises he will pester the publisher and editors till they make even a better paper than now. And you can rely on his being a real pest when he sets about it!

The Sin of the Suburbanites

AMERICAN SUBURBAN CHURCHES OUGHT TO BE ASHAMED OF THEMSELVES.

That will do very well for a general statement. There are not many exceptions.

But the suburban churches themselves will wonder why they are not all exceptions to anything and everything shameful.

There is no other sort of locality or circumstances where self-satisfaction flourishes so luxuriantly among church members as in the suburbs of an up-to-date American city.

So it will be extra hard to convey to the minds of suburban church people the stupefying idea that their organizations are probably the most blameworthy of all churches that exist anywhere in the broad land. For they think themselves the Christian elite.

Do they not build splendid churches? Do they not fill their beautiful auditoriums almost to overflowing one Sunday after another—disproving the sneer that suburbanites all spend their Sundays at golf or automobiling? Do they not pay their ministers liberally and treat them royally? And do they not give munificently to the boards of the church and a host of other good causes?

Surely they do. Well, then, what can be the matter with them?

Let us take a square look at the colossal fault that the suburbanites themselves are overlooking—and nearly everybody else as well. Here's their big unrealized failure:

The typical suburban church never does anything really serious to help the Christian life of the city to which it is related. That is the characteristic sin of the American suburbanite—he has forgotten the hole of the pit from which he was digged.

Everybody agrees that ingratitude to parents is an enormous disgrace. And that is close akin to the disgrace of the present-day suburban church.

Such a church has invariably drawn its principal blood of vitality from the downtown churches which flourished so strongly a generation ago, and in most cities those old churches are today fighting for their very existence, wondering how long it is going to be until they shall have to close their doors forever.

And about all this struggle and doubt and sickening fear of oncoming wreck, the suburban church cares only about one-tenth of one per cent more than nothing.

Yet practically every strong man in those suburban pews either owes to the ministration of one of these old-time downtown churches his spiritual birth, or else owes to it welcome, friendship and defense in the days when he first came to the city—days when there was no comfortable suburban home for him, but only a cheap boarding house on a crowded back street.

Still the whole comfortable lot of them pat themselves on the back for the splendid way they keep up their own rich church and never take a thought for the dying old mothers downtown.

Isn't it a fact that they ought to be ashamed of themselves?

If a public speaker has any Jeremiah-turn in him at all, it is always meat and nuts for him to get on the topic of the "retreat of the Protestant churches from the downtown districts of the big cities." A man who can't make a doleful speech on that subject is surely an amateur.

But mighty few of all these abundant lamentations come at the real difficulty. It is usually assumed that the churches which move away from downtown are cravenly running off.

Sometimes, of course, that is true. But ordinary circumstances locate the trouble in quite a different place.

The downtown church can still get people. But it can't carry on work for them because it can't any longer raise the budget which its expensive plant demands.

Its well-to-do members are gone away; its new members are poor. These poor members are none the less worthy in themselves, but they soon find themselves up against a financial problem for the support of an enormous edifice, and when they see they can't manage it, they naturally stand from under.

And that is the trouble that ere long pushes an old church off the edge of the precipice. Or else the church makes haste to slip out of the impossible pinch by "retreating" uptown, as the critical say.

As for any other outcome there is but a single visible hope:

If the suburban churches will do their simple, honest duty by repaying what they owe for their best working strength to the old churches downtown, those churches will be able to stay where they are and continue to declare the gospel in the congested city centers.

Some shifts of course may have to be made to get clear of localities entirely absorbed into business, but in general the tenement and apartment house regions need not be abandoned by Protestant forces if only the suburban congregations will cash up on their obvious spiritual debts.

But that won't do. The old downtown churches are not city missions. "Old folks at home" can't be decently taken care of out of the poor fund.

Filial love has to be validated by filial interest personally shown. The old mother church down in the center of the city needs not merely such and such a sum of money in an "offering," but it needs the personal help of its suburban sons.

And that living aid can be furnished where there is a will for it. The Continent knows of one example meeting the ideal very closely —the relation of First Oak Park congregation with old Jefferson Park church in Chicago. Jefferson Park has skirted the brink of disaster, but now its day of fear is past. It will not retreat.

Oak Park church has made itself responsible completely for Jefferson Park's life. It will put in not only the necessary money, but as well all necessary work by its own workers.

It is a short road from the suburbs to the money-making opportunities of the great city. And the city yields to the suburbs a royal tribute—abounding means of ease, comfort and beauty.

It should be just as short a road from the suburbs to the city's opportunities for giving and serving.

Considering what the city does for the average suburbanite, there surely ought to be in his conscience a strong urgency somewhere to make a respectably grateful return.

Or does the suburbanite really think nothing better of his city than of an orange that he can squeeze? Sometimes it looks so.

The World

Fire, Tempest and Death on Midocean

A year and a half after the never-to-be-forgotten wreck of the Titanic comes another notable ocean disaster with far smaller loss of life, but yet attended by an abundance of dramatic and pathetic features in which fire and tempest and the wireless telegraph played the principal parts. The ocean liner Volturno of the Uranium line, with 656 passengers and crew bound from Rotterdam to Halifax and New York, took fire from an explosion in the forward hold and the fire soon proved unconquerable. This was early Thursday morning and while the fire quickly spread the wireless telegraph operator sent out call after call for help. Eleven great ships hastened with all possible speed to the aid of the doomed vessel, but at the time a tremendous gale was raging and when they reached the scene of the disaster—latitude 48 north, longitude 34 west, in mid-Atlantic—they could do nothing for hours because of the fierceness of the storm. The same cause was responsible for the wrecking of half a dozen lifeboats, which were either dashed against the sides of the Volturno or swamped after being launched Repeatedly the sister ships tried to send their small boats to the rescue, but in vain. Finally the wind and wave abated somewhat of their violence and toward daylight Friday morning 521 persons who remained on the Volturno, which was now a floating furnace, were rescued. The number of the dead, either burned or drowned, is estimated at 135. Most of the victims were immigrants of the humbler class seeking new homes in America.

The honor roll of ocean steamers whose captains were good Samaritans for the lost liner, as reported last Monday, was made up of the Carmania, the Kroonland, the Grosser Kuerfest, the Minneapolis, the Rappahannock, La Touraine, the Seydlitz, the New York, the Devonian, the Czar and the Narragansett. The latter was an oil tank steamer and after arrival sprayed oil on the water from lines of hose. This considerably calmed the waves around the stern of the Volturno so that the small boats from the succoring fleet could approach closely enough to work effectively.

Chapters can be written of deeds of heroism and daring and unselfishness and self-sacrifices performed on board the doomed ship and all around her on the waste of waters where scores of victims struggled for life against the angry Atlantic. Human nature was seen at its heroic best, though sad to say it was also displayed at its cowardly worst by many of the Volturno's crew, who, if first reports are to be credited, rushed with wolfish eagerness to the lifeboats, crowding aside women and children.

President Huerta as Dictator; 110 Deputies Arrested

The week opened with Provisional President Huerta the dictator of Mexico. On Friday he forcibly ended the congress by arresting 110 deputies. These deputies had united in signing a protest over the disappearance of one of their number, Senator Dominguez, who had suddenly and mysteriously vanished after delivering a speech in the senate strongly arraigning the Huerta regime. Whether Dominguez was arrested, assassinated or had fled the country was not known. A committee of the chamber of deputies was told that the senator's little son had seen a policeman take his father away from his hotel.

General Huerta issued several proclamations and statements, one of them calling for elections of senators and deputies on October 26, the same date set for the election of a president. In an address to the Mexican people he declared that the imprisoned deputies had shown systematic and implacable hostility to each and all of his acts—in other words, that their attitude was "rebellious." The last act of rebellion consisted in the passage of a resolution to the effect that the deputies would hold the provisional president responsible for their safety and if sufficient protection were not extended them they would transfer their sessions to some place of safety, which Huerta interpreted as a threat to move into the territory of the rebels. Minister Aldape went to the chamber, accompanied by companies of soldiery and police, and demanded in Huerta's behalf that the resolution be withdrawn and this demand not being complied with the arrests followed.

The city of Mexico was stunned by Huerta's coup, but was apparently willing to accept it philosophically, just as all of his many arbitrary acts have been accepted since the fall of Madero. But in the northern part of the country it had a stimulating effect on the rebels, or constitutionalists, as they call themselves. Northern Mexico has begun to resemble the plains of Thrace when the Balkan belligerents were fighting back and forth. The city of Torreon was captured by the revolutionists early last week. Shortly before General Alvirez, the federal commander, was killed and his force of 400 men and battery of artillery annihilated by the notorious General Villa, a former bandit. The revolutionists, of whom General Carranza is chief, claim to control the northern half of Mexico.

Previous to the arrest of the deputies the political situation had become complicated by the religious issue. Foreign Minister Gamboa, the Catholic and administration candidate for president, has been discredited with his principal supporters by the discovery that he is a member of the Masonic order, though he attempted to meet this by saying that he had not been active for many years. There is an intense aversion to Free Masonry wherever Catholicism is dominant in Mexico. The clericals are the only political party having an organization extending throughout the republic, but there is opposition to a political religious party, and before the destruction of the congress there was talk of passing a law against forming a political party with a religious designation.

A warning was delivered to the Mexican capital from Washington, presumably at the suggestion of Special Commissioner John Lind at Vera Cruz, that the imprisoned deputies should be fairly treated. The same sort of warning was sent to Mexico at the time of the arrest of President Madero and his vice president, but failed to save them from assassination.

Yuan Inaugurated President of China

China now has a president, duly elected and installed. Provisional President Yuan Shih Kai dropped the word "provisional" from his title last Friday when he was inaugurated, with elaborate military pomp and ceremony, at the palace of the Ming dynasty in the once "Forbidden City" portion of Peking. The inauguration took place only a few days after his election by the two houses of parliament. His term of office is five years and he is eligible for re-election to one more term only. The new constitution of the republic has not yet been completed, however, the election being hastened by threatening conditions prevailing in Mongolia and throughout the country.

An untoward incident showing the treachery still prevailing was the arrest of one Chen, chief of the Peking mounted police, as an assassin. According to the Associated Press Chen confessed he had been bribed by Southern rebels to kill Yuan as the latter was taking the oath of office.

October 10, inauguration day, was the second anniversary of the outbreak of the rebellion which resulted in the overthrow of the Manchus. A representative of the deposed emperor, Prince Pu Lun, read a message of congratulation from the former sovereign and members of the diplomatic corps extended felicitations. The new president made an inaugural address which is described as masterly. Modernization and progress, without too rapid transition from the old to the new, was the keynote. He spoke cordially of education and science and of the need of foreign talent and capital, pertinently remarking that China was like a man possessed of buried treasure who yet complains of poverty.

"The source of the law," said the Chinese executive, "is the virtue and morality of the people. A representative government is one which gathers the opinions of citizens into a complete legal system observed by all. In a republic abiding by the law becomes a habit like eating and sleeping."

General Li Yuen Heng, who has been provisional vice president, was elected vice president. He has been both a sailor and a soldier and took an active part in the military operations of the revolution. He has been governor of an important province and he received one-third as many votes for the presidency as did Yuan—to whom he is said to be unswervingly loyal.

China's Great Man Facing Great Problems

Yuan Shih Kai's career, particularly since 1911, has demonstrated apparently beyond cavil that he is the greatest man of the East and one of the greatest of contemporary soldiers and statesmen. Since he became provisional president, March 10, 1912, the Chinese republic has been confronted by one crisis after another, and its existence and comparative stability today speak volumes for the firm hand of the man at the helm. Certain observers are not yet fully satisfied as to Yuan's absolute integrity and single minded patriotism, but all doubt has disappeared as to his strength of arm, his breadth of vision and his keen understanding of China's foreign and domestic problems. Yuan has accomplished his ends; he has kept the unwieldy ship of state afloat during a troublous period, and for this he is praised. But let him heed the mistakes of Porfirio Diaz of Mexico, say China's well wishers.

A close quarters opinion of Yuan is furnished by The North China Herald, a British publication without partisan bias. Just after the recent insurrection the Shanghai editor wrote: "It can scarcely be disputed that the president has given proof of a far higher intelligence than any of his colleagues or adversaries; and for that reason, bearing in mind with what strategy the rebellion has been anticipated and overcome, the great mass of the people are well disposed to trust him further still. With equal reason, we believe, it has been urged that the foreign powers should support him, not only by tacit acquiescence but by active help. May it not equally well be argued that the government, which has shown that it can overcome, may yet prove, if freed from financial cares, that it can also rule?"

Whether President Yuan's financial success will equal his military and disciplinary achievements remains to be seen. The "six-power group" of powers formed to loan money to China was reduced to five after the United States withdrew, and a few days ago it was announced that the British government would no longer support the quintuple group. The Chinese government was supposed to deal with no one outside this circle—England, France, Germany, Russia and Japan—and the five powers were to act as a unit, but a Belgian syndicate was recently granted two railroad concessions, seemingly with secret French and Russian approval. The breaking up of the international agreement will lead to a general scramble for concessions and an attempted revival of the "spheres of influence" which would pave the way for an eventual partition of China. A German firm has already made a hard bargain for eighteen torpedo boats and a $7,000,000 loan in addition. Meanwhile the Chinese government will be tempted to borrow money from all corners in exchange for valuable concessions, and bankruptcy and foreign intervention might easily follow.

Americans will be interested, first, in seeing what headway their countrymen can make in China against the commercial competition of other foreigners with official backing, and second, in noting whether Yuan's grip on the situation remains cool and steady in the face of uneasiness within and pressure from without.

Bankers' Convention and the Currency Bill

Seldom have the bankers of the country been more concerned with problems of national moment than during the pendency of the currency legislation which has taken form in the Owen-Glass bill now before the United States senate committee. At the annual convention of the American Bankers' Association at Boston last week hours of discussion were devoted to the bill and to questions related to it. The assembled bankers agreed that Congress and the administration were to be commended for the efforts being made to reform the present banking and currency system, but the principal portions of the proposed law were condemned in positive fashion. The bill was objected to because investment in the stock of the federal reserve banks is made compulsory instead of optional, each national bank being compelled to subscribe one-fifth of its capital stock; this is to be taken over and placed under the control of the federal reserve board, in which the banks are to have only a slight representation. The bankers say they fear "political domination and incompetent management," though they will be glad to see commercial paper made a basis for bank notes.

Three bankers among the 2,000 at the Boston convention defended the administration bill, and one of the trio, ex-Congressman McRae of Arkansas, told his fellow delegates that the question at stake is: "Shall the bankers of the United States control the currency of the country or shall the government of the United States control it?" "We should" was the answer from hundreds of voices.

That even the bankers are not always accurate forecasters was proved by the decision of the savings bank section of the association to abandon their opposition to the postal savings bank system. A report delivered at Boston showed that the savings banks have not suffered appreciably by the introduction of the postal savings bank idea. A few years ago the bankers cried "socialism" when the system was urged.

Meanwhile the senate committee has been continuing its public hearings and has brought out testimony favorable and unfavorable to the bill. All the pressure that can be diplomatically exerted by the White House is said to be on the side of speedily ending the hearings and passing the bill. President Wilson, however, took particular pains last week definitely to deny that he had called certain senators "rebels" because they were opposing his plans for currency reform.

The weight of newspaper opinion appears to be in favor of taking a step forward immediately, even though it be of an experimental nature.

Episcopalians Begin Legislative Sessions

The triennial General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church, which will continue its sessions three weeks in October, was inaugurated by an impressive communion service celebrated in the great cathedral of St. John the Divine with all the ritualistic pomp that the book of common prayer permits. More than 100 bishops of the church marched in solemn procession from the synod hall adjacent to the cathedral to the steps of the cathedral's high altar. The sacrament was celebrated by Bishop Daniel S. Tuttle of Missouri, the venerable senior of the Episcopal body. The preacher was Bishop William Lawrence of Massachusetts, whose text was "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith."

In the afternoon the two houses of General Convention met in the old and new synod halls on the cathedral grounds—the bishops in the former and the deputies in the latter. The house of deputies comprises equal numbers of clergymen and laymen, four from each of the eighty-eight dioceses in the country. The first business in order with the deputies was the election of a president, and this brought on a distinct issue between high churchmen and low churchmen. The former nominated Dr. William T. Manning of Trinity church in New York, and the latter Dr. Alexander Mann, successor of Phillips Brooks in Trinity church, Boston. On division the low churchmen won by a margin of sixteen votes. Dr. Mann was elected by 258 ballots as against 242 cast for Dr. Manning, Twenty votes were cast by deputies who favored a lay president for Joseph Packard of Baltimore.

On the first item of business, however, which the deputies took up, what has been commonly regarded as the high church view prevailed. This was a proposition which had come over from the Cincinnati convention of 1910, providing for the choice of the presiding bishop of the church by election. At present the presiding bishop succeeds to that position by seniority, and the result is that he is always a man of great age and usually of serious infirmity. The advantage of choosing a younger and more active leader for these responsibilities seems obvious, but some of the low churchmen have felt that the innovation might be a first step toward an archbishopric, which high churchmen want and low churchmen fear. However, the practical advantages of the change appeared after vigorous debate to prevail over the theoretical objections, and the amendment of the canons was finally carried by an overwhelming majority.

While the General Convention bodies were in session in the synod halls, the Woman's Auxiliary of the Board of Missions held a thank-offering service in the cathedral, and, according to their custom, presented at the altar the collections of their local societies for the past three years. The amount received in the plates passed through the congregation amounted to something over $300,000.

On October 9 the long awaited decision of the supreme court of Korea on the conspiracy charges against Baron Yun Chi Ho and his five convicted fellow prisoners was announced and greatly to the disappointment of the missionary friends of the accused it proved to be, instead of hoped-for acquittal, a confirmation of the sentences of six years' imprisonment on all of the defendants. The information thus far at hand is confined to cable messages entirely and does not disclose the argument with which the court sustained its findings beyond the declaration that the torture complaints were not permitted to invalidate the testimony of Im Chi Chong's butler, on whose testimony the conviction of the prisoners is ostensibly based.

But neither this nor any other similar plea can remove the stigma of insincerity left resting on the Japanese judges who have rendered this final decision in such grossly irrational contrast to their former findings when the case of Baron Yun and his compatriots came to them on first appeal last spring. At that time the supreme court remanded all six defendants with the statement that the evidence certified by the court of appeals was insufficient to maintain the charges laid against them. It was supposed that this would put the Japanese police to the task of developing new testimony, but when the second trial came on in the appellate court not a syllable of new evidence was presented. The case was retried on identically the old showing, and on that record was once more appealed.

But the supreme judges, instead of standing, as incorruptible jurists must have stood, on the ground of the former findings, have executed a most humiliating reversal of their own verdict and now condemn men on testimony which they had before declared of insufficient force. The confession that Japanese justice is totally undependable for the protection of the nation's colonial subjects is therefore written down in characters that the whole world can read on the official records of its judiciary. The case is, in fact, so transparent that no observer can possibly be unsophisticated enough to suppose that this action of the supreme court is sincere judicial opinion. It is instead self-evidently the arbitrary determination of the Japanese colonial government in Korea, imposed upon a court which is not in position to defend its own integrity or independence.

Authorities very near to Count Terauchi himself have claimed for him the credit of releasing the ninety-nine prisoners whom the court of appeals set free, and have rebuked the missionaries for not acknowledging gratitude to him for his clemency. It is only the fair corollary of this claim in Terauchi's behalf for Christendom now to hold him responsible for the gross injustice of sending to prison six men against whom, by the affirmation of his own highest court, there is no convincing evidence. Japan stands indeed at the end of these conspiracy trials in somewhat better position than if it had sentenced the whole 105 found guilty in the lower court, but it has none the less distinctly failed to convince civilized humanity of any fundamental adherence to the principles of discriminating and exact justice. There is but one chance for Japan to eradicate this dishonorable stain, and that is the early exercise of imperial clemency toward the unhappy victims of Terauchi's ruthless police policy.

Judge Watanabe, the famous Christian chief justice of Korea, sits in civil cases only, and has had no part in rendering either decision on this charge of conspiracy.

Russian Instigation of Religious Hate

The infatuated intolerance of the Russian government in religious matters is luridly revealed again by the monstrous prosecution which is being crowded with all the force of the imperial bureaucracy against Mendel Beiliss, a Jewish citizen of Kiev, known among his neighbors as a quiet and peaceable laborer in a brickyard. The charge against Beiliss is that he murdered a boy named Yushinsky, son of an orthodox Christian family, whose body was found in a case near that city. The chief of the city detective force in Kiev investigated the murder and reported to the government that it was probably the work of a gang of criminals whose secrets the boy was supposed to be about to reveal. But the government had already seen the opportunity of fomenting anti-Jewish feeling among ignorant peasants and bigoted church people, by making out the case to be a "ritual sacrifice" of a sort which, according to gross Russian superstition, the Jews are accustomed to commit in order to mingle Christian blood with some of their feasts. The detective, therefore, who reported the Jews innocent, was sentenced to prison for a year, and with this honest officer thus out of the way the prosecution of Beiliss on the murder charge is being forced with every sign of a determination to convict him, whatever the evidence and despite the fact that all intelligent authorities, Christian as well as Jewish, declare "ritual sacrifice" an utterly imaginary crime.

The opening of the trial showed a close parallel between the attitude of Russian judicial officers and the methods of the Japanese court of first instance trying Korean suspects in Seoul. For one thing, counsel appearing for Beiliss complained at the outset that he had not been able to consult with his client, and the judges, after retiring to consider a protest which in any civilized tribunal would have met instant satisfaction, grudgingly granted that the lawyer might see the defendant "in cases of extreme urgency." All in all, every aspect of the case indicates the deliberate purpose of Russian executive and police authorities to exasperate the so-called Christian population of Kiev to the point of rising to massacre their Jewish neighbors in another such "pogrom" as turned the world heartsick ten years ago at Kishinev.

Religious Liberty Advances in South America

Peru finally joins the enlightened nations of the world in establishing by constitutional law the prerogative of free religious worship for all citizens. The influence of the papacy on the South American republics has required of liberal-minded citizens in all of them a tremendous struggle to achieve the right of religious liberty which is regarded as fundamental to civilization everywhere else in the world save in Russia. Brazil first led the way in shaking off exclusive Romanist pretensions and in disestablishing the Roman church, and gradually one by one the other republics are following at least to the extent of repealing the clauses of their constitutions which forbid Protestant worship. Early in October such a constitutional amendment was adopted in Peru by a vote of sixty-six to four in the national chamber of deputies. The measure had previously passed the senate.

This action, however, rather confirms than changes the public practice, for as in other South American countries, Protestant churches and schools have been tolerated in the principal centers of Peru in spite of constitutional prohibition. In fact, a decision of Peru's supreme court virtually invalidated this intolerant section of the national constitution fifteen years ago by liberating a Methodist minister who had been arrested for preaching in Peru.

A Call to the Church to Prayer

Moderator Stone and Stated Clerk Roberts have just issued a call for a year of prayer, addressed to the ministers and members of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, as follows:

> By the authority of the General Assembly of 1913, and in the name of its committee on Christian life and work, we address you, largely in terms already approved by the Assembly, with reference to the subject of united prayer for the blessing of God upon the work of the church.
> The first call for united prayer came from the Lord Jesus himself, in the words, "Depart not from Jerusalem, but wait for the promise of the Father."
> We know what that waiting meant, and we know its results. Out of that waiting came Pentecost and all its products—a newborn church with all its conflicts and all its victories during nineteen centuries. As from Christ, so from Paul, from the fathers, from the reformers, from Luther, from Calvin, from Knox, from Wesley, Whitefield and the Tennents, from Jonathan Edwards, from the evangelists and the missionaries of all lands and all ages, have come through the years appeals for the united prayers of Christians for "prayer—more prayer." As these calls were heeded, came revivals and reformations, past and present.
> Today God's church needs more and greater revivals, more complete and permanent reformations. To that end, in this twentieth century, God's church needs for its work that supreme and paramount blessing which can come only from the Triune God himself—a worldwide outpouring of the Holy Ghost. We believe the Heavenly Father waits to send his own promised Spirit in his own world-embracing way, and that the Lord Christ has the residue of the Spirit, and is waiting, willing, eager, to shed this forth as at Pentecost.
> We know that prayer from the human side is the dynamic of Christian life and work, the potent force of evangelism and missions. Without prayer, organizations, offerings, enthusiasms, labors, sacrifices, training, learning, skill, are powerless. Victory—real, permanent—comes not by might, nor by power, but by the Spirit, given in answer to prayer. The Lord Jesus Christ has promised that all the resources of the Godhead shall respond to his people's prayers. "Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son. If ye shall ask anything in my name, that will I do." Christ stands with all the forces of omnipotence to aid his people, pleading in his name and for his sake, that they may promote his glory in the salvation of man.
> There is additional assurance given to united prayer, in Matthew 18:19: "If two of you shall agree on earth as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father which is in heaven." What may we not hope, therefore, when all earth's believing millions shall agree in prayer? To God's church now comes the challenge, "Ye have not because ye ask not."
> The General Assembly therefore, with humble dependence upon God in Christ, calls upon you in each of your congregations to engage in a year of intercession, beginning with October, 1913, for the outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon all Christians throughout the world, in both home and foreign fields, in all their present and varied needs. Especially is the call addressed to all synods, presbyteries and church sessions, to fill the year beginning October, 1913, so far as possible with prayer, especially for the speedy evangelization of the world as divinely promised, "It shall come to pass in the last days, saith God, that I will pour out my spirit upon all flesh."
> Let us therefore with one accord give ourselves to united prayer, making "supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, for all men."

The Value of the "Tough" Book

WE HAVE reason to know that it is the custom of some of our strongest preachers to keep on hand in their studies some piece of hard reading or some phase of difficult study to which they hold themselves as part of their discipline. They speak of it as their "tough" book or their heavy task in the midst of the much else which they have to do.

Volumes of sermons by the best preachers living and dead, and devotional essays, are well enough in their way, and they doubtless enrich the preaching of any man. But they do not furnish fiber or sinew for a preacher. He has to look elsewhere for that if he gets it at all. It is always interesting to visit the libraries of the men who are making the church history of the day. They have their share of devotional and similar works, but they have other shelves which some libraries greatly lack—shelves where are the hard books, the heavy tasks, the "tough" volumes.

This habit of the heavy work explains what amazes some busy pastors when they see the output of other men as busy as themselves. "How can they do it?" they exclaim. "We are so busy, and we never have time for any of these things; we have all we can do to get our two sermons ready; and here is a man who publishes a volume of real learning." Well, there may be many reasons, but this is one of them—he has been at it for years. It is fairly incredible that Dr. Storrs could have been a city pastor when he wrote his Bernard of Clairvaux, or that Dr. Forrest could have been a pastor when he wrote his "Christ of History and Experience," or that David Smith was a country pastor when he wrote "The Days of His Flesh." And it is certain that other men could not have done any of those things. But it is a perfectly familiar fact that these were men who kept their task on hand, even while they were doing the other and more common tasks which occupy all ministers.

There is no better safeguard against the bad habit of intellectual browsing and the worse habit of cramming for particular sermons than the keeping on hand of something tough enough to drive one. It is delightful to browse in a library, and it is often helpful, but the habit is ruinous. A minister goes to his study to work, and he needs to keep some real work on hand. It is this kind that puts edge on one's mind. All the better if the tough book is one that makes rebellion and debate within one's self. It is always easy to read a book with which one agrees; the others are the ones that serve one best. We know a minister whose habit is to mark the margins of his books in this fashion: A mere check means that the passage is worth looking over again; a straight line down the edge means that he agrees with the passage and likes the way it is put; a waving line down the edge means that he does not agree with it. He says that sermons come more frequently out of the wave lines than out of the straight ones.

Then this harder work keeps one alive to the greatness of the gospel. It hints at depths which have not yet been explored; at heights which the people have not reached, but to which they may be led; at new fields of thought which will make preaching fresh.

Such work may take many forms. It might be a big bit of exegesis, which makes a man brush up his Greek or Hebrew, or at least worm the meaning out of hard passages by dint of real work. He will not be preparing an expository series; he will simply be getting new light on the whole section which he is studying. Or he may take a great subject and spend his best hours on it—a subject like the atonement or the person of Christ or comparative religion—not because he means to preach about it but because he wants to master it. He will read all around it, and dig through it, and live with it, and be sorry to leave it and glad to get back to it. Or it will be a good hard book in the philosophy of his faith, like either of the Fairbairn books or this new series of lectures by Professor Josiah Royce which he calls "The Problem of Christianity," worth the while of anybody.

This is not a counsel of perfection. Real men are doing this and gaining pulpit strength out of it. Unless one does something of the kind he readily comes to the place where he does not know how to do really hard work with his mind, and then it is easy to find good reasons for not doing it. The place of such work cannot be taken by some attractive fad, which will absorb time and strength and yield nothing. It must be something worth a grown man's while, and if it is worth his while, he will find himself drawn to it and held to it. From it he will come away day by day stronger for the current task of the pulpit and of the parish.

Failing to See the Soul in Prison Convicts

The week which Thomas Mott Osborne, a distinguished citizen of Auburn, New York, spent in the cells of the state penitentiary in his home town bid fair to make of him a forcible leader in penal reform. The whole period of his self-assumed imprisonment Mr. Osborne spent under the strictest regime enforced on the most hardened of criminals, for the warden accepted the stipulation that no favors should be granted the masquerade convict. Mr. Osborne, toward the end of his week, even refused to work, so that he might be thrust into the dark dungeon where rebellious inmates are disciplined. Thus he had in brief the complete experience of a lawbreaker under punishment, and may now discuss American penal practice from that standpoint which the trained scientist considers so enviable—firsthand knowledge. Probably no citizen of equal public standing ever came at the question through all this experience before.

And Mr. Osborne proves himself a man of both head-discernment and heart-discernment in the criticism which he formulates first out of his extraordinary inlook into the prison system. He is no sensationalist. He does not offer the cheap objections to physical conditions which are so easy to say and easy to be scattered broadcast in the public prints. Mr. Osborne is not surprised that prison is no pleasant place; he is thankful enough on the physical side to find it clean and its food eatable. But his thoughtful observation goes deeper. It is the moral temper of the law's methods of punishment that concerns him. He says that the law seems to have forgotten that is is imprisoning persons; it proceeds as if it were imprisoning brute beasts merely, from whom society can be protected after their release only if during incarceration their spirits can by harshness be cowed down in a trembling fear too craven to repeat the old offense.

The opposite means of building up a man's will and individuality, so that he shall feel himself able to serve society instead of preying on it, has secured some foothold in certain reformatories for first criminals. But it is hardly countenanced anywhere as yet in the regular type of state's prisons. In these prisons there are no doubt many gross offenders confined in whom the creation of a personality favorable to right living may indeed seem hopeless. But even they are entitled to the test of some appeal that will enlist their manhood if perchance there remain fragments of it to be enlisted. Undoubtedly Mr. Osborne has struck the fundamental line of objection to American conceptions of legal punishment, and the reiteration and continuing emphasis of his persuasion will be a civic message of its highest worth not only to his own state but to all American commonwealths.

Campaigns That Go Very Well Together

It is rather likely that some ministers and elders have imagined a double-barreled shotgun pointed at them when they found themselves requested to entertain in their churches both the "united missionary campaign" and the "China emergency campaign." Doubtless this has seemed to be "doing it a little strong." And unquestionably it would have been easier to have the two undertakings a little more widely distributed. But China's exigency—the mighty crisis of national life on which the character of centuries is turning in the Orient—won't be postponed for convenience' sake. And since the church did not provide in last year's canvass sufficient funds to meet necessities for the urgent missionary advance in China, it has only itself to complain of if the prolongation of the effort seems tedious.

The supply of this need is too absolute a duty to abandon until it is done. Pending the completion of it, the united missionary campaign must make allowance for such measures as will fill full the cup of the China demand. The objects of the "U. M. C." are such as can be pressed any time; an every-member canvass is as feasible in 1915 as in 1913. But more missionaries must be sent to China forthwith or pressing opportunities there will pass unimproved. The present plastic hour of transition will quickly harden in one or another fixed form again. That is the logic for pushing collections in behalf of the emergency fund throughout the coming winter, no matter what else may be elbowed off.

Nevertheless, many virtues spring from necessity, and the necessity of operating the united missionary campaign and the China emergency campaign side by side is producing virtues of adjustment which show that promoting a permanent method and gathering a special fund are efforts not incompatible. The two work together beautifully where there is a disposition to try both rather than a disposition to growl at the supposed conflict between them. Thus in one city the united missionary campaign having engendered a hearty desire to do something definite, the China emergency campaign was immediately brought on by the local committee because it afforded opportunely the chance of something definite to do. The support of a new worker in the live Orient was quickly assured. In another city the speakers of the China team were put in as the foreign mission speakers for Presbyterians in the united missionary campaign. In these and other ways the two enterprises may be dovetailed into each other if only it is not assumed at first hearing of them that they must be antagonistic.

In fact, to revert to the figure of speech introducing "these few feeble remarks," the united missionary campaign and the China emergency campaign will prove, if intelligently dealt with, not two barrels of a shotgun to hold the churches up, but twin sets of wheels to help the churches on.

Samples of Originality Learned in Africa

That Dan Crawford, the African missionary, never thinks in the ruts that other people use for their thinking is illustrated in the answer he made to a cabinet minister in England, who asked what most impressed him when he came back to civilization after nearly twenty-five years in the long grass of Africa. Of course the politician expected mention of some of the marvelous new inventions of the last quarter century. But Crawford was looking a different way entirely. He told the cabinet minister that the biggest change he saw was the loss of the English smile. Then he referred his questioner to Herbert Spencer's chapter on the psychology of a smile, and summed it up for him in the epigram, "Nothing on four legs ever smiled." "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his smile?" asked Crawford, declaring in the same breath, "The smile is the flag of the soul." Therefore, he argued, when the smile is gone, the soul must be absent or asleep—which was the missionary's way of condemning England for its strenuous materialism. Surely America needs the lesson just as seriously.

Mr. Crawford, however, takes no credit to himself for his startlingly unusual way of looking at everyday affairs. He says he learned it from the Africans. As he was coming out of Africa he brought a party of his native friends with him to the "rail head," and while they watched the locomotives and steam cars he was himself beguiled into the European habit of boasting of the achievements of modern science. He told his black comrades all about automobiles, submarines, aeroplanes and wireless telegraphy. But they listened very decidedly unimpressed. When he had finished the tale of scientific miracles the spokesman of the group of Africans "punctured the missionary's tire with a bang," as Crawford himself expresses it. The solemn word which the negro sage spoke was simply, "To be better off is not to be better."

This, says Mr. Crawford, was the last word he heard in Africa and it is ringing in his ears yet as a message which he feels commissioned to repeat to white civilization in his present lecturing tour.

Wanted—A Reputation for Church Democracy

An outsider perhaps can hardly express the sympathy without offense, but right-minded men must feel sympathy with the influential Episcopalian clergymen who gathered just in advance of their General Convention to lament the repute of their denomination as a church of the aristocracy. They have indeed sensed the public's usual estimate of Episcopalianism, and they are keenly right in deeming it a severe reproach. It is all the worse because this opinion is not wholly an external opinion but the judgment also of many poor people within the bounds of the church itself.

A poverty-stricken woman distracted with the problem of a dissipated son was advised to appeal to her rector for counsel and aid. Though herself passionately devoted to the Episcopalian communion, with which she had been identified from girlhood, she shook her head at this impracticable idea, saying, "Our clergymen are not interested in such matters." A more stupendous indictment against Christian ministers could not be imagined. And the words were extra significant because they were spoken as a mere reflection of experience without purpose to criticise and in a simplicity which apparently did not appreciate the discredit of the fact alleged. Whatever an aroused Episcopalian clergy can do to turn away this reproach from themselves and their ecclesiastical associations, will be a blessing to all American churches, none of which are wholly guiltless of paying more heed to the rich and strong than to the poor and misguided. Surely the Presbyterian Church is not the least of all sinners in this respect, and it will be blessed by the grace of any real movement toward a real Christian democracy—a democracy wherein the highest boast of the church may become one with the crowning joy of its Lord: "The poor have good tidings preached to them."

—It's a wonder that Roman Catholic leaders don't manage to get their representative weekly newspapers into the control of men of brains. Take this priest Phelan, for example, who edits The Western Watchman in St. Louis. In a late issue he prints one of his own sermons wherein he rashly includes the following arrant assertions: "Luther announced the principle that religion was a thing of the mind; practice, moral activity, works, all that had nothing to do with religion. In other words, the greatest saint in the world might be a moral leper, and the lower morally he was, the higher spiritually he could be. . . . The aphorism of Luther's teaching was: Believe strongly and do not be afraid to commit sin." Now of such nonsense as this, mere meanness is not sufficient explanation. A man might be the meanest sort that ever happened, and yet with any moiety of sense, he would know better than to indulge in this absurd lying. The simplest of Phelan's parishioners can look round them and see that the thing he says is not true of Protestantism. If he were less than hopelessly silly, therefore, he would have more sense than to talk in this incredible style to even the most bigoted of his church people.

—In years past The Continent has been often advised by gracious friends that its popularity would be increased if instead of the present proportions of its pages it adopted the "magazine form." But the advice will scarcely be longer repeated, even though these kind counselors are still inclined to favor a page of less amplitude. For the term "magazine form" has lost its usefulness; today nobody can tell what it means. And some of the very periodicals which have been long cited as proof of the advantage of a smaller shape are now appearing in a size which approaches, if it cannot be said to approximate, the size the church papers of the United States have maintained for many years past—The Continent among them. The latest to desert the older "magazine form" is the stanch old Independent. And the astonishing typographical improvement wrought in the change will hardly be denied by the most confirmed advocate of book-sized pages for periodical publications. The Independent has never failed to print reading worth reading, but in its new dress perusal will be a double pleasure—the delight to the mind enhanced by the eye's delight in letter-press and illustrations alluringly bright and airy.

—The Catholic Citizen of Milwaukee is the most candid of the newspapers representing Romanism in this country. At present it is running a series of exceedingly frank editorials on "Our Biggest Catholic Question." It explains its meaning thus: "During the past fifteen years an army of 3,000,000 Italian immigrants have been arriving on our shores. This reenforcement should naturally go to the Catholic element. As a matter of fact, most of it has gone to the non-church-going element, and many thousands to the Protestant element. This situation constitutes our biggest Catholic question." Those Protestants who believe that Catholicism is victoriously sweeping everything before it in this country cherish a delusion which well informed Catholics themselves do not share. But discomfiture of Romanism is small joy to Protestants so long as it continues true, as The Catholic Citizen reveals, that the most of Rome's losses among the Italians and among other immigrants are losses not to a better religion but to complete irreligion. This is a point at which honest Catholic and honest Protestant can meet in a common anxiety.

—At their last national congress some shrewd individual slipped past the Daughters of the American Revolution a paper advocating the restoration of beer selling to the canteens at the army posts. In the minutes of their proceedings this resolution is recorded as an action of the convention, but hardly anybody seems to remember just when it was adopted. It was rushed through somewhere in the confusion of the convention. Concerning these strange circumstances, William H. Anderson of Baltimore has been in correspondence with chapter regents throughout the country. He has been asking if they really are content to have their great patriotic organization parade as favorable to the beer business. Many have replied saying they propose to protest at the next national gathering. There seems to be a good prospect that the brewers will lose this sneaked-through indorsement—and perhaps get some publicity on the other side which they will not enjoy.

Jots and Tittles

—The sincerity of the Christian who loses his religion may be determined by the sort of reward he offers for its recovery.

—The more commandments one has the more he is inclined to pass them about among his neighbors.

—The Lord elects no man to salvation who declines in advance to be a candidate.

DR. JOWETT'S MESSAGE

Through the One Door

"I AM THE DOOR." The door into what? Into everything where we ought to go. Into every place where we ought to live. The door into the central rooms of everything. The way into the holy place is not through the synagogue, but through the Christ; not through an organization, but through the Christ; not through an ecclesiastical fellowship or through any mode of ecclesiastical procedure, or through any man-directed discipline, but through the Christ.

Christ Jesus is the door into the holy and blessed life of God. Through him we enter into that sacred life of which holiness is the light and love is the atmosphere and peace is the bond of communion. He is therefore the door from the wilderness of guilt into the rich pastures of grace. Men are impelled by the urgency of their own experiences when they compare the realm of guilt to a wilderness. The wilderness is the roaming ground of fears. It is peopled by haunting presences. It is filled with weird specters and affrighting sounds. It is the abode of a strange dread.

Sin's Deluding and Wearisome Desert

The wilderness is also the home of the mirage, deluding the eyes with the likeness of fresh water lakes, with seeming waters where weary pilgrims can quench their thirst. And the wilderness is the home of monotony; "sand, sand, sand, and still sand, and sand again." All these features of the wilderness have their analogies in lives that are imprisoned in the realm of guilt. There is the mirage of constant disappointment; some refreshment gleams before the guilt-stricken, but turns out to be sand. Some oasis shines in the prospect, where the burden may be left behind, but the vision of restful palm trees unfolds itself as burning sand. And is there anything more monotonous than the life that is laden with guilt? Guilt turns the feast into barrenness and poisons all the springs of joy. And most certainly the guilt-ridden are the victims of nameless fears.

What way is there out of this wilderness? It is no good telling a man to ignore it and forget it; it is no use advising a man to bury himself in work or to go away for a change. "If I take the wings of the morning and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, thou art there." The guilt-stricken takes the wilderness with him. Is there, then, a way out? Yes, in Christ Jesus we pass out of the wilderness of guilt into the pastures of grace, and this not through a long, wearying road, but through a door that is close at hand. The transition is immediate. It is not a process, it is a crisis. We pass out of the night into the light.

A Blessed Gateway Into Home's Blessing

Jesus Christ is the door into the blessedness of everything. Without Christ we never pass into the real heart of anything. The Lord is the door into the holy blessedness of marriage. We may enter into that gracious realm through many doors; we may pass through the door of animality or the door of legality or the door of conventionality and find ourselves in the realm of social expediences and mechanical arrangements. Or there is the rickety odor of frivolity which opens into a realm where seriousness cannot breathe. Or there is the golden door of money, which opens into a wretched prison rather than a home. And then there is the altogether different door of amiable affinities, the marriage of young affections, of kindred intimacies and common desires and aspirations.

But not yet are we in the center of the blessedness of wedded life, not yet in the place where fountains are springing which are never quenched, whether in the day of life or in the night of death. It is only when everything in wedded life passes through Christ, the affections, the hopes, the visions of home and after days, that everything becomes widened and brightened and enriched and purified. "Husbands, love your wives as Christ loved the church and gave himself for it." A man has to seek to be to his wife what the Lord is to his church. What a vision of the strength of wedded life—its purity, its daring, its deathlessness! And this is the way the pilgrim is to pass to his marriage—through the door of the Lord.

Is this too solemn a view to take of marriage? We should always suspect ourselves when we think we are overdoing the solemnity. We never get anywhere through the door of frivolity. Angel hosts always stand with flaming swords against flippant souls. But a revering love, love that is passed through Christ Jesus, will take us into the most exquisite joys that life can give and which death itself is impotent to destroy. Pass through Christ to a wedding and you will have angel presences among your guests and mystic springs of grace and love will be the wedding gifts of your love.

Christ Jesus is the door into the holy blessedness of common work. How should I go to my work? Through what door? Picture a man going to his daily labor in Christ, through Christ, prepared by Christ. Imagine a business man putting everything through Christ. He consecrates his mind to obtain the ideals of Christ. He consecrates his conscience to obtain the holy guidance of Christ. He consecrates his heart that it may be enriched with the sympathies of Christ. He consecrates his will that it may be empowered with the energies of Christ.

Let that man go through Christ to his office, to his letters, his books, his projects, his dealings. Let him go through that door, dropping everything he cannot take through. Will he make a living? Yes, he will make a living. How do I know? Because the Lord has promised it. Will he make wealth? I cannot say. Perhaps he will not make so much money as some men who go into business through the door of duplicity and sharp practice, and blind self-seeking and petty tyranny and manifold and ingenious unfairness. His purse may be very slender as compared with these, but the man who goes to his work through Christ gets at God's end even if he misses the world's. He clothes himself with the true blessedness and the ineffaceable glory of honest work.

I should infinitely rather be a man who, at 70 years of age, shall have acquired but small possessions, but who has recovered something of the light and beauty and fragrance of paradise, than to have heaped up much treasure and have nothing wherewith to cover the shame of my nakedness in the presence of the Lord. The Lord Jesus Christ is the door into those glorious possessions in which honest and sanctified work will bring the soul of man.

From Sinuous Byways to the Straight Road

And the Lord Jesus is also the door from the crooked way of evil living into the noble highway of righteousness and truth. We cannot effectually deal with crooked conduct except by dealing with crooked souls. The police can deal with conduct, but they cannot cope with character. Human enactments may straighten a crooked relationship between man and his brother, but they cannot rectify a crooked man. To effectually correct the life of man we must deal with the crooked molds—the mind molds, the soul molds in which all these issues are born. It is because of these crooked powers within that life is filled with crookedness and wriggling.

How are we to pass out of the crookedness into the truth? How is a man to pass from the way that winds like a corkscrew into a way as straight as the old Roman roads which ran the length of ancient Britain? Frankly I know only one way: "I am the door." It is in Christ Jesus that the crooked life is made straight, that the soul which has been deranged and embittered by iniquity is brought into the way of holiness again. The woman who was bowed with her infirmity went to the Door, and she became erect and nimble in a new found youth.

And, lastly, when all is over, the long day and the dark night, the Lord Jesus is the door into the land that is fairer than day, the land where spirits serve and are never tired, and the sanctified powers exult in noblest freedom and in unutterable joy and peace.

The Man Who Was a Ladder to Paradise

BY GEORGE A. LITTLE

MY FRIEND DR. MACK and I in one of our walks were urged by a venerable farmer to step into his orchard and sample his fruit. Two small lads passing by looked hungrily at the well laden trees.

"Boys," said our friend, "do you like apples?"

"Yes, sir," one timidly answered; the other, more boldly, "You bet I do!"

Then followed "Help yourselves," the learning of their names, where they lived and, as our host put it, the beginning of an acquaintance which might prove mutually helpful.

As we passed on Dr. Mack remarked, "That acquaintance will prove helpful to the little chaps, for if the stuff is in them that man will make upright and useful men of them. He has both the heart and tact for such work. His first exhibit of good will to those children was in the red apples.

> "'Precepts and rules are repulsive to a child,
> But happy illustration winneth him.'

"Christ first fed the multitude with the five loaves and two fishes; afterward discoursed to them on the Bread of life. Peter healed the lame beggar; afterward he preached to the wondering multitude concerning Christ. The order is through the flesh to the spirit. Our friend understands this, but not everyone of good heart does.

"Parson, did you ever study Isaiah 58? The prophet is commanded to be plain and emphatic in showing Israel their transgressions. The nation believes itself to be upright. The people are punctilious in the externals of worship. What more can be asked? This—God wants the life of the commandment but not its corpse; the law vitalized into conduct. What is the life? It is to 'loose the bonds of wickedness, to break every yoke, to deal thy bread to the hungry.'

"This friend of ours is a ladder like to that of Jacob's vision, reaching from earth to heaven. The little chaps are now on the first rung eating earthly fruit, but if they climb as he will teach and encourage them they will eat the fruits of paradise. In early life he learned that man is largely to serve God by serving men. We cannot enrich him who owns the cattle on a thousand hills. That we may become like him he has given us by the Holy Spirit a nature like to his own; and that we may develop it, a ministry to human wants.

"Our friend was a captain in the union army during the civil war. In one of its battles a minie bullet passed through his body, badly tearing a lung. At first he was passed by as dead, but a later inspection showed feeble signs of life and he was taken to a field hospital to die, for none had hope of his recovery. A sound constitution, temperate habits and the quieting hope that in life or death one is the Lord's wrought in him the miracle of recovery.

"There is a picture in his house of young men all of whom save one, and he an elder, are ministers of the gospel. It is the Sunday school class he had for years.

"Note this: Our friend has the kind heart and the observing eye. Both are essential to the betterment of the world. The priest and the Levite on the Jericho road had eyes but no heart for the wounded Jew. Your best charity sermon will not get money from your priests and Levites—from people without hearts—whereas a simple statement of the wants of the needy will bring response from such as have hearts.

Good-Hearted Folk Who Are Blind

"There are good-hearted people in the world who are blind. To such you must be eyes. A word from heart and lips brings to eyes the suffering of the needy and to ears the piteous prayers of the helpless. It also causes the heartless to stand up that they may be counted. Parson, believe me. In your sincere appeal to befriend the poor in purse and the poverty stricken in spiritual things is the health of your church; 'for he that giveth unto the poor shall not lack; but he that hideth his eyes shall have many a curse.'

"There is a preaching of negation. It is this: The minister prays and preaches that the people may become Christlike, and then gives them no opportunity to become Christlike. He does not urge them in practical ways to become like him. Christ fed the hungry, healed the sick, preached salvation through the infinite love of the Father. They ask of their people nothing for bettering the physical and spiritual condition of mankind. Permitting and favoring an unconscious refusal to do Christlike work is the preaching of negation. It is no wonder that churches are narrow, selfish and indifferent to the world for which Christ died. What is such a church good for?

"It seems to me," the doctor continued, "that God has given the ten talents to many rich men and it rejoices my heart that they are distributing so much of their vast wealth for the public weal. There may be a special providence in the raising up of such men."

Here I interrupted with, "Doctor, do you speak of the rich only?"

"No, no!" was his indignant answer. "Money is only a power for the uplifting or the casting down of men. The heart of its possessor makes it a supporting staff for the feeble or the rod of oppression. Livingstone, Carey and others gave themselves body and soul unto the world as Christ's ministers. Self is more than the tithe of the millionaire. In the multitude of human needs every one may be as the Master to some other. The invalid needs the hospital and the rich can endow it. The small boy needs the red apple and the well laden tree may grow in the garden of the day laborer. Our friend does not think of himself as he serves the Master. His kindness affords him pleasure, but the Lord looketh into the heart to see if it is growing in image like to his own."

"Wets" Try to "Get" Carolina Minister

BY J. H. LARIMORE

WHEN NORTH CAROLINA citizens several years ago made the state prohibition by their votes Rev. R. L. Davis, a member of the North Carolina Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was put in charge of the affairs of the Anti-Saloon League, his principal duty being to see that the prohibitory law was enforced.

Now Mr. Davis has been prosecuted in the criminal courts for assault with a deadly weapon, has been found guilty, fined and finally pardoned by Governor Craig!

Here is the story briefly:

On Saturday, May 10, Mr. Davis appeared in the city court at Raleigh as a witness against an employee of a drug store charged with selling liquor. With him he carried two bottles of liquor given him by a man who declared he had purchased the liquor of the accused clerk.

Ten minutes after giving his testimony and while he was going from the courtroom with another state's witness, Mr. Davis was violently assaulted by Wiley Straughan, a man who is said to have been convicted on several occasions in the city court of misdemeanors. Straughan also attacked Detective Green, another witness for the state, who was with Mr. Davis, but Green was too much for the assailant and in the fight between Straughan and Green the former received a blow on the head which broke the skin and necessitated some stitching.

Rev. R. L. Davis

Three days after this occurrence members of the lawless element circulated a story to the effect that the blow on Straughan's head had been made by Mr. Davis with a bottle of liquor—the liquor used as an exhibit in the trial of the drug clerk. A warrant against Mr. Davis was sworn out, charging assault with a deadly weapon. Three or four men swore that they had seen the saloon opponent strike Straughan with the bottle. On the other hand, the two policemen who separated Straughan and the detective were not credited when they gave testimony exonerating Mr. Davis. Rev. R. F. Taylor, who had evidence to favor Mr. Davis, was not allowed to testify. The newspapers at the time said there was no case against the defendant, but the city court found him guilty and fined him $10 and costs.

Of course the case was appealed and it was tried in the superior court of Wake county, where the verdict was sustained, much to the surprise of everybody, even his prosecutors. The state put on the stand Straughan, the complaining witness, and several others of the community. Straughan swore that while he was engaged with Detective Green he was struck from behind by Davis. On cross-examination he admitted that he was drinking on the day of the difficulty and drinking on the day when he testified in superior court. Other witnesses testified to having seen Davis strike Straughan, though they acknowledged that they did not know Davis by sight.

Another Man Owns to Blow; Conviction Nevertheless

B. M. Green, the detective, testified that Davis did not strike Straughan, but that he (Green) struck Straughan himself with a pair of brass "knuckles," and the "knucks" were produced in court as evidence. Also, in Green's own trial, he was found guilty and punished for the very offense which was charged against Davis! However, the state would not permit Green's own admission of guilt in the Davis trial and in his own to acquit Davis.

Corroborating the detective's testimony, Captain Jack Beasley of the police force, Rev. J. H. McCracken of the Central Methodist church, Patrolman Barrow, who separated Green and Straughan and Davis himself, all testified that the latter had absolutely nothing to do with the assault and that while the fracas was going on Davis was not near the men.

Character witnesses testified, showing what Davis and what his prosecutors were. But the jury, though warned by Judge C. M. Cooke not to allow the question of prohibition to enter into its deliberations, and in the face of preponderating testimony as to the defendant's innocence, returned a verdict of guilty.

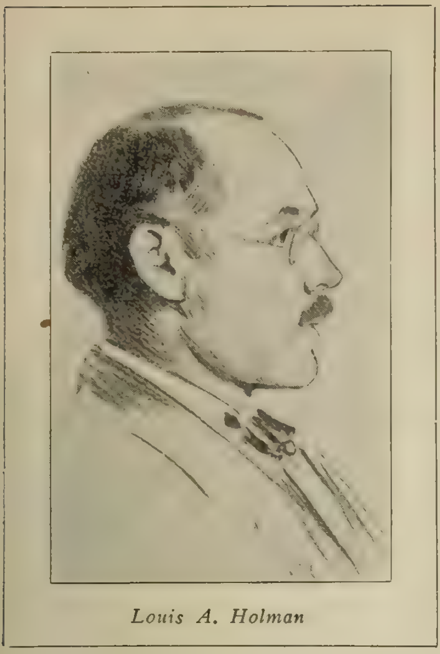
HOLMAN: HIGH PRIVATE

The Story of a Modest Soldier in the Ranks of Righteousness

BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS Editor Afield of The Continent



Louis A. Holman

THE TIME was twenty years ago. The place a kindergarten for blind children. A visitor, a young man, had called upon a new-made friend, little Tommy Stringer, whose personality is shut within triple prison walls of blindness, deafness and muteness. From the doorway I watched the scene. A touch upon the blind boy's shoulder. His quick sense recognized the hand, and with a leap he was in the arms of the visitor, his little red head buried on a strong shoulder, while his sturdy form wiggled with the surprise and delight that finger talk was too slow to express.

Now, after two decades, I sit in a small circle of friends to consider the future of the young man, Thomas Stringer, blind, deaf, mute; and more of a problem than ever to himself and the world. Again the central figure is that same man, and with the old perennial youthfulness of enthusiasm and exuberance shining from his face. With the impartiality of a jurist he is stating the possible courses open for the future of Tom Stringer. As he talks, incidental phrases reveal that, through all these years, he and less than half a dozen others have stood the steadfast friends and helpers of this afflicted youth. Service he has lavished; responsibility he has dared; love he has bestowed unwearyingly upon the boy, now become a man in years and stature. His devotion and his wisdom have opened a wide door for Tom's future.

One of Mr. Holman's Photographs Showing Two of His "Enthusiasms"

That sort of fidelity in loving ministry is the acme of social service. I submit it as characteristic of the steadfastness and unselfishness of Louis A. Holman, an unprofessional, everyday Christian layman, a private in the ranks of righteousness. Among his gifts this one of unweariedness is to be placed high. Thousands of persons have been "interested" in Tom Stringer; hundreds have contributed to his support. Few indeed are they who have maintained or increased their interest after the novelty of the boy's affliction has worn off and been succeeded by perplexities and cares. Of the less than half a dozen who have stood fast, his interest growing with the need, has been this busy man with the elastic heart. The boys who were his concern two decades ago are still within the compass of his tireless solicitude, although the roll of his proteges has since grown to hundreds.

The claim that Mr. Holman is an "average" Christian layman, specializing in work for boys, would be resented by him, for his diffidence would not brook his being set up as a type. Many workers in good causes are quite willing that the world should recognize their ministry; the possibility of such an article as this one simply never has entered the thinking of this self-forgetting man.

An Unprofessional Servant of the Cross

Nor would he parade his motives. He has never acquired the art of pious talk. He is one of those who "have no religion to speak of." The English in him draws a veil in front of the chamber of the heart where motives have their rise; he would seem worse than he is rather than better. Nevertheless, one long look into the character of the work done through the years by this liberal spender of himself discerns the luminous life purpose—"The love of Christ constraineth me." These heaped-up activities are more than mere humanitarianism and love of one's kind; they are a Christian ministry. This man represents the goodly company of unprofessional servants of the cross.

Such men as Louis A. Holman are the mainstay of the church, the hope of the nation; their unadvertised, unassuming, unpaid, untiring and often unappreciated service for the world's welfare, from deepest Christian motives, counts more for the kingdom of heaven on earth than all the trained labors of a legion of specialists, to whom good works are a matter of professional activity.

One Thing a Boy Most Needs

What the latest wisdom of child welfare and boys' work is now writing into books and magazine articles Holman was practicing a generation ago; namely, that boys most need a man friend. Beneath and behind his wide diversity of forms of work for boys has been his gift of himself. He really cares for boys. A rare genius for drawing them into intimate friendship with himself is his peculiar equipment. It seems difficult to understand how one man can really be the personal, interested friend of so many boys. Their joys and sorrows, their wanderings and successes, he carries on his heart like a nursing father. Sentimental Tommy had "a way" with women; my friend has "a way" with boys. When first I went to the East I carried a letter from him to an Egyptian boy in a little town up the Nile; the last time we lunched together he had with him a bright-faced lad who had entered the navy and was looking forward to seeing lands afar. There is probably not a section of North America which does not hold some of his boys.

Always his work has been centered about a Sunday school class. This is a basic social service; a fundamental Christian endeavor; an essential layman's missionary work. It is easier for many men to give a thousand dollars to missions than to teach all the year through a class of boys in the Sunday school of their own church. But the latter is probably the bigger kingdom service. That it is "a man's job" let nobody doubt. Also it enables one to drink deeply of the fountain of human interest. One of Holman's boys reported that the reason for his absence the previous Sunday was because his shirt was being washed. "Why didn't you wear another shirt?" inquired the teacher.

"Gee! D'ye think a feller's got a million shirts?" was the disgusted retort.

Compensations for Work with Humanity

That class was in Clarendon Street Baptist church, Boston, of which the sainted Dr. A. J. Gordon was then the pastor. With the class went a boys' brigade, of which Holman was the captain. The problems that work entailed!—counsel for the ambitious, positions for the unemployed, guidance for the straying, diversion for the mischievous. The harder the boys leaned on this comrade, the richer grew his life.

There are compensations for work with human life. Holman's latest "find" is a boy with a talent for portrait painting; already he is a success. He it was who discovered a descendant of John Harvard's line over in old England and made it possible by interesting Cambridge folk for him to come to America, the first kinsman of the founder to enter Harvard College. Genealogy, by the way, is one of his incidental interests.

When he married, a modest home was established in Needham, Massachusetts, and there it naturally came about that the boys of the town gravitated toward him. His Sunday school class enlarged into a boys' club and that in time grew into the Needham Young People's Association, with a building of its own. Possibly they might have had a Young Men's Christian Association; but now they have what is better. And possessing Louis A. Holman there is no need of a salaried secretary. If this were an article of work for the boys of a town I would here tell in detail the how of it, but really the whole explanation is this one man who gave time and thought and pains and love to the work.

Harvard Gateway—Drawn by Louis A. Holman

If the portrait already drawn is that of a self-complacent professional worker for boys, glib with platform specifics for other communities' needs, it has failed utterly to reveal the man. This one never speaks in public except in his own church and neighborhood where his life makes weighty his words. He would take issue with anybody who labeled him an expert in boys' work; he counts himself rather a failure at it. For he has the humility of a great saint. Anybody can make him blush like a girl by talking about what he has done.

Withal, a most disconcerting sincerity and independence marks my friend. He is frank to the point of tactlessness. Truth is so inwrought into the fiber of his being that it is simply impossible for him to tell the little white lies that are conventional in society. Thus, at a reception in a house whose walls were "adorned" with original paintings by a member of the family I have seen him fairly in a cold perspiration lest his opinion of the pictures should be asked. He could not lie; he is inept at the art of evasion; and his gentle spirit shrank from wounding a friend.

This passion for sincerity is part of his artistic sense, and of his daily work as an art editor. Art and truth are one in his eyes. Whatever is untrue hurts him. If it is sufficiently unreal to be grotesque it amuses him. Passing the Congregational House on Beacon street one day, I made some conventional remark about the sculptured panels on the front. In less than six succinct sentences he revealed the incongruities of those squat figures, and showed me that the panels are really amusing.

Seeing Pictures in Nature and Life

The fine art of seeing pictures in nature is richly possessed by this lover of life and of all simple things. An artist's sense of composition leads him to say, for example, when on a stroll, "See what a pretty picture those two girls in brown make against the green background." The big dredge, the little boats and the sunset light on the entrance to the Cape Cod canal naturally group themselves into a painting in his mind's eye. His real relaxation, his family would say, is outdoor sketching in oil. We are photographing in the country and to complete a landscape he bids me drive some neighboring cows into the camera's field of vision, that the picture may have life. This is the sort of skill that has made his photographs known in sophisticated art circles.

Living is an art; and I suspect that Louis A. Holman has mastered it above many of those whose affluence might tempt another man to covetousness. He has learned the secret of being rich in profitable interests, not the "fads" of the idle, mark you, but a serious devotion to subjects worth while. He has specialized on Rembrandt, and is doubtless the best informed man on this continent upon all that concerns the master. If he were a rich man, I would warrant that his would be the best collection of Rembrandts in existence. Even better, possibly, than the actual possession of the canvases is his rich store of knowledge concerning the masterpieces and their painter. Without a college education, Mr. Holman is a highly cultivated man, a specialist in art and literature and an informed man of the world. Were I to point to him as a shining example of the self-trained American, he would retort that he was born and raised in Canada. None the less, he is true to the American type; all the worthier representative in that he has pursued the finer things that go into character rather than the money that goes into bank. His wise love of the beautiful is a wealth for which many a man would gladly give a million dollars.

Always to have some profitable enthusiasm aside from one's regular life interests is a mark of culture. Holman's interest in fine things to which the world pays no attention has been as profitable to society, in its way, as his work for boys. There is no need that I should speak in detail of his authoritative writings upon etchings nor of his original contributions to the world's knowledge upon the subject of Rembrandt and of Keats. For of late he has immersed himself in the pathetic life of that young master singer who is belatedly coming to his own. With Holman an interest means more than the reading of the usual books. He is not content unless he does original research work, since he is a born scholar. So he has quite reconstructed the daily life of Keats, his haunts and habits and friendships. The keepers of the research rooms of all the Boston libraries know him well. He has run out cleverly the faintest clew concerning Keats and has put flesh and blood upon the shadowy outlines of the poet's character. He has discovered an authentic and particularly interesting portrait of Keats.

All this involves an amount of time and correspondence and labor that would daunt a less doughty spirit. It must be done out of office hours and apart from time which home and friends and boys require. So tirelessly and effectively have these avocations been pursued that there are men, specialists in the realm of art and literature, who assume that Holman is one of these Boston savants who give their time to the concerns of scholarship. That he works from 8 to 5 at his desk and that between whiles he has wrought wondrously for Young America is wholly unimagined.

Like uncounted other Americans, Mr. Holman's home is one of his persisting enthusiasms. Folks whose fad is golf or the opera or Indian swamis often get into print, but the myriads of equally cultivated persons whose major enthusiasm is for their homes and families go quite unrecorded. The planning of a little home and its improvement through the years and delight in and service of the members of one's own family are normal interests which enrich more lives than can be numbered. When the home builder is a personality and an artist the result, as in Mr. Holman's case, is likely to be quite different from the "model home" shown in the department stores. One is led to conjecture the educational influence of this home upon the hundreds of boys who have been welcomed into it. A man's house and family are among the best tools that God puts into his hand for doing the world's work.

American Doctors in Turkey Win

The recent success of an American in obtaining in very short order a permit from the Ottoman authorities for the practice of medicine in Turkey brought out a remark from one of the Ottoman officials concerned, which is worthy of note. "Janum," said he, "what is the use of putting any obstacles in their way? If we find a reason for refusing to allow these Americans to pass with merely a colloquium, they take all our examinations and do a lot better than our own trained doctors, and so we might as well let them go!"

The average American physician who comes out here is a picked man and his subsequent career proves it, says The Orient of Constantinople. He will hold his own with his competitors anywhere. The old theory that those who couldn't succeed in America came out as foreign missionary physicians is exploded. In character as well as in attainments they rank with the best. And those who have been in their hospitals under their treatment are loud in their voluntary testimonials to their self-denying devotion and wonderful skill. Turkey would do herself and her people the greatest possible favor if she made practice in her borders easy instead of difficult for these consecrated knights of the lancet.

Religion on the Trade and Tourist Routes

"When Christianity Travels"—III

BY PRISCILLA LEONARD

"Should a Christian use the Sunday trains?" was answered by Miss Leonard in the issue of The Continent of June 5, and on August 14 she discussed "Taking Our Religion on the Train with Us." In this article she takes up the responsibility of Christians journeying in non-Christian countries as well as the influence, often for evil, of Christian nations along the broad lines of trade and travel. Herein lies more than a hint as to why missionaries are not always wholly successful in their efforts to spread Christianity in the dark places

IN THE "ROSE RED CITY" of Chiating on the Min river in western China a New England traveler happened to be staying a year or two ago for a few days, and this is the record of what was going on.

"Chiating boasts of two strong Protestant missions well equipped with schools and a hospital, and they are hard at work making Chiating over body and soul. At the time of my visit they were engaged in a strenuous contest with the representatives of the British American Tobacco Company and both sides were placarding the town with posters setting forth the evils or the benefits of cigarette smoking."

Chiating, so this same record of "A Wayfarer in China" explains, is close to Mount Omei, the holy of holies of Buddhist China. In this province of Szechuan and the neighboring one of Yunnan the Chinese, heathen though they are, are making the most heroic efforts to stamp out the opium habit. Every farmer who plants the poppy plants it at his peril. No buyer or seller of opium is safe. Where poppy fields once constituted a third of the cultivated land, there are none now to be seen. Into this district where heathenism has tried hard to fight one bad habit civilized comers from Christian lands are doing their best to introduce another. The cigarette habit is deplored by all who know its effects upon boys and young men. Yet it is traveling into China from Christian nations."

How China Knows There Are Good Men Elsewhere

If the missionary was the only Christian to travel in foreign lands there would be no talk as to Christian missions being "a failure." Dr. Soothill tells of a Chinese captain on a river boat who spoke lightly about the missionaries. An Englishman on board applauded the criticism, upon which the captain said, turning unexpectedly upon him: "That's all well enough—but if it were not for the missionaries we should not know that there were any good men in your country!"

It is the citizens of Christian lands who travel and trade in Africa and Oceanica and the East who thwart and destroy the patient labor of the missionary. In West Africa the traders complain that the natives who become converts are worthless and unreliable. But traveling at the same time as the gospel to that barbaric coast have come trade, gin and cruel, rapacious officials and the vices of white civilization. The gospel is not left to do its transforming work. It is mixed up in the native mind with its English and French and Belgian supposed exponents in the traders' warehouses and the government compounds. The very men who criticise the missionary are the ones who are daily making his work almost impossible of success. That missions succeed at all under these confusing conditions is a proof of their power.

When the British were first pressing into Afghanistan from India some sixty years or so ago two men went up toward Herat. One was a man whom even the Moslem holy men respected for his personal purity and goodness. The other took advantage of Moslem surroundings to establish a harem in the city where he stayed as a representative of the Indian government. The Afghans were bewildered. Here were two traveling Christians—which was the true one? It was said by the chiefs in Herat afterwards that the disastrous first Afghan war would never have happened if the Afghan nation had believed that the righteous man really represented England. It was their fear that the unrighteous man did that made them distrust the Christian power.

It is an established practice among many travelers who are Christians at home to visit from sheer curiosity the worst sections of Oriental towns. They desire to see the most heathen dances and view for themselves the nautch girls of idol temples and the geishas of Tokyo. Or, along another line of curiosity, they desire to enter the sanctuaries of the Eastern faiths and look carelessly at hideous and evil ceremonies. A devil-dance or a witch-hunt, it is all one to them, and no sense of responsibility or decency stands in the way. Guides are furnished as a regular and paying business for such Christian travelers in every port along the globe trotting routes. What must the effect be upon the minds of the guides and native inhabitants?—not to speak of the effect upon the travelers themselves of what they tolerantly see.

The responsibility of each Christian journeying in a non-Christian land is a daily responsibility and a great one. Harold Begbie tells of how the Sadr Amin, one of the leading Hindus in Almorah, welcomed a pioneer Salvation Army preacher. The Salvationist had given up a lucrative place in the Indian civil service, put on native dress and traveled, barefoot, from village to village, preaching in field and street. The Sadr Amin had heard of him and begged him to be his guest. The Christian replied that, his host being of such high caste, the low caste people of Almorah would not be able to approach. But the Sadr Amin replied, "Let no one ask his caste; who worships God belongs to God." People thronged to the house and listened eagerly to the gospel. When, some time later, an English official heard of it he questioned the Sadr Amin, astonished.

"You have always been regarded as a stanch Hindu, having no sympathy with Christianity; how is it, then, that you received this man into your house and even presided for him at his meeting?"

"Sahib," was the Hindu's reply, "had I seen Christianity such as this before I should myself have been a Christian."

The pity of it is that Christianity is presented so often by the Christian traveler in a way to repel or to confuse the heathen. How is the Chinese coolie who carries the voyager's baggage going to know that the profanity and ill temper of his employer is not the usual thing among the followers of "the Jesus-God"? How is the Hindu clerk working for an English firm which is fighting hard to maintain its opium trade in China going to be converted by a dozen missionaries belonging to the unscrupulous merchant's race? Nothing has so fatally given the lie to the Christian religion in foreign lands as the export trade of Christian nations. Even where Christian governments, as in the Kongo, are restricting the liquor trade, the individual trade keeps on and the liquor is exported from a Christian land to these outlaw dealers.

Christianity with Its Old-Time Power

The Christianity that travels along the missionary route has all of its old-time power. It transforms and enriches the lands to which it comes. But the Christianity that travels along the trade route and the Christianity that travels along the tourist route are often the worst foes to all sincere religion. The Christian sailor as he touches at this or that port—does it not seem like a mockery to call him a Christian? Yet he belongs either to the navy of a great Christian power or to its mercantile marine. It may be that only through his profanity will the native ever hear the name of the God whom the Christians worship. And there are more sailors than missionaries, as everybody knows.

In the South seas the "blackbirding" ships which kidnap the islanders for laborers in Australia and South Africa sail under the flags of civilized Christian nations. They take the kidnaped victims to lands where the government is supposed to be Christian. How shall such a traveling extension of Christianity impress the peoples which it kidnaps? Is it any wonder that missionaries, sailing into these seas and landing on these islands, have been massacred before they could explain their errand?

Suppose Christianity traveled always Christianly. Suppose that the English cut off opium raising in India where they have control and would not let it be exported to China to ruin the heathen in body and soul. Suppose England, Germany, America, France, Italy and Portugal forbade all traffic in intoxicants in Africa and by common consent enforced prohibition. Suppose Christian nations unitedly and separately entered the territory of heathen nations only as friends and tried to preserve the rights of native peoples instead of annexing the most desirable territory and assuming authority with the strong hand. Suppose the ships of war of Christian pow-

THE HOME COUNCIL

Margaret Gordon's Glory Night

BY ANNE PORTER JOHNSON

"I'M GOING to have a full week, Edward," said Margaret Gordon to her husband one Monday morning as they sat at breakfast. "How I'm ever going to manage the whole list is a question. The ladies of Central church have asked for a couple of solos for Tuesday evening, I'm on the program for two numbers for the concert Wednesday evening, and Mrs. Adams has begged for at least one song for her reception Thursday afternoon. On Thursday evening I'm down for three numbers at Mrs. Montgomery's musicale, if you please. Oh, I'm climbing, Edward; I'm reaching a little higher all the time."

"You'll certainly be quite busy, Margaret, to be sure! What do you expect to get out of it all, eh?" teased her husband.

Mrs. Gordon sighed. "A little glory, perhaps, but——"

"But not enough." Mr. Gordon laughed as he finished the sentence for her.

"No, never enough!" returned his wife.

WHEN Mr. Gordon left for his office, his wife at once began on the full week. She was looking through the pile of new music for songs suitable to the various entertainments, when Mrs. Courtright, the capsheaf in society circles, called up. She was giving a reception on Friday afternoon in honor of a friend from Paris, "just the most exclusive folks, you know," and would Mrs. Gordon "accept an invitation to be present and sing a number or two?"

Of course Mrs. Gordon was delighted to accept the invitation and would sing gladly. Indeed, this was the goal toward which her eyes had been turned for some time. Mrs. Courtright and the exclusive set meant glory, and Mrs. Gordon wanted glory.

"I'm very glad, my dear," said her husband that evening, smiling into her flushed face. "It certainly means something to get in there."

"Isn't it fine, Edward? The good graces of Mrs. Courtright and the society set are everything."

"Perhaps, Margaret, perhaps——" Mr. Gordon paused a moment. "I hope you will enjoy the week, all of it, Margaret, and especially the full-blown glory at the end," he added with a whimsical smile.

THE CENTRAL church affair, the concert, Mrs. Adams's reception, Mrs. Montgomery's musicale all went off in fine style. As she worked her way through them, Mrs. Gordon saw Mrs. Courtright's luxurious home just ahead. All the week she was really singing to exclusive folks on the boulevard and thinking of the full-blown glory there.

The church people were very complimentary, the concert audience showered her with bouquets, Mrs. Montgomery's guests applauded in a decorous and subdued manner. But now all was done and the real glory of the week was at hand. Mrs. Gordon was about to put her foot on the top round of the social ladder—she had almost forgotten there was a bottom round.

Just as she sat down to her light luncheon on the day when the glory was to be full-blown the doorbell rang. Knowing the maid was busy she answered the call herself. On the step stood a tousle-headed, barefooted boy. Mrs. Gordon looked him over from his tousled head to his grimy feet while she absently took the paper which he held out to her. She noticed in his face the old look of a child to whom life's hard experiences had come too soon and too fast.

"It's a concert for Bob," he explained, touching the paper. "He's the boss of the shiners and he's sick, bad sick. He's got to get away somewheres or he'll—he'll—die." The awful last word was only a whisper, as he looked up appealingly into Mrs. Gordon's face.

"You must have the wrong number. I'm not acquainted with any such boy."

"Of course you don't know Bob, but we thought you'd come down and sing at the concert tonight. It's one of them—them benefit businesses, don't you know? And all the folks down there'll pay the dime to get in if you'll sing. We need a good deal of money—fresh air costs scads of money, and Bob has to have lots to make him well."

"Why, child, you must be mistaken! It's some other singer. I'm very busy and, anyway, I never sing for such affairs."

"We've got you down on the program, though, argued the boy, pointing at the paper which she still held in her hand, the appeal in his eyes deepening. "The boys say they'll make things buzz after every tune you sing," he went on encouragingly. "Skinny can whistle till your head splits and Jerry can clap his hands together like them steel hammers, and Pete—oh, say, Pete says if you'll come he'll give you the Mugg alley yell—it's great! We'll treat you square."

"You'll have to find someone else," Mrs. Gordon heard herself saying, wondering why she did not close the door.

The boy shook his head. "They won't have nobody else," he said. "Me and the gang was outside the window over at the concert the night you sung them up an' down, round an' round, whirligig tunes about robins and trees and leaves and water and—and green things," he went on. "Nobody else'll do. If you only knew Bob! Why, us boys can't get along without Bob, and if he—he—dies"—his voice fell to a whisper—"we can't stand it. Us boys thought and thought what we could do to get Bob out to the fresh air, and Jerry says, 'Let's have a concert and have that lady sing.' That's you. We voted unanimous and—and nobody else'll do because we told all the folks in Mugg alley we had you on the program. We made 'em with a pencil and put you down as the 'shiny lady,' because your dress was covered with sparkles. We wasn't sure of your name."

"It's impossible!" Mrs. Gordon frowned. "I can't do it. You'll have no trouble in finding something else that will do just as well."

The door was closing. She saw the boy walk slowly out of the gate. Once he started back as though he had thought of a fresh argument to strengthen his plea, but as his glance fell on the closed door he turned again and went down the street, a tousle-headed, barefooted, disappointed little lad.

Mrs. Gordon shook herself. "Why am I watching the boy? It's an absurd request! The idea of singing to the miserable class of people living in Mugg alley! Why, I don't even know where it is, but it sounds like poverty, filth, disease and degradation all in one!"

MRS. COURTRIGHT'S beautiful parlors were decorated with the most costly plants and blossoms. Her guests were ablaze with jewels. The luxury, the grandeur, the lavish display of lace and diamonds brought a glow of excitement into Mrs. Gordon's cheeks. She had attained. Her place in the exclusive circle was fixed. What an infinite satisfaction to have reached the top of the ladder, if—if only—— The wistful eyes of a tousle-headed, barefooted boy looked out at her from behind the mahogany table, they gazed at her from the bowl of magnificent orchids, they stared at her from the music sheet from which she sang. For all that, she remembered the heights upon which she stood and she sang well. Hostess and guests took her into their arms. They admired and complimented her in glowing terms. It was honest praise—Mrs. Gordon knew it. But somehow the ragged lad on the doorstep was mixed up with all of it. These people lived far from the ragged side of life; they were not acquainted with tousle-headed boys; they never went pleasure riding in Mugg alley. They lived on the boulevards and avenues and were not often disturbed by the direct appeals of little, homeless waifs, to whom even fresh air is too expensive.

"HOW WAS IT, Margaret?" questioned Mr. Gordon that evening across the dinner table.

Mrs. Gordon looked up quizzically. "Oh, Mrs. Courtright's reception? Lovely, Edward! Magnificent!"

"And the glory, Margaret? Did you get as much as you expected out of the week?"

"Oh, yes, more—perhaps. But—somehow it wasn't just what I—— But come, I have an engagement still for this evening, and I need an escort. Where is Mugg alley, Edward?"

"Mugg alley!"

"Yes, the boy said Mugg alley. We'll have to find it. I'm to sing for the benefit of Bob, the boss of the shiners."

"Mugg alley! Why, Margaret, that's down

WHAT THE CHIMNEY SANG

Over the chimney the night wind sang,
And chanted a melody no one knew;
And the Woman stopped, as her babe she tossed,
And thought of the one she had long since lost,
And said, as her teardrops back she forced:
"I hate the wind in the chimney."

Over the chimney the night-wind sang
And chanted a melody no one knew;
And the Children said, as they closer drew:
"'Tis some witch that is cleaving the black night through,
'Tis a fairy trumpet that just then blew,
And we fear the wind in the chimney."

Over the chimney the night wind sang
And chanted a melody no one knew;
And the Man, as he sat on his hearth below,
Said to himself: "It will surely snow,
And fuel is dear and wages low,
And I'll stop the leak in the chimney."

Over the chimney the night wind sang
And chanted a melody no one knew;
But the Poet listened and smiled, for he
Was Man and Woman and Child, all three,
And said: "It is God's own harmony,
This wind we hear in the chimney."

Those Thanksgiving Hints

Are you remembering those "sane Thanksgiving" suggestions of 300 words each, that you are going to write for the Home Council? They must be on the editor's desk by Oct. 25, remember. Perhaps you overlooked the original announcement. If so you will be glad to know that The Continent wishes to help its friends to have a "truly" Thanksgiving, with fun a plenty, and still with the original significance of the day kept in mind. To accomplish this it has asked suggestions based on actual experience, for ways of celebrating a sane Thanksgiving. For each of these suggestions published $1 will be paid. Here is an opportunity to pass your own good times along.

When Is a Draft Not a Draft?

Willie was a smart boy, and ambitious. His first position was a post in a local bank.

"Well, Willie," asked his uncle one day, "how are you getting on in business? I suppose you will soon be manager?"

"Yes, uncle," replied Willie, "I'm already a draft clerk!"

"A draft clerk! Good boy; and what are your duties?"

"I open and shut the windows accordin' to orders," said Willie, "and close the doors after people that leave 'em open."

Martha's Burglar Scare

A True Story

BY ELEANOR E. HAWORTH

THEY WERE three little girls—Martha, Chloe and Katherine. They were playmates. Martha was 7, Katherine was 7 too, and Chloe was 9. They went to the same school.

One day when they came home from school Martha asked Chloe and Katherine to wait while she went into her house to ask her mother to let her go home with them to play. She ran up the steps and opened the front door, all in a great hurry.

In just a minute she came back—but such a different Martha! She was white and trembly, and so frightened she could just say, as she tumbled down the steps, "A burglar—there's a burglar!"

All three began to run before they had a thought of what to do. Then Chloe, glancing down a side street, saw their friend, a giant policeman, making his afternoon beat, and the three ran to him with their story.

"Oh, there's a burglar in my house," cried Martha with big eyes. Then she burst out crying: "I want my mamma! I want my mamma!" Chloe, being older, was more composed, and she told of Martha's going into the house. But Martha broke in: "Yes, and I went all through to the kitchen to find my mamma, and I heard a man talking in the kitchen, and I heard another man tell him to 'take the box,' and I knew it was a burglar and—and—oh, I want my mamma!"

The big, kindly policeman took out his billy to encourage them and waved it about and assured the three excited children he could manage any burglars, no matter how many, and they needn't be afraid. So saying, he marched up the front steps and the girls followed in a timid, half-scared, half-bold little bunch. Through they went from hall to parlor, from parlor to sitting room—when, sure enough, they heard two men talking in the kitchen. It did sound burglarlike, and the girls shivered when they saw their protector silently push the swinging door till he could see through the crack.

Then how he laughed as he swung the door wide open, for there sat the groceryman on the corner of the table, swinging his feet as he talked to the milkman, who sat tilted back in a kitchen chair.

Just then Martha's mother came hurrying from a neighbor's and her astonished face sent the policeman off in roars of laughter before he could enlighten the groceryman, the milkman and Martha's mamma as to the cause of his mirth.

And much ashamed was Martha
To think that she had run
Because she thought the grocer
A burglar with a gun.

Used Legs for Hoop

An old admiral, whose long sea service had given his legs a decided outward curvature, once had a singular adventure on this account with a ship's pet. The crew of the ship owned a large black spaniel, and took great pains teaching him to jump. A man, standing up, would put one foot against his other knee, thus making a hole for Nep, the dog, to jump through. The dog always jumped through readily, though if his trainer's legs happened to be short it was a tight squeeze.

One day the admiral came aboard from the flagship on a visit of inspection. Happening to walk to the forward part of the ship, he was spied by the dog. Nep stood a moment looking at the admiral's bow legs. Suddenly the dog made a rush at the legs and a mad leap through the tempting gap. In astonishment at the black tornado that had passed beneath him, the admiral whirled quickly about to see what was the cause. The dog took this action as the signal for an "encore" and jumped again. Once more the admiral turned, and again the dog jumped.

The bewildered face of the admiral and the serious attention of Nep to what he imagined was his business were too much for the gravity of the bystanders, and, forgetting the respect due to rank, they all roared with laughter. A sailor, however, had enough presence of mind to break from the crowd and catch the dog by the collar. He led him off, and Nep seemed to wonder why he did not receive the praise due to such spirited efforts. The excited admiral got but an imperfect explanation of the affair from the spectators, for they could hardly tell him that his legs had been used as a kind of circus hoop for a dog.

Rhymes to Remember

Good-by, good-by to summer!
For the summer's nearly done;
The garden smiling faintly,
Cool breezes in the sun;
Our thrushes now are silent,
Our swallows flown away—
But Robin's here with coat of brown,
And ruddy breast-knot gay.
Robin, Robin Redbreast,
O Robin dear!
Robin sings so sweetly
In the falling of the year.

Bright yellow, red and orange,
The leaves come down in hosts;
The trees are Indian princes,
But soon they'll turn to ghosts;
The scanty pears and apples
Hang russet on the bough;
It's autumn, autumn, autumn late.
'Twill soon be winter now.
Robin, Robin Redbreast,
O Robin dear!
And what will this poor Robin do?
For pinching days are near.

The fireside for the cricket,
The wheat stack for the mouse,
When trembling night winds whistle,
And moan all round the house;
The frosty ways like iron,
The branches plumed with snow—
Alas! in winter dead and dark,
Where can poor Robin go?
Robin, Robin Redbreast,
O Robin dear!
And a crumb of bread for Robin
His little heart to cheer.

—William Allingham.

"Spell 'dough,' Dick," directed a teacher of a little black pupil.

"D-o," said Dick, promptly.

"No, that is not right," smiled the teacher. "Who can tell Dick how and why he is wrong?"

"He's wrong 'cause there's two kinds ob do," shrilled another youngster, "de do' what yo' shets, an' de do what you eats—an' de do what yo' eats is writ widout de 'postrophe at de end."

Water Barrels of the Desert

BY STANLEY A. HUNTER

DID YOU KNOW, boys and girls, that though you may think the cactus has only one use, and that a poor one—to prick fingers—it really in some of its varieties is a very generous and useful plant? One of its uses is to furnish drink for the thirsty, in the hot country in which it grows, along the southwestern borders of our country and in Mexico. Indians, to be sure, have learned to make an intoxicating beverage of this liquid—pulque, it is called; but in its natural state, before it ferments, it is quite harmless, and grateful to the dry throat of the desert traveler. There is a variety called the saguaro whose trunk contains a good deal of sap. It is rather bitter to the taste, yet it could save life in time of great thirst. Another variety is known as the barrel cactus, which holds within its skinny and sharp edged cylinders a very fair drink. In order to get this liquor, the dry spikes must be burned off with a match, and its top crushed or broken in with a heavy stone or mallet. The cactus plant, it has also recently been discovered, also makes good fodder after the sharp spines are burned off, leaving the juicy leaves harmless and wholesome for the hungry cattle. A blast of flame from a gasoline torch makes the leaves ready for eating. Luther Burbank, who has done such wonderful things with plants, has also developed a spineless cactus that serves the purpose.

There are nearly a thousand different kinds of cactus. What some of them are the two children in the picture are trying to discover. The size and shape vary greatly. In the public park at Riverside, Cal., there is one which measured nearly thirty-three feet last summer, and still was not full grown. One of peculiar shape is called the organo by the Mexicans, because it is straight and upright and resembles an organ pipe.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

October 26, 1913—The Sin of Moses and Aaron

Everyday View of the Lesson

By J. L. Scott

Lesson Text, Numbers 20:1-13. Golden Text, Psalm 19:14: Let the words of my mouth and the meditation of my heart be acceptable in thy sight, O Jehovah, my rock and my redeemer.

A literal desert separates this lesson from the last—a desert not of rocks and sand, but of incident and history. One week ago Israel encamped upon the border of Canaan. There the people refused to go forward. Fear laid its tremulous hand upon the nation's heart, and Moses at the command of God ordered a retreat. Again the people faced the south and for nearly forty years the desert hemmed them in. The march from Egypt had been one of faith, and with faith as a factor the conquest of Canaan was assured from the first. But the Israelites feared the giants of Anak more than they trusted in the promises of God.

Our Mistakes Essential to the Development of God's Purpose

Has it ever occurred to you, in the light of the past, that our mistakes are essential to the divine purpose? Had Israel invaded Canaan, in the lesson of a week ago, would the result have been better? The forty years' additional sojourn in the desert was necessary. How they were passed has escaped record. Forty years is a long period to drop out of one's life. But all the record of what Jesus said or did could easily be compressed into a few days. The rest is silence.

So with Moses. Forty years ago he was in the vicinity of the setting of today's lesson. How he was occupied during those years remains a mystery. Of two things, however, we are certain: Some were coming into the world and some were going out. The old trees were falling and new forest was fast taking their place. At last but two survived, Caleb and Joshua, of the old generation.

Moses has returned to the borders of Canaan, and with him a new nation bent on the purpose of forty years ago. The generation is a different one, but the people are essentially the same. Human nature does not die. The father lives in his son, sometimes stronger than before. Kadesh is repeated in every age.

Sorrow Comes to Moses in the Death of Miriam

While he was waiting at the gate of Canaan an event occurred that must have rested heavily upon Moses's heart. "And Miriam died there, and was buried there." Miriam was the sister of Moses and older than he by several years. To her he owed his life and much else of which history says nothing. For forty years she had been his shadow. The glory that came to him had come also to her. With pride she had watched his upward career from the little cabin in the marshes to the virtual throne of a nation. To his song she had been the chorus. Once there had been a rift in the lute, when the Ethiopian sister-in-law came between her brother and herself and jealousy ruled her soul. God smote her in the face and for seven days she was driven from the camp. But love is born of suffering. Israel refused to proceed without its prophetess, and Moses cried unto the Lord, "Heal her, O God, I beseech thee." God heard and healed, as he always does. But there comes a time when the lips of prayer are dumb. Moses and Aaron looked upon the dead, and could only look.

The second approach to the borders of Canaan was largely a reproduction of the first. The entire journey had been marked by complaining. Fault finding was a national characteristic. The tendencies of the fathers survived in the children, and the long servitude in Egypt was not calculated to produce a nation of song writers. Physical wants were ever present and the question of water met the people at every turn. Marah, Elim and Horeb marked their progress. With each new want came the same old disposition to complain. Whenever the fathers became thirsty they wished themselves back in Egypt and the children regretted that they had not shared in the disasters of the earthquake. As a matter of fact they wished nothing of the kind, but we like to strap our burdens upon the shoulders of others.

Moses had all his life been bearing the burdens of others. Some people have a genius for dismissing care. Like the priest in the parable they pass by on the other side and forget the man by the wayside. Such a spirit is not the spirit of Christ. "In all their afflictions he was afflicted." To share the burdens of others is the secret of all real worth. Such a burden sharer was Moses and such, in a higher degree, is the Christ.

Again the people besieged their leaders with the old complaint, "Why have ye brought the assembly of Jehovah into this wilderness, that we should die there?" Moses and Aaron, as they had so often done before, fell upon their faces and implored God for help. The glory of the Lord appeared to them and with the rod in his hand Moses was to speak to the rock and await an answer. He was now an old man. His passion remained but not the will to guide it. The memory of Horeb came back and once more he felt himself strong. For the moment he forgot himself. "Hear now, ye rebels, shall we bring you forth water out of this rock?" And with his rod he smote the rock.

Disobedience of Moses Loses to Him the Promised Land

Commanded to speak, he struck. It may look like a small matter, but it involved the principle of obedience, which is ever vital. Necessity is more than form. The people needed water and need is a wordless prayer. God would not punish the many because of one. By this act Moses forfeited his right to enter the land of promise.

This incident has been accorded far too much space by the commentators. God's punishments are not arbitrary, but the natural consequences of the offense. And even here we see the element of mercy. Moses was an old man. Broken by the cares of state and church he was no longer his former self. His patience that had withstood a thousand storms began to yield. When one loses the power of self-control he is no longer fit to be a leader. The lawgiver had earned his rest and on Nebo's lonely summit a grave was being made ready to receive him.

The Lesson Verse by Verse

By Hermon D. Jenkins

ANALYSIS—Age had left its mark upon Moses and his last days must be judged accordingly. The physical distress of the people was great, and Jehovah does not rebuke them so sharply as did Moses. Moses went to God in prayer, as men still go in their serious perplexities. In one single result God at once penalizes and rewards his servants.

It has happened more than once that a great leader has in the last days of his illustrious career been provoked to anger by the ingratitude of those for whom he has unselfishly labored. Age becomes irritable except as restrained by grace. The aged man cannot laugh off fault findings and insults as he could when life was young and his own courage self-sufficient. Every one approaching the sunset years ought to be on his guard that he lose not in age the respect, the veneration men have paid him in the years of his vigor and self-control.

The Israelites were still at Kadesh-barnea, which our American Sunday school leader, Dr. Henry Clay Trumbull, has identified with the modern Ain Kadesh, the "holy well" or spring, fifty miles south of Beersheba and so not far from the boundary of Palestine proper. It seemed doubly hard that just at the gate of the promised land the water supply failed and the fretful and complaining people laid their troubles at the door of their best friends. This was the last straw which broke the back of Moses's patient forbearance.

Verse 1—The children of Israel had reached Kadesh thirty-eight years before (Num. 13:26), but, afraid to attack the strong races which possessed the northern land, they had occupied the wide plain of Kadesh and the valleys which led out from it, as pasture for their flocks. The one notable event during these years was the death of Miriam, who, despite her one-time jealousy of her great brother, retained a foremost place in the thoughts and affections of the people.

Verse 2—When, apparently in preparation for an onward movement, all the tribes were summoned to the central site, the waters proved insufficient for the multitude. It is probable, too, that the people were disposed to criticise the policy which drew them in from their distant feeding grounds, a policy which hinted at new travels and increased dangers.

Verse 3—The people did not hesitate to tell Moses they wished they were dead like their brothers who had perished in the forest fires at Taberah (Num. 11:1-3).

Verses 4-5—Thousands of would-be settlers from our western territories streamed back East in the '70s after summers of drought and grasshoppers bringing reports of Nebraska, Kansas and the Dakotas similar to what the Israelites thought of Kadesh and the Palestine that lay beyond it. It was in their opinion no place to live in, and the parties who had encouraged their immigration were fools or knaves.

Moses and Aaron Immediately Helped Through Prayer to God

Verse 6—It will be remembered that when the first congress of the thirteen colonies had been long in session without other result than to disclose their mutual jealousy and to augment their suspicions of one another, Benjamin Franklin, who had been in youth prone to skepticism, rose in his place and solemnly proposed that they should ask God, the Ruler of nations, to lead them out of their perplexities. From that day to this the nation has turned to God in every great distress. So Moses and Aaron, driven almost to despair, prostrated themselves before Jehovah in the tabernacle and seemed ready to die in sheer surrender of all their hopes.

Verse 7—Their prayer was answered even before it was spoken (Is. 65:24). The best proof that prayer is answered is that men continue to pray.

Verse 8—Aaron had preserved the rod which had been the instrument of signal wonders in the court of Pharaoh thirty-eight to forty years before and at various times had been used as a "sign" during the years ensuing. It was now to be used in a new manner to show the power and will of Jehovah to keep his people from extermination. This signal miracle was to be celebrated in the annals and songs of the nation (Ps. 78:16), and it has remained a symbol of divine goodness and love ever since.

The Prophet Loses Power When He Loses His Humility

Verse 10—When Moses began to scold his power began to wane. When a minister loses his temper in his pulpit he would better retire. When a commissioner to an ecclesiastical body begins to let fly the arrows of his wrath at his opponents he has already lost his battle. It demands a higher type of manhood to retain an even mind under unjust provocation than to take a city (Prov. 16:32), and perhaps because of the infirmities of age, Moses lost out just as he was nearest victory.

Verse 11—Dr. Trumbull is authority for the statement that "there exists at Kadesh a large single mass or small hill of solid rock. It is the only visible naked rock in the whole district, and from it still flows an abundant stream."

Verse 12—Good men as were Moses and Aaron, God does not permit so flagrant a sin to pass without marks of his displeasure. Many an old soldier has tried to prove that except for his personal courage or personal interposition the day had been lost and with it the cause. So Moses claimed the glory that was God's. But if Moses and Aaron were not to enter the promised land, neither were they to bear the cares of the exodus longer or be distressed by the problems which confronted Caleb and Joshua. A warrior's hardest fight oft occurs after his battles are all won. Moses and Aaron each had served and each now entered into rest. With them their generation came practically to a close and it was left for younger men to take up the march.

BY EDWARD ARTHUR WICHER

TOPIC—The marriage of the king's son. Matthew 22:2-14.

This is a startling picture of the banquet of the Messianic kingdom, which is by turns entrancing and terrible to behold.

Though the frame of the picture is similar to that of the great supper, it is no duplicate of the other. The motive here is quite distinct. The figure of a banquet was a frequent one for the representation of the kingdom of the Messiah and its blessedness. In Matthew the Messiah is always the bridegroom and the bride is naturally the community of Christian believers. But this latter feature of the situation, while it is implied, is not here expressed. Our Lord often spoke of the kingdom as a feast; but in the present instance the details are distinctive. This whole discourse bears the marks of the latest period of the ministry of Jesus. His rejection is practically accomplished. The city of Jerusalem is doomed by her own hardness of heart. And this Jerusalem and this doom are enlarged in his vision and dissolved into the universal doom of those who persist in following in the way of the Jews' rejection.

In St. Luke's narrative the story is simply that of a landed proprietor who gives a great supper to which he invites his neighbors. Here the host is a king. The occasion of the banquet is the highest; it is the marriage of his son. In true Oriental fashion the father of the bridegroom provides the supper. His invitation to the marriage feast is not merely an invitation; coming from a royal personage, it is also a command. The royal authority of the host is the fundamental note of the parable.

God calls us to mercy; but behind the call there is the absolute sovereignty of the universe. His call makes its appeal not only to our affections but also to our conscience. Deep in the human soul his message sounds; not only "Wilt thou come?" but also "Thou shalt come." We behold the blending of the mercy and the longsuffering of God. It is no ordinary feast to which he bids us.

To refuse his invitation is to declare that we are no longer his friends, that we no more desire to be acceptable to him. It is to declare that we prefer the provision of the world to the banquet of the palace of the King.

Before the invitation is given there is evidently a spirit of rebellion abroad among the king's subjects. Their thoughts and feelings are averse to him. The offer of this generous hospitality, instead of reconciling them to their ruler, only exasperates them to the breaking point. Are they beggars that they should be fed with the bounty of the king? Have they not food enough of their own? And clothing enough? And company sufficient? They will be under obligations to no king, and they cast his proffered kindness back in his face.

Some of them professed themselves unable to treat this invitation seriously and they went lightly on their ways, one to his farm and another to his merchandise. They had serious work of their own to perform. But in the case of others the irritation reacted upon themselves and their opposition broke out into a wild rage. They laid hold upon the servants who had brought them the invitation, insulted them and slaughtered them.

There are men who cannot take seriously the sovereignty of God. They have sovereignties of their own which they take seriously—gold and the lust of power and the might of knowledge and mere self-will. They cannot take seriously the claims to authority of Jesus Christ. They ask the question why this man, dead nineteen centuries, should still control the intellect and conscience of mankind. They cannot take seriously the law of God, and wonder if morality does not change with changes of age and climate. They cannot take seriously the religion of Jesus, for it seems to them to be a thing fitted to be a refuge for weak natures, rather than an inspiration to strong, full-blooded men. So they go, one to his counting house, and another to his ball and another to his laboratory, and treat God lightly.

Others would be glad to destroy God. They would turn him out of his world. And if they cannot do that, they would put his servants out of the world. It was in this spirit of blind fanaticism that they slew Jesus Christ and all the company of martyrs since the days of righteous Abel. It is inherent in the spirit of worldliness to hate the servant of God and to try to destroy him.

But he who would destroy God and the servants of God destroys himself. God would save every sinner, he would welcome him to his banquet; but the hostile he must destroy because he is God. The dying martyr may cry, "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge," but unless the murderers repent they shall all likewise perish. God is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity. Thus the leading Pharisees and prominent Israelites of Jesus's day were set aside from the Messianic feast and punished according to their rebelliousness.

But the feast of the king will have its guests, and again the regal entertainer sends forth his servants, who are to gather up the beggars from the highway, the honorable and the dishonorable, the men who were regarded by their associates as being good and those who were looked upon as bad. God's sovereign grace calls sinners. He calls them as they are and makes them what they ought to be. It is theirs only to respond to his call. Thus from all sorts and conditions of men the wedding was furnished forth with guests.

Although without the hall there is the darkness of judgment, within there is the gladness of the feast. The kingdom is not all work, neither is it all rejoicing; it is a combination of these. No one parable sets forth the whole scope of the kingdom, but the teaching of one supplements that of another. Here we see the joy of the chosen guests gathered around the royal board.

The story of the guest who had not on a wedding garment is really a separate parable. As it stands it may be regarded as an appendix to the parable we have been considering. The king with true Oriental magnificence provided robes for all who came, so that the feast might have the splendor becoming the high occasion. One man contemptuously refused the king's robe. He was good enough in his own clothes. The spiritual significance of the whole situation is given us in the words of Isaiah 61:10. God gives every man a robe of righteousness and no man durst despise the righteousness of God.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SERVICE

October 26, 1913

THE OUTREACHING LIFE

TOPIC—Missionary essentials, home and abroad. IV. Going. Matthew 22:1-10.

The hundred Korean Christians who were recently delivered from false imprisonment and probable death were rescued, primarily, by the activity of Christians in America; which illustrates the remarkable truth that in these wonderful times it is possible for anybody, anywhere, to "go into all the world."

A distinguished New York educator recently remarked: "Do you know what ails the Christian ministry in America today? The best men are all being sent abroad into foreign mission service." Whether the main contention is warranted or not, the compliment to the character of the mission force is merited. It was not so very long ago that the sneer was common that missionaries were second rate men who could not make a living in their home land. Now even the critics admit that the caliber of the church's foreign ambassadors is beyond cavil. The objection shifts to the ground that they are too good!

The twentieth century has a long arm which reaches everywhere. By using it even the least of the stay-at-homes may go, in person or representatively, to the ends of the earth.

Not all Christians are wanted on the mission field, but all are asked to have the spirit which says, "Here am I; send me."

One curious effect of the rise of second and third generation missionaries has been the dissipation of the old notion that the chief characteristic of foreign missions is its physical hardships. Now that the sons and grandsons of pioneer missionaries by the scores and even hundreds are returning to the field to share the work of their forbears we are coming to understand that missions as a career must have something worth while to offer. True, the argument proves the sturdy stuff of which missionaries' children are made; but it also induces saner thought concerning the church's work abroad. The primitive conditions which the pioneers met have been steadily improved, and the average foreign missionary lives in a comfortable home, has all the necessities of life, some conveniences and a few luxuries. His hardships on the whole do not equal those of the home missionary in this land.

In one Japanese community they call Christianity the "Fulton religion," because Dr. Samuel Fulton of the Southern Presbyterian Church was long the sole representative of the gospel there. The incident reveals one of the rich rewards of the missionary. His privilege is to embody Christianity in himself, so that in all his manner of life men and women who are totally unacquainted with the teachings of Jesus may read the gospel. To a peculiar extent he becomes a "living epistle." His life is read before his words are understood.

The famine victims in mid-China used to mutter "Yoaming! Yaoming!"—"It wants our lives! It wants our lives!" That is true of all afflictions and blessings, and all institutions; they demand life. We often read that the saloon needs new life to carry on its business; but so also does the church, in a gloriously different way. Unless parents give their sons and daughters to the ministry and missions of the church the work of the kingdom will languish within a generation. Everything that counts costs life.

Some young people are willing to burn out on India's coral strand, but unwilling to work out in a crossroad school or a city mission. Yet one is as truly a mission field as the other.

The millionaire who gives gold to charity is less of a missionary than the young man who gives himself to work for the needy.

There are various ways besides the steamship routes of reaching the foreign mission field. One is via the prayer closet. Another is the road of intelligent interest and sympathy. Still another is through the church offertory. The personal substitute plan is yet one more. If there is the will to minister to man for God on the mission field, the way will not be far to seek.

The going are the growing.

All the world is God's mission field; and whoever is doing his work anywhere is a true missionary.

Nowadays all sorts of talents are needed in mission work. Carpenters, plumbers, blacksmiths, engineers, machinists, ship carpenters, business managers, nurses, doctors and teachers are called for, as well as evangelists and preachers.

Somewhat as Douglas threw the heart of the Bruce into the midst of the foe, in order to rally the wavering Scots, so many persons may send their hearts where their feet will never travel.

NEW BOOKS

A Plea for Jewish Nationalism

THE JEWS OF TODAY, by Arthur Ruppin. This book will come with amazing surprise to many readers. It is an authoritative statement of the Jewish situation which sounds a note of warning regarding the continuance of the race. If it had increased as other races have done, and had not lost so rapidly by assimilation with other races, it would now number 60,000,000 at least instead of under 12,000,000 the world around. Dr. Ruppin insists that the causes which have prevented its more rapid absorption in the past are no longer operating and that unless strong measures are taken to prevent it the race will disappear in little more than a century. His figures are quite convincing. Economic progress has always meant the loss of numbers; birth rate falls with prosperity; emigration leads the people to adopt the language, culture and religion of the nations to which they go; intermarriage and baptism for social and commercial reasons increase. Heretofore, persecution has tended to bind the nation together and challenge the loyalty of the stronger for the weaker, but the lessening of persecution weakens the national life. So there must be some form of Jewish nationalism. Dr. Ruppin believes this is to be found in the return of Jews to Palestine and establishing there a national existence. The country will contain only 2,000,000, but they would constitute a national center which would give the dispersed Jews a sense of solidarity. They would reestablish the Hebrew language and the better elements of the old Jewish culture. This movement (Zionism) he counts "the last desperate stand of the Jews against annihilation." A thoughtful Jew, reading the book, said it would bring no surprises to many leading Jews of today, since they had been concerned with its facts and conclusions for some time. Dr. Ruppin has shown his faith by living in Jerusalem for two years in furtherance of his proposals. [Henry Holt and Company, New York. $1.75 net.] CLELAND B. MCAFEE.

Current Political and Intellectual Life

A PREFACE TO POLITICS, by Walter Lippmann. Mr. Lippmann is a brilliant writer and a rather class-conscious socialist and his book disappoints none of the expectations based upon those two facts. But his criticism of current political and intellectual life in America—for that is the chief burden of his book—is to a large extent free from the especial bias of socialistic creed. He ridicules the fashion of blaming such public ills as child labor and journalistic truckling on the capitalists. In the case of journalism he tells us that "no financial power is one-tenth so corrupting, so insidious, so hostile to originality and frank statement as the fear of the public which reads the magazine. For one item suppressed out of fear of a railroad or a bank, nine are rejected because of the prejudices of the public." Mr. Lippmann avows himself a follower of the French social philosopher Sorel, the author of the famous "social myth" theory by which he justifies the preaching to the proletariat of the general strike, for instance, although he admits that as a fact it will never come about. But Mr. Lippmann does not explain how myths are to retain their power over us when once we have found them out. The workman who makes sacrifices for something he knows in advance—having presumably read his leader's books—is only a stimulative fiction, is rather hard to conceive. This book may be described as a survey of politics in the light of the present-day anti-intellectual philosophy. [Mitchell Kennerley, New York. $1.50 net.]

Woman's New Status

THE OLD-FASHIONED WOMAN, by Elsie Clews Parsons. Whether or not this volume will be regarded as a valuable acquisition to the feminist literature depends upon one's point of view. The writer deals with the primitive fancies of civilized nations and the present views of less enlightened peoples regarding the sex; her inferences, cleverly drawn, show how the modified survival of these quaint notions affects woman's present status. It is an able treatise, revealing profound study and thoughtful observation of the present movement and its underlying causes. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York, $1.50 net.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A WORKING WOMAN, by Acell Leid Popp. The pages of this book chronicle the life history of one who has suffered every indignity, humiliation and pain which falls to the lot of the working woman. The author began life in the midst of squalor, misery and want, and she never experienced the affectionate care and consideration regarded as the rightful heritage of childhood. At the age of 10 she was forced into the industrial world, working twelve hours a day for a mere pittance, contributed to the family fund. However, cold and hunger, pain and suffering could not crush the indomitable spirit of this woman, who, despite apparently insurmountable obstacles, has attained a position which commands the respect of the civilized world, and has won her the adoration of thousands of working people, to the betterment of whose condition she is tirelessly devoting her life. Frau Popp tells of the misery, injustice and inhuman treatment accorded the working woman in a simple manner that carries conviction, and her book ought to move even the indifferent. [F. G. Browne and Company, Chicago.

Health and Hygiene

MALARIA: Cause and Control, by William B. Herms. Malaria is an easily controllable disease if public spirit is brought to bear on the task, and in these pages Professor Herms of the University of California (an expert investigator of malaria) tells of the actual means adopted in his state to rid it of the scourge. He begins his book with very full descriptions of the particular species of mosquito which is to blame in the matter and its difference from its more harmless relatives. Then follow methods of control and elimination, considerations relative to education of citizens and of the necessary legislation if the good results gained by antimosquito campaigns are to prove permanently valuable. The work is a most thorough and practical one and is written for the enlightenment of the layman. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.50 net.

WHEN TO SEND FOR THE DOCTOR, by Frieda E. Lippert and Arthur Holmes. Dr. Lippert and Professor Holmes are connected with the psychological clinic of the University of Pennsylvania and their compact volume is the result of years of medical and psychological experience. It is so arranged and worded that any person without technical training can quickly gain requisite knowledge concerning the common ills and habits of children. There are a score of illustrations. [J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia. $1.25 net.

MIND AND HEALTH, with an Examination of Some Systems of Divine Healing, by Edward E. Weaver, with introduction by G. Stanley Hall. Now that the idea of mental therapeutics has become familiar to the public, and the first enthusiasm over the Emmanuel movement has somewhat died down, the time is ripe for a nonpartisan and scientific treatment of the virtues and defects of this modern revival of the oldest healing agency. Such an examination has been made by Dr. Weaver—who is a psychologist, not a medical man—and made in a spirit at once thoroughly scientific and entirely hospitable to the claims of religion as a healing power. He analyzes Dowieites, mind curers, metaphysical healers and others, and describes in contradistinction to those activities the scienitfic progress in the matter—the work of such men as Dubois, Coriat, Freud and Munsterberg. After showing the relation of the sober theories of these men to the much less sober practices often ignorantly based on them, the author discusses the need of a "valid religious system of healing," and tells how the Christian church may cooperate with the medical profession in giving sufferers such a system. A most comprehensive bibliography, which includes the Freudian literature on the subject, concludes the book. [Macmillan Company, New York. $2 net.

COMMON DISEASES, by Woods Hutchinson. For the vast majority of laymen who fear some common diseases with exaggerated fear and do not fear others half as much as they ought, this book can be cordially recommended. It may also be recommended to the lover of humor, for not even the most pathological horrors human flesh is heir to can cause Dr. Hutchinson to be other than optimistic and easygoing in his outlook upon life in general and witty in his comments on the human tragi-comedy. The book is written in an extremely colloquial and irreverent style, and shatters many delusions. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1.50.

THE CHILD, ITS CARE, DIET AND COMMON CARE, by Dr. E. Mather Sill, is designed to meet the needs of the inexperienced mother, its pages being largely devoted to the feeding, clothing and exercise of infants. It also tells her what to do before the physician arrives in case of accident and clearly defines the symptoms of the various common diseases. The book is well illustrated, the language simple and the point of view that of the physician of wide experience. [Henry Holt and Company, New York. $1 net.

Work of the Y. M. C. A.

HISTORY OF THE NORTH AMERICAN YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATIONS, by Richard C. Morse. This is a small book on a great subject, for its theme is really broader than its title. Practically it is a history of Young Men's Christian Associations, or at least of their federal relations all over the world; and it is written from the viewpoint of a man entirely competent to expand the treatment to many volumes—the one living worker who, from being part of it all, knows most of the marvelous extension of the work in this country. Veteran indeed, yet happily diminishing nothin as yet of his old-time vigor in labor or leadership, Mr. Morse, after forty years as general secretary of the international committee, i himself a personal witness to every significan development of the association's influence sinc the establishment of the earliest American organizations. The present volume is limited i size by its special purpose, being designed fo use as a handy textbook in training school where secretaries are educated for associatio service, and for that reason taking a certai technical flavor. But as a ready compendium o facts about one of the greatest branches of cu rent religious work it is an important book fo any broad-minded Christian to have at han covering a line of Christian enterprise apa from which America's moral history can by n means be wholly comprehended. [Associatio Press, New York. $1 net.

Religious and Inspirational

PRAYERS, ANCIENT AND MODERN, chose edited and written by William Angus Knigh There is a growing feeling that the approa to the throne of grace should be deeply rev rent, even while trustful and childlike. Su books as this will aid thoughtful believers prayer. The earlier half contains prayers e tracted from Christian writings; the latter ha is made up of prayers written by Profess Knight. [E. P. Dutton and Company, Ne York. $1.25 net.

LEARNING TO TEACH FROM THE MAST TEACHER, by John A. Marquis. This is a stu of Jesus Christ as a teacher designed to le teachers, especially those who are engaged in instructing the young in the Sunday schools. The author wrote the papers now published in this little book for the readers of the Westminster Teacher. In spirit and in style they are most admirable and it is to be hoped that they will reach a much larger circle of readers in their present form. [The Westminster Press, Philadelphia. 35 cents.

At Close Quarters, by John A. Hutton. A volume of twenty-four sermons in the style which so many Northfield attendants have learned to know. They deal in things of life with some very familiar texts and others suggestive by their unusual character. We are glad to see the "Demas" sermon included. It is a good instance of sermonic imagination at its best. All the themes are striking without being cheap. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1.25 net.

The Devotional Life of the Sunday School Teacher, by J. R. Miller. "He being dead yet speaketh," and in the same beautiful accents of kindly counsel. The brief chapters are an appeal to the hearts of teachers and magnify the work which Mr. Miller loved above all work—winning hearts to the way of life. [Westminster Press, Philadelphia. 50 cents.

The Bible and Temperance; or, Christ on Trial, by Earle William Gage, is an effort to show that wherever in the Bible wine is mentioned without condemnation unfermented wine is invariably meant. Opinions will differ as to the success of the effort. [Glad Tidings Publishing Company, Chicago. 10 cents.

Books of Home Interest

Food and Flavor, by Henry T. Finck. "Inasmuch as an American is quite as capable of enjoying a good meal as any one else, why is it that we are so conspicuously ungastronomic as a nation?" Mr. Finck makes the reader realize the importance of this question, which his book ably answers. The general reader will probably be most interested in Mr. Finck's discussion of flavor in foods. A few cents a day will purchase food enough to sustain life; our additional daily expenditure is made largely for flavor. Without flavor food is unappetizing and when food is not appetizing it "lies in the stomach like a stone." We have here no cook book, but the author suggests from wide travel and observation the best ways of raising and preparing food material. It is a book for housewives, for growers of fruit and garden products, for men and women generally who appreciate a healthy digestion and rational enjoyment of the pleasures of the table. There are numerous illustrations. [Century Company, New York. $2 net.

Around-the-World Cook Book, by Mary Louise Barroll. These "culinary gleanings of a naval officer's wife" will prove wonderfully interesting to good housekeepers, for the book contains many of the best cooking recipes of the world, all of them tested by use. Mrs. Barroll has traveled widely and had in mind for years the preparation of this book. Her aim is to introduce into American households some of the toothsome dishes of other lands. There is Bahia salad from Brazil and tomato frappe from Hawaii. There are cakes from Germany and peppery dishes from Mexico. Grandmother Holt's crullers make one's mouth water. Even the bride in her shiny new kitchen, fresh from cooking school, should be able to make the delicious Dundee Scotch marmalade, for the directions are so explicit. There are 355 pages of recipes and some useful information on the care of persons and things in the home. [Century Company, New York. $1.50 net.

New Fiction

Mr. Hobby, by Harold Kellock. The hero—a sort of characterless, vapid young man, with a predilection for entomology—is forced into the study of law, in which profession he proves a distinct failure. He develops fads and meets a most unconventional young lady who sportively dubs him "Mr. Hobby." After a number of adventures, in which the girl takes the leading part, he attains a certain degree of fame as a "bug man" and is happily married to the heroine, and one feels justified in calling it a cheerful romance. [Century Company, New York. $1.30 net.

The Opening Door, by Justice Miles Foreman, is one of the most skillful treatments of the suffrage problem we have seen in fiction. Its heroine belongs to the new order and is a vivid representative of the modern girl who emerges from a well-sheltered home into a world that offers an alarming assortment of "ideas." She falls in love with a man whose attitude to the new status of women is quite Victorian and their efforts to adjust their differences are full of interest. The charm of the story is that they are successful and that neither of them makes the silly mistake of overinsistence. A really delightful book, full of thought and purpose and good work. [Harper and Brothers, New York. $1.25 net.

Pippin, by Evelyn Van Buren, is a girl philanthropist of the London streets around whom Mrs. Van Buren has written a wonderfully interesting story. The small heroine has a desperate time trying to provide for her small brother, herself and her good-for-nothing father and the pickpocketing by which she manages it is deeply distasteful to her. Eventually she falls in with a charming but discouraged American actress, and better days come for all of them. The story is full of humor and cheer. [Century Company, New York. $1.30 net.

Keren of Lowbole, by Una L. Silberrad. The charm of this story lies in its romance and mystery. Keren, the beautiful daughter of a gypsy and alchemist, is the central figure. She lives in the heart of an ancient forest with her father, whom she assists at the forge, seeking with him to solve the mysteries of nature. Although the book is well written and Keren is a charming character, it lacks the vital element necessary to make a work of fiction durable. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.25.

The Making of Thomas Barton, by Anna Nicholas, is a book of charmingly human short stories that describe with considerable insight and sympathy life in a typical small town of Indiana. They deal with very simple incidents in which real people are deeply concerned—love affairs, household concerns, business deals and the like—and one feels a little happier for having gone with some of these kindly folk on part of their way. [Bobbs-Merrill Company, Indianapolis. $1.25 net.

The Knave of Diamonds, by Ethel M. Dell, is rather a dimmed replica of "The Way of an Eagle," with exactly the same type of hero, though not so likable a one. The story is of a man who was really very bad and quite despaired of by his family, and his love for a woman married to a brute of a husband. There are numerous complications all ending happily. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $1.35 net.

The Unforgiving Offender, by John Reed Scott, has to do with the complex heart affairs of several married couples who belong in what is known as high society. Mr. Scott has marked facility in characterization; in fact, altogether too much to waste on making the sordid things in life the subject of an interesting story. [J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia. $1.25.

The Debit Account, by Oliver Onions, is the story, told by himself, of a man who commits a heinous crime, escapes detection and later marries the girl to whom his victim had been engaged. He prospers socially and financially and no one knows of his crime, yet he is finally obliged to pay the account. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.25.

In Another Moment, by Charles Belmont Davis. A story of stage life that is conspicuous on account of its thorough understanding of the subject. The difficulties encountered by the young girl who, unaided, seeks a career on the stage have never been more effectually visualized. [Bobbs-Merrill Company, Indianapolis. $1.25 net.

Growing Pains, by Ivy Low, chronicles with great cleverness the love experiences of a girl from her childhood to her marriage. The author is a niece of Maurice Low and this "comic tragedy" marks her as a novelist of exceptional ability and individuality. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.20 net.

Dying Fires, by Alan Monkhouse, leads a young man and woman of the better class through a courtship into marriage for the purpose of indicating the matrimonial uncongeniality in the modern home which we are hearing so much about recently. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1 net.

Outside the Ark, by Adelaide Holt. A well written novel that for some reason reminds one of stories enjoyed by boarding school girls. The romantic courtship and marriage of a young London writer to the daughter of a country curate bring about temperamental differences that end in tragedy. Miss Holt has many subtleties of method and a great charm of narration, but the charm of her book seems somehow to be of more value than its matter. [John Lane Company, New York. $1.25 net.

Miscellaneous

The Boy and His Club, by William McCormick. The Men and Religion Movement developed a new interest in boys and disclosed the fact that many of our churches have no places to put boys to work nor to put them to play. "And what shall we do?" is the question the author both asks and answers. He believes there is an intimate relation between men and religion on one hand and boys and basketball on the other; that a boys' club is a practical evangelistic agency and useful auxiliary of the church. Mr. McCormick, who is a newspaper man and leader of the Olivet Boys Club of Reading, Pa., has produced a practical manual of methods for dealing with ordinary boys and developing them into good men on an unequivocally religious basis. It should be worth many times its price to pastors and laymen who are struggling with men in the making. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. 50 cents net.

The Efficiency Books, by Orison Swett Marden. Intelligent, conservative optimism and common sense applied to life and business is contained in these books by a man who has done much to put inspiration into the work of thousands of American young people. In The Joys of Living ($1.25 net) he points out in his usual tactful way that we are not living for the future, but for today. The Progressive Business Man ($1 net) is packed with suggestions to the man who would get the most from his employees and himself. The Exceptional Employee ($1 net) puts into popular form efficiency suggestions whereby the 75 per cent of human energy now wasted by subordinates may be conserved. Training for Efficiency ($1.25) applies the much discussed principles of efficiency to the everyday endeavor of ordinary people. [Thomas Y. Crowell Company, New York.

Reflections of a Beginning Husband, by Edward Sanford Martin. This interesting book, written in Mr. Martin's characteristic style, relates the matrimonial experiences of a rising young attorney and the girl of his choice, who begin their wedded life on an income of $60 a week. Their efforts to live within their means and maintain relations with their "set" provide ample food for reflection, particularly after their economic system is further complicated by the arrival of an heir. The situations are cleverly conceived, consistently developed and wittily told. It abounds in good-natured satire concealing many a homely truth. [Harper and Brothers, New York. $1.20 net.

Our Country for All is a short Thanksgiving cantata by Bruno Huhn, prepared specially for churches and Sunday schools. Social Christianity is the prevailing theme. Included are "America Befriend," written originally for The Continent by Henry van Dyke, and "Our Country for All," by Katherine Lee Bates. The cantata is published by the Missionary Education Movement, New York, for 25 cents net, and can be secured through the various publication houses.

Labrador, by Wilfred T. Grenfell and others. The addition of a chapter on conservation and exploration has brought to date this comprehensive volume, first published three years ago. [Macmillan Company, New York. $2.50 net.

MISSIONARY WORK

An Emergency for Christian Literature

The reading public of the world is about to be increased by one-third of the human race. This will be the undoubted result of the new system of characters to be introduced in China. Reading has been limited there to the few who were willing and able to spend a virtual lifetime in mastering the interminable number of characters in which the Chinese language is written. But now the Chinese are to learn to read as readily as European children.

The question is, What will they read? The opportunity is for Christian literature.

The new system is being devised by an educational conference, under the direction of the Chinese board of education, which has been meeting for the past two months in Peking. The object of this conference is the unification of the Chinese language, and a new alphabet to express its sounds has been decided upon.

The alphabet consists of parts of the old characters which are to represent fixed sounds. There are 24 initials and 15 finals, making about 40 in all. It may be called a Chinese Roman alphabet, as the method of combination will be similar to the Roman, with which we are familiar. New terms will also be coined to meet the enlargement of knowledge.

This will place Chinese in the foremost of simplified languages for their own people, as it will be practically grammarless as well as phonetic. With these advantages we may quite expect that in four or five years' time, equivalent to the school life of a child, a third of the human race will learn to read. But what will their reading be? Will the country be flooded with agnostic periodicals and immoral fiction, more destructive religiously than the river floods of China are physically; or will the church wake up to this unparalleled opportunity of being first with Christian literature?

It is already recognized by far-sighted observers that next to the Bible Christian literature is one of the most effective agencies at the present juncture. What we ask, therefore, is an emergency fund of a million dollars a year for the next five years for this purpose.

Such a sum is quite a moderate one in the circumstances. In trade, a similar amount is being expended by one trust on the chance of creating business during the present transition. As opium smoking will soon cease, the American tobacco trust is spending $5,000,000 in the distribution of free cigarette samples throughout China to replace opium by the cigarette habit. Must the children of this world always be wiser in their generation than the children of light?

There are three leading societies for Christian literature in China, occupying strategic positions, well equipped, and ready for the forward movement if only the means were forthcoming. Even the men required for a large extension of this work are available, for the missionary societies have already shown a willingness to allocate their workers, already trained, for translation and editorial work in the literature societies. These are the Christian Literature Society in Shanghai, the Central China Tract Society in Hankow, and a society in Western China which has a wide field in that region.

WILLIAM BELL DAWSON.

Gospel Working Still in Time of War

Miss Jennis Wheeler writes from Saltillo, Mexico, that the mission there is entirely at peace in spite of hard fighting in many places in the country round about. Miss Wheeler's school is progressing quietly with no other anxiety than the fact that two of the student girls from Torreon were greatly disturbed at their inability to get any news from their families shut up in that besieged city. The young people's society in the church is well attended and the services of worship continue to draw creditable audiences, although there is no minister available for preaching and the sermons are all preached by a layman whose weekdays are fully occupied with office work.

Though there is some hope for the pacification of the country after the presidential election of the present month, the mission workers have practically given up hope of holding their usual national mission conference this year, and they are even doubtful whether they can have presbytery.

From Zitacuaro Rev. R. R. Gregory writes that although general evangelistic work seems practically at a standstill on account of the disturbed condition of the country, there are yet from time to time little items of individual encouragement which keep the missionaries' hearts and hopes alive. The native pastor at Zitacuaro was recently approached by a poor peasant who had been for many years a seemingly hopeless victim to drink. Something, however, had touched this man's heart and his wish for a better life led him to come to the Protestant minister and ask for the kind of medicine that had cured Urbano of the thirst for liquor. Urbano is a poverty-stricken Indian peon of the neighborhood, whose rescue from drunkenness years ago and his sober and simple life since have at last begun to make an impression upon his neighbors. The pastor of course told the new inquirer that this wonder was not wrought by medicine but only by the application of Christ's gospel. It is hoped that the newcomer will lay hold on Jesus as earnestly and efficiently as did Urbano when he was saved.

Chinese Statesman Honors Benefactor

Rev. Henry Loomis, the veteran agent of the American Bible Society in Japan, and his wife have just returned to Yokohama from a visit of remarkable interest to Peking. They were there the guests of Admiral Tsai, who is recognized as the immediate aid and adviser of President Yuan Shih Kai, occupying indeed a position analogous to that of secretary to the President in Washington. The admiral's invitation to Mr. Loomis was a direct testimony of his gratitude to the American Bible agent for friendship shown him when Tsai, as a young captain of the Chinese fleet, was captured by the Japanese in the war of 1895 between Japan and China and carried as a prisoner of war to a camp in Hiroshima, Japan. Here Mr. Loomis found him while distributing Bibles among the prisoners, and was surprised at the excellent English in which the young Chinaman spoke. This was soon explained, however, when the captain related his nine years' experience in the schools and universities of the United States.

Soon after Tsai was paroled in Mr. Loomis's care and, being taught the Scriptures in the household of the missionary, he accepted Christianity. Returning to his own country, the young Chinaman demonstrated his sympathy with progress by enlisting in every reform movement presented to him. This resulted disastrously to him when he espoused the reforms of the young emperor in 1898 and he had to flee for his life from the anger of the dowager empress. A period of great darkness and trouble followed, in which Tsai lost his hold upon religion. But in recent years he has been trending back to the old faith. Of course the revolution of 1911 was a new opportunity for him and he rose rapidly to the confidential position which he now occupies in Peking, and there he demonstrated his gratitude to his old instructor by introducing Mr. and Mrs. Loomis to the highest circles of Chinese officialdom.

Mr. Loomis is greatly impressed with the moral and religious influence which Tsai is exerting in the republican government, although he regrets that his former protege is not yet ready to renew his old outspoken stand for Christ.

The Dreadful "Suttee" Revived in India

Every time a widow in India burns herself to death at her husband's funeral, people say hopefully that this is certainly the last act of "suttee." But every year or two some fanatical woman revives the old custom and goes to her death in the flames consuming her husband's body, with the result that the masses immediately in great enthusiasm acclaim her memory as the sacred memory of a saint and martyr. The last case was the 15-year-old wife of a well-to-do Brahman in Simrai, near Mainpuri. She deserted a month and a half old baby to join her husband in death.

Immediately when the news of the act got abroad, crowds began to rush in from all directions. They planted brilliant flags in the little mound of ashes from the funeral pyre, and began contributing money to build a temple in which the widow will doubtless be worshiped as a local deity. The British government is not willing to risk trying to prevent this, it seems, but the police did begin making arrests among the members of the family, and it is promised that if anybody can be convicted of assenting to this act of "suttee," heavy punishment will be awarded.

Housetop Prayers in a Flood

An interesting experience befell two Indian workers of the Irish Presbyterian mission in June. To Beratpur, near Palitana in India, there came a great flood. They awoke in time to get clear of the house in which they were sleeping. As they stepped out into the water, which was breast high, the house, like that built on the sands, fell. They struggled through the flood to a building on top of which was a group of Moslems and Kolis who numbered two dozen. They helped the Christians up and in their terror looked to them for help, saying, "Stay with us. If you stay with us we shall be saved. If not, we are lost." The Christians prayed all night on that roof, anxiously awaiting the dawn. Their frail structure was almost the only house that escaped destruction in the village, for an Indian flood plays havoc with the adobe or mud built homes.

Missionary Brevities

—The Episcopalian Board of Missions was able to report to the General Convention of its church a square balance sheet on all its obligations. It would not, however, have been able to do so except for the receipt of certain free legacies near the close of its fiscal year.

—The Methodist Church of Australia regards the Fiji and Samoan islands as no longer missionary territory, and is organizing both of these archipelagoes into self-supporting districts. The mission effort formerly expended in these islands will be transferred to New Britain, New Guinea and the Solomon group.

—In Guatemala City in August a great fair brought a host of people from the country to the capital city of the republic, and Dr. W. B. Allison worked the mission press overtime to print an enormous quantity of tracts which he scattered broadcast in the streets. The number of inquiries for Bibles which came to the mission afterward told how well these tracts had taken effect.

—The Friday morning meeting of the Board of the Northwest, Chicago, was led by Mrs. Noble C. King, mission study secretary of the board. Her subject, naturally, was "The Study Class." Rev. James F. Garvin of Santiago Chile, spoke of the work there as slow, yet encouraging. "Since the recent refusal of congress to show any favor to the Liberal party,' he said, "the slogan of the young men throughout the republic is 'Separation of church and state.' It is sure to come. Those who claim to be atheists are behind a great educationa movement." Mrs. Carriel, whose son went to Brazil two years ago, his wife being the representative of the women of Evanston, Ill., First church, indorsed Mr. Garvin. Mrs. D. J Fleming told of getting close to India by a recent visit to Wooster University, five of whose young people are now in Lahore. The field secretary, Mrs. Engstrom, told of the encouraging cooperation of pastors in Minnesota The president and the China secretary, who represented the board at Michigan synodica meeting, told some of the good news from Grand Rapids.

—Latest publications: "One Year of Stewardship" (report of the six Woman's Boards price 25 cents; "Is Old Persia Ready for New Birth?" 5 cents; "An Endless Chain," by Florence E. Smith of Chile, 3 cents; "Latin America," "75th Anniversary Series," "Afric —The Testing of a Mission," each 2 cents "The Up to Date Missionary Leader;" catalogue.

The Folly of Exaggeration

A newspaper that teaches that our Roman Catholic fellow citizens have oath bound secret societies and are drilling men to forcibly take possession of this government in the name of a foreign power is guilty of insane and wicked folly. One can hold with all sincerity convictions as to serious errors in faith and practice of the Catholic church, be ready to criticise the selfish, sectarian plans of members of that church, especially in our cities, but that is a different thing from the claim that the church of Generals Sheridan and Meade and the church of John Ireland and Charles Joseph Bonaparte is in a conspiracy to destroy the republic.

Instead of trying to create bitter feelings between churches, how would it do for a time to emphasize points of agreement? As to the great essentials of Christianity, Protestant and Catholic are agreed. We have as common faith the apostles' creed, in our worship we have the Lord's prayer and as to morals we both teach the ten commandments and the sermon on the mount. On the great questions of moral reform there ought to be cooperation and alliance between Catholic and Protestant. There can be no victory over commercialized vice represented by the saloon and places of evil resort unless all churches and moral reform societies are united. D. C. MILNER.

Where Reading Matter Will Help

I notice in your issue of Sept. 18 a letter regarding magazines for remote places. This is a need which we feel very much in our work among the Arapahoe Indians. If we had some good illustrated magazines to form the nucleus of a reading room it would go a long way toward keeping them out of gambling and drinking dens. I shall be glad if you will bring the name of this mission before readers who desire to forward periodicals.

Argues Sectional Separation Justifiable

The editorial in The Continent, "Only the Church Hasn't Reached Gettysburg," presents a striking contrast between national unity and ecclesiastical separation seen in our country fifty years after the civil war. The impression evidently intended to be made is that this separation in the case of Presbyterians, Methodists and Baptists results wholly from the animosities associated with the war. I have nothing to say as to the continued separation of Methodist and Baptist churches, but it appears to me that in the case of the two Presbyterian bodies this implication is both untrue and unfair. I believe that there is willingness to forgive all the deliverances of the '60s on both sides and to let them be as if they had not been. This is not what keeps the church from Gettysburg.

The fact is that the two churches, U. S. A. and U. S., have in these fifty years developed along different lines. The Southern Church has, as a body, adhered to the natural and historical interpretation of the common standards of the two churches, while the Northern Church has preferred to adopt what is called a liberal view of these same symbols. This is manifest in the ease with which the U. S. A. Church recently absorbed a large part of the Cumberland Church, which was avowedly not a Calvinistic body; it is seen in the repeated licensure and ordination of men who are not in sympathy with the doctrinal teachings of the confession of faith, who confess their doubt of some of the truths known as fundamental to the common faith of Protestantism and whose main commendation lies in their sincerity. Let it be freely admitted that the U. S. A. Church has a perfect right to develop along these lines, but the U. S. Church has equally the right to resist this tendency and adhere to the faith held by our fathers in the undivided church.

Of course, if the separation of the body of Christ into the several denominations is essentially sinful, then we should hasten to reunite at any cost all the various branches into one. But if there is any reason for the existence of the dozen or more denominations of Protestantism (each of which has resulted from a difference of opinion on doctrine or polity), then the two Presbyterian churches have a right to exist separately, for their separation came about owing to a difference of polity and has been continued because of difference of doctrine. Then their separate existence is no more a "burning shame" than the separate existence of the Lutherans and the Presbyterians.

A PRESBYTERIAN "U. S."

Teaching Brings In Most Recruits

It was reported at the last Assembly that 83,000 souls had been added to the church last year on confession of their faith in Jesus. On the face of it it would seem that the preaching of the word had been efficient. But was it the preaching of the word that made possible this great and pleasing accession? What part did teaching play in the accomplishment of these results?

It is no longer a guess when we say that between 75 and 80 per cent of the accessions to the church on confession come from the Sunday school. Thus nearly 65,000 of those who confessed Christ last year were the youth of the Sunday school. I have often wondered if we really appreciated the significance of these facts—that the future of the church is involved in the success of the Sunday school; that practically every man who bears office in the church was a Sunday school scholar and was converted while such.

I am becoming more and more convinced that the church is being preached to death. People don't go to church as they used to do. One sermon is all they can stand. To expect them to listen to two a day is asking too much of their spiritual digestion. Why not then make one of the services on Sunday a teaching service? If this were done, then when the sermon was preached and the people incited to action, their action would be more apt to be intelligent and effective because based on knowledge—a knowledge acquired in the teaching service of the church.

Prayer-Meeting Methods in Orient

In The Continent's report of the Christian Endeavor convention I hope Dr. Sheldon was misquoted when he was made to say: "The church can no longer maintain a midweek prayer meeting and should substitute for it some form of entertainment," etc.

Tell it not in Gath, nor in the Far East, where you can find midweek prayer meetings attended by 500 to 1,000 people. If the church in America can no longer support a midweek prayer meeting, the thing it needs is a midweek prayer meeting—not a preaching meeting, nor an entertainment.

The best prayer meetings I have attended were conducted on the plan of having requests for prayer handed the pastor and after a short reading a few remarks on prayer, each topic was taken up separately and a short prayer volunteered. Or—as among some Asiatic Christians—each one who had a request arose and gave it out and then, when all were announced, each prayed for the specific object the Lord had laid on his mind, and for that alone—not wandering all over the earth in his prayer. This led to short, concentrated prayers that were prayers, and a blessed hour it was!

Should requests be slow in coming in, the people are reminded of the Pharisee who went to a prayer meeting without a request and came away without a blessing. He got what he went for, as people generally do. Petitions come from appetite; appetite comes from work. No work, no appetite; no appetite, no desire for food, no request, no midweek prayer meeting. Set the people to work and requests will pour in. F. S. MILLER.

Soul Winning the Vital Thing

As was the custom during the summer months in a certain town, a union meeting of three evangelical denominations was held on Sabbath evening in the "airdome." But instead of the usual Scripture reading and sermon a woman delivered an address on the subject of woman's suffrage and at its close all were requested to remain for the purpose of organization. A few of those present had come to worship and the audience gradually dwindled as one by one they slipped quietly away. For it is an ancient belief that the Sabbath was truly set apart for worship. A soul saved by grace is of greater importance than the casting of a woman's vote. When souls are sunk in degradation and sin our money, time and strength should be used to lift them toward God. In eternity our Saviour's "Well done, thou good and faithful servant," will mean infinitely more than earth's furore over unconsecrated activities.

In order to gain his object, Satan frequently appears as an angel of light and in thousands of subtle ways seeks to draw away God's children from the business of winning souls to Christ. Thus he is well pleased with all movements for social reform which do not have the salvation of souls as their basic principle. Viewed in the light of eternity our energy will have been better expended if, while we were on earth, it was used to the glory of God. The noble womanhood of our bright land can wield a greater and more lasting influence in the home, church, Sabbath school and mission field than in the world of politics. This is her God-given mission and privilege, so it behooves her to woo humanity to Christ if she would not be held responsible for humanity irrevocably lost. MARGARET L. MCINTYRE.

ers never meant aggression or unjust interence when they came sailing in squadrons into a heathen country's waters. Suppose that Christian nations never exported cheap and worthless goods to savages in exchange for gold and ivory and rubber. Suppose that Christianity was so stamped upon every man or woman coming from civilized lands that it was felt as an influence for justice and kindness and brotherhood in the remotest part of the earth. Suppose——

But that supposition answers itself. How can even the dullest observer suppose such fantasies? Christianity does not feel the necessity of these things to any great extent—certainly not enough to do them. Christianity lets the missionary open the way, brave the cannibal, tame the head hunter, open the closed door of ages and preach the true, unadulterated gospel. Then it goes in after him to trade with the people, giving the cheapest and poorest stuff it can and bringing in liquor or opium or tobacco recklessly, careless of the destroying effect they have on races new to their dangers. Government comes in after trade and carves slices out of the best and most coveted territory. Last of all, when everything is safe, comes the tourist, feeling no obligation whatever to bring his or her religion along.

It is not a pleasant picture. When the missionaries are criticised they do not want to answer back by accusing the home religion. But really, why does Christianity expect the missionary to do it all? If Christianity traveled on every ship, in every merchant's exports, in all government orders, in every tourist party, would there be need of sending missionaries much longer? Some tincture of the gospel does travel in this way; some merchants are righteous, some governments just for the most part. But the Christian world, as Christian, must face these problems if the great black areas of the Moslem and Buddhist and heathen lands are to be won to that banner of the cross which stands for brotherhood and righteousness.

Ways of Working

Regular Audit of Church Books

How many churches have an audit of the books of all officers who handle money? Many congregations take the statement of the treasurer without other investigation. It was confessed in a recent conference of pastors, however, that the modern idea of trust funds and their integrity has not penetrated many churches. It was related that one treasurer in leaving town used the cash in the benevolent treasury to pay his expenses and repeated requests failed to have it returned. The church took another collection, and then it was found that the fire insurance premium was due and the money for missions was taken to pay the insurance premium.

Colleges which use endowment funds to pay current expenses, or other trustees who consent to the transfer of funds even for a short time, are said by some to be in the same class with the bank teller who "borrows" a few bills in an emergency, intending to pay back the following day.

It has been suggested that the necessity of careful bookkeeping may be brought before the next Assembly for recommendations which will gain more or less uniformity in practice.

Puts Invitation Cards in Saloons

There are many ways of reaching out to attract men to divine service that they may be placed under the influence of the gospel. It is something of a problem as to the best way of doing this. The First church of Monroe, Mich., through the session adopted a proposition of one of their members to try this way:

A score or more of large white cards were printed with this invitation thereon: "The guests of this house are cordially invited by Dr. W. C. Burns, pastor, to attend divine service at the First Presbyterian church." A picture of the church was included. These cards were hung up in the office of every hotel in the city, restaurants and saloons. It was feared by some that this invasion of the saloons would be very coolly if not rudely received, but the very opposite was the case and the cards were given the utmost publicity, and most of them still remain.

"Catch My Pal" for C. E. Society

Dr. W. A. Jones, pastor of Knoxville, Pa., church and president of the Pennsylvania State Christian Endeavor Union, is planning a novel campaign in his C. E. society. The new scheme is to be known as the "Catch My Pal" movement. Each member of the society will be asked to catch, bring and lead into active C. E. work one friend or companion during the next three months.

Elat's Amazing Growth Goes On

The wonderful church of Elat, in the center of the West Africa mission of the New York Board, continues to grow at a marvelous rate. At the midsummer communion the congregation present in the main Elat church numbered 5,800. On that day 247 were baptized and received into full church membership. The first confession of Christ was made by 140. After service was dismissed the elders met and advanced 450 from the first to the second class of catechumens. At Fulasi, where a preaching outpost has been established in order to prevent overcrowding of the main Elat church, there were 3,600 present. Here twenty-seven were baptized and 200 advanced to the second class in the catechism. It thus appears that on commiunion Sunday the total attendance for Elat congregation in its two houses of worship considerably exceeded 9,000, and the communicant additions were almost 300.

Living Up to Its Light

The heathen who buries his aged father alive, because the latter has outlived his usefulness and has become a care, will have to be judged by the light he has had.

The secular concern of modern life that treats its aged and disabled servants justly and generously by providing them a reasonable pension for old age is living up to more light than the savage who kills his aged father.

The Church of Jesus Christ, which has received the full-orbed light of the Gospel of the love of God, will be judged by that light.

God forbid, that His Church should be as heartless as a heathen and neither as just nor as generous as a secular enterprise.

Will the Church live up to its light?

Are you living up to yours?

IN THE FIELD OF CHRISTIAN EFFORT

TEMPERANCE SENTIMENT IS INCREASING

Rulers of Nations Use Influence Against Alcohol—Ammunition for Sermons for Temperance Sunday—How Women Are Helping.

According to recently published figures in The New York Times, temperance forces are becoming increasingly powerful in the United States, Scandinavian countries, France and Germany. Abstainers among the rulers of the world are the king of Italy, king of Bulgaria, king of Sweden, crown prince of Sweden, King of Spain and kaiser of Germany. The premier of Sweden and a large proportion of the members of Norway's parliament are temperance advocates. Half of the Norwegian cities are under prohibition. The sale of intoxicants is forbidden in both Norway and Sweden in all army drill grounds. Iceland was the first country of modern times to prohibit the manufacture, import and sale of liquor by constitutional prohibition. It is said that this whole country has but one policeman and no jail. Finland has twice voted for a national prohibition law, but the czar of Russia has declined the necessary imperial sanction. France has 800 federated temperance socieities.

Women Help to Enlarge "Dry" Area—The women of California have been enfranchised two years. During this time the number of "dry" towns in the state has increased from 200 to 682 and more than one-half the territory of the state is free from saloons. Commenting upon this fact Collier's Weekly says, "No wonder the liquor interests of the country bitterly fought every extension of the suffrage in the direction of sex democracy."

Women to Work in City Elections—Delegates at the recent W. C. T. U. convention of Illinois gave consideration to plans of work in connection with municipal elections the coming year. Officers say the W. C. T. U. will do its best to get the details of the new franchise law before the eyes of the eligible women in the state in order to help enlist them against the saloons.

No Drinks on Dining Cars—No alcoholic liquors will be served on the dining cars of railroads operating in Ohio after Nov. 4 following an order of the attorney general.

Graduates Are in Penitentiary—The No-License League of Lancaster, Pa., recently addressed an open communication to the Pennsylvania liquor dealers who had convened there. The league called attention to the fact that liquor dealers of Lancaster county had not made an exhibit at the recent county fair. They told the liquor men that their finished products were in the penitentiary, where 85 per cent of the inmates are graduates from saloons. In the insane asylum 75 per cent and in the poorhouse 90 per cent of the inmates are also examples of what the liquor dealers can accomplish with a man.

Commends Anti-Saloon League — A comprehensive article concerning the work of the Anti-Saloon League appears in October World's Work, "The Church Militant Against the Saloon." The author gives the Anti-Saloon League credit for having made prohibition a live issue in almost every state by working through existing political parties.

REPORTS OF RECENT REVIVALS

Moves People of Peoria—Evangelist Frank A. Miller of Elgin, Ill., has just closed successful meetings in Peoria, Ill. His work was divided between South Park mission, Bacon Memorial mission and Calvary church, where he gave chalk talks the second week. He spoke also at First church and Proctor Memorial. Following the meetings in Peoria, Mr. Miller opened meetings at Huntley, Ill., where he is now engaged.

Various Evangelistic Items — District prayer meetings have been arranged to precede a union revival of the churches of Muncie, Ind.—Revival meetings have commenced at Milo, Iowa, under the direction of R. H. Willis.

Awakening in Country Churches—The Rockwood, Ill., group, consisting of the Rockwood, Ebenezer, Unity and Cora City churches, under the pastorate of Rev. Chester E. Thompson, has recently concluded a series of evangelistic meetings. The four churches, being from two to four miles apart, decided to have one big meeting for all. Evangelists Green and Clark erected a tent at Rockwood. Although this is a country group and many came from four to eight miles, yet there were 600 present at an evening service. There were upwards of sixty conversions.

ACTIVITIES OF THE DENOMINATIONS

Methodist South — The action of the annual conference of the M. E. Church South in regard to a change in name of the denomination to the M. E. Church in America is being watched with interest. Some congregations in the Far West are said to favor the change, although the complication which may arise in the title of real estate is being urged as one of the reasons why the present name should be retained.

Methodist—What is confidently expected to be the largest gathering of laymen the Methodist church ever held has been called for Oct. 28 at Indianapolis. Most of the bishops of the church are on the program and in addition to a discussion of plans for the every-member canvass, other definite work for men is expected to be emphasized.

Canadian Presbyterian—The presbytery of Westminster recently adopted a resolution asking that the Canadian government take steps to exclude from British Columbia all Oriental laborers until the Orientals shall form but one-thirtieth of the population. At the present time one in every nine of the population of the province is an Oriental. They constitute also one-fifth of the entire male population.

Congregational—The meeting of the National Council of the Congregational Church as well as missionary societies of that denomination will be held in Kansas City, Oct. 23-30. The program lists 120 addresses, an average of twelve a day, in addition to reports of committees and commissions. The missionary character of the meeting will predominate, and an important report on the polity of the denomination will be submitted by a commission which has been studying a possible change of government of the Congregationalists for some time.

Offers Material for Prison Sunday

The Central Howard Association, Chicago, offers information and material for sermons on Prison Sunday, Oct. 26. This day has been observed by many churches for a number of years and special efforts are made to interest people in the welfare of former convicts. During the past year the Central Howard Association has assisted over 1,600 ex-prisoners to gain a new start in life.

There are 7,777 Indians who are Presbyterians.

ARE MINISTERS MORE PLENTIFUL?

Interesting Comparisons of the Number of Vacant Fields in Presbyteries—Decisive Figures Not Possible Until Next January.

According to a report of General Assembly's vacancy and supply committee by Rev. Walter H. Houston, corresponding secretary, the number of vacant fields in the church in July was very much smaller than the number last January. In July 24 per cent of presbyteries from which reports were received had no vacant fields able to support a man. In January the number of presbyteries having no vacant fields was only 8 per cent of the total. In July the total need of presbyteries was for a little more than two additional pastors each compared with an average need of three additional pastors each in January.

It is pointed out, however, that it is too early to draw any decisive conclusions from these figures as to the possible permanent change in the vacancy situation. In July it is presumed that the 193 graduates of the various theological seminaries were at work, many of them in fields which previously had been reported vacant. In the West and Northwest there were also during the summer a number of undergraduates spending their vacation on vacant fields. The work of the vacancy and supply committee in enlisting in regular pastoral work competent ministers who have not had regular charges may also be credited with a portion of this evident improvement.

The undergraduates have now returned to seminaries and the figures which the committee expects to have from all the presbyteries again in January will give a better basis for estimating the work of the committee.

The records show that of the 431 vacant churches reported in July the average support offered was $1,076. Of these churches fifty-five offered a salary of $1,500 and over. The records also show that 140 to 175 Presbyterian ministers die each year. Last year the number was 167.

AMONG THE BOY SCOUTS

Gains Inspiration from Gettysburg—As a result of the activities of the Boy Scouts at the anniversary celebration at Gettysburg last July a scout troop has been formed in Mystic, Conn. It was not until a veteran soldier returned from Gettysburg that any enthusiasm could be aroused toward a scout organization.

New Plan for Dues Works Well—Reports from local troops to national headquarters of the Boy Scouts of America indicate that the new plan of requiring an annual payment of dues of 25 cents is meeting with ready acceptance. No boy can be a first-class scout until he has earned and deposited in a savings bank at least $2, so that the payment of 25 cents a year is not expected to work a hardship upon any one.

Go to Church Thrice on Sunday

Some people who think that it is a task to go to church twice a Sunday may be surprised to know that in Emporia, Kan., is a Welsh church where every member goes to church three times a day. In the morning they study the Bible, hear a Welsh sermon in the afternoon, and one in English from the same pastor, Rev. R. Henry Jones, in the evening. Last year this church gave $8 per capita to all boards.

WILL PLAN PLACING OF NEW CHURCHES

Denominations Form Working Agreement—Addition to Forces Among Foreigners of Detroit, with Another Building Started.

DETROIT—In order to avoid the repetition of a fault, seriously felt in Detroit, the crowding of groups of churches into certain locations, and the neglect of the needy parts of the city, an interdenominational association has been formed with Joseph A. Vance, D. D., as president. The Presbyterian, Baptist, Congregational and Episcopal churches are represented on the board of management, and it is hoped that the Methodists will be in the near future.

Finest Organ in City—Fort Street church is to have the finest pipe organ in the city through the generosity of Mrs. Fred Alger as a memorial to her father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. Swift. This church also stands first in its gifts to the general fund for church extension, which cause this year reaches the sum of $22,000, $9,000 of it in individual gifts of $500 and $1,000.

Ministers Elect; Dr. Stone to Speak—Rev. James D. MacDonald is the new president of the Presbyterian ministers. The program for the year is a happy combination of the scholarly, the practical and the recreative.—Moderator Stone will address young people of presbytery in First church Oct. 24.

Work for Foreigners Grows—The problem of caring for the foreigner in Detroit has thus far been left wholly to Presbyterians and Congregationalists, the former looking after Italians and Hungarians and the latter after the Poles, these three nationalities being most largely represented in Detroit. The Methodists are now caring for the Armenians and the Baptists for the Slavs and Roumanians, and a Greek Evangelical Orthodox church has also been organized, the corner stone of a new building having been laid Sept. 28 in the presence of 2,000 people. WILLIAM BRYANT.

MEN AT WORK IN CHURCHES

Begin Work with Address—The Men's Sunday Evening Club of First church, Lafayette, Ind., inaugurated its work this fall by having Dr. J. T. Henderson, associate secretary of the Presbyterian Brotherhood, speak Sunday evening, Sept. 28. The congregation of Second church was invited to join in the service. A supper for the men of the congregation will be given soon.

Brotherhood Items—A brotherhood is being organized at Newtown, Ind., and steps have been taken for a similar organization at Attica. Men of both churches were recently addressed by Dr. J. T. Henderson, associate secretary of the brotherhood.—Andrew M. Robles is president of the executive committee of the St. Louis brotherhood for the coming year. The secretary is Josiah A. Parker. Plans have been made to enlist business men in the practical problems of the church.

Open Reading Room—The men of Lawrenceville, Ill., church have organized a league which has made arrangements for some of its members to take charge of a reading room each day of the week. The Sunday school room has been fitted up by them for this purpose. The boys and young men of the town are taking a deep interest in this.

Will Enlarge Their Building—Men of Mount Baker church, Seattle, at a recent meeting decided that the church edifice should be remodeled and half the sum was raised at once. At the same meeting the Fellowship of Friendly Fellows was organized. This church under Rev. E. H. Broyles has doubled in membership and the Sunday school must meet in two buildings.

PLAN MANY EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS

Kansas City Pastors to Cooperate — Working Girls Patronizing Hotel Run by Church—Sick Mothers Find Shelter.

KANSAS CITY—Through the leadership of Dr. Harry C. Rogers, chairman of evangelistic work in presbytery, a plan has been formulated by which an evangelistic meeting is to be held in every church in presbytery this fall and winter. This is to be accomplished very largely through the exchange of pastors. Each church has been asked to give up its pastor for at least two weeks, and during his absence the church is to supply its own pulpit.

Plan for the Young People—First church, Independence, has many aggressive plans for the fall and winter work. The annual autumn outing of the young people of the church was held Oct. 4. This church has a strong, picked committee of men and women whose business it is to work and plan for the young people of the church.

Form New Church Soon—A new church is soon to be organized at St. Claire Park, a growing suburb of the city. There is a commodious chapel on the ground and an active, growing Sunday school under the direction of Rev. Frank Bascom of Independence.

Poor and Sick Helped—Linwood Convalescent Home, which Linwood church has been operating during the summer, has provided physical recreation and recuperation for thirty-six women and children. These women and children came from the poorer quarters of the city and for the most part from the city hospital. They were poor and sick. They remained at the rest home from one to three weeks and then returned to the city restored to health and ready for the struggle of life. With all expenses paid for the summer, there remained a balance of nearly $1,000. No charge was made upon the patients.

Girls' Hotel Is Popular—First church is succeeding well with the new working girls' hotel, called "The Westminster." It is not yet fully furnished, but all available rooms are taken at an average price of $3 a week for bed and board. When necessary, girls are taken care of when out of work or sick, without charge. An employment committee from the church secures work and several young women have been placed. The institution is not intended to be strictly religious, but broadly helpful. Five denominations, including Roman Catholic, are represented. Religious services are held one evening a week. Helpful house rules, such as college girls are used to, serve as a mild restraint, and are approved by the young women. CHARLES C. McGINLEY.

TO MAKE SOCIAL SURVEY OF TOPEKA

Churches Take Lead in Important Undertaking—Well Known Pastor Has Place of Influence on Police Board.

TOPEKA—The Federation of Churches brought Shelby M. Harrison of the Russell Sage Foundation to this city last June to make a preliminary social survey. This fall a complete survey is to be undertaken and Mr. Harrison and three experts from New York will arrive Oct. 15 to begin work. To strengthen interest in the movement the women's clubs and the Commercial Club have been asked to cooperate with the churches, and they are doing so heartily. The survey will be made along the following lines: Industries and industrial conditions, juvenile and adult delinquency and crime, sanitation and health, city budget making and churches and religious conditions.

Dr. Sheldon on Police Board—Following a hotly contested mayoralty election last spring when the temperance element succeeded in electing the mayor, several innovations in city affairs have occurred here, one being the appointment of a clergyman, Dr. Charles M. Sheldon, as a member of the police board. Through his efforts two policewomen are doing good work in looking after wayward boys and girls.

Enlarge Mission Work—An enlargement of the work at Redden chapel has been undertaken by First church. Rev. J. H. Fazel has been engaged to conduct the work, which heretofore has been car-

A FOOD DRINK
Which Brings Daily Enjoyment

A lady doctor writes:

"Though busy hourly with my own affairs, I will not deny myself the pleasure of taking a few minutes to tell of my enjoyment daily obtained from my morning cup of Postum. It is a food beverage, not an irritant like coffee.

"I began to use Postum eight years ago, not because I wanted to, but because coffee, which I dearly loved, made my nights long, weary periods to be dreaded and unfitting me for business during the day.

"On advice of a friend, I first tried Postum, making it carefully as suggested on the package. As I had always used "cream and no sugar," I mixed my Postum so. It looked good, was clear and fragrant, and it was a pleasure to see the cream color it as my Kentucky friend wanted her coffee to look—'like a new saddle.'

"Then I tasted it critically, for I had tried many 'substitutes' for coffee. I was pleased, yes, satisfied with my Postum in taste and effect, and am yet, being a constant user of it all these years. I continually assure my friends and acquaintances that they will like it in place of coffee, and receive benefit from its use. I have gained weight, can sleep and am not nervous."

Postum comes in two forms:

Regular Postum —must be well boiled.

Instant Postum is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly Grocers sell both kinds.

"There's a reason" for Postum.

Trained Nurses for Babies—The Mizpah Bible class of First church has opened a nursery in one of the church parlors for the care of babies and little children during the Sunday morning service. A graduate nurse is in charge.—Sunday evening, Sept. 21, a special service for college students was held at First church.—During the vacation of Dr. S. S. Estey, pastor, the manse of First church underwent extensive remodeling.

DR. HERRICK HEADS NEW COMMITTEE

President of Girard College Chairman of Group to Plan Literature for Sunday Schools of the Whole Church.

PHILADELPHIA—The Board of Publication and Sabbath School Work has recently acted in accordance with the instructions of the last General Assembly that it "regard itself as preeminently an educational board whose main function is the promotion of the nurture of the children and youth in Christian knowledge and life and to this end should give the most earnest attention to the whole field of education and erect a department of religious education in which should be assembled all the educational work now being cared for under other departments." Influenced by this action, the board has amended its bylaws and instead of a committee on young people's work has established a committee on religious education and appointed as its chairman Dr. Cheesman A. Herrick, president of Girard College. Associated with him are ten members of the board especially interested in educational matters. This committee will meet regularly each month with the secretaries, editors and superintendents of the board and to it will be referred all questions and problems of an educational character bearing upon the Sabbath school and young people's work, and to it will be committed the production of a literature for the church organizations and for the home as well. Such subjects as graded lessons will be referred to this committee.

Will Appoint Chaplains—Philedalphia Presbytery has appointed Doctors M. A. Brownson, Alexander McColl and J. Grant Newman a committee to arrange for the placing of chaplains in all educational institutions of the city.

Install President of Ursinus—Ursinus College on Oct. 6 inaugurated Dr. George L. Omwake president as successor to Dr. A. Edwin Keigwin of New York in the presence of representatives of many colleges. The degree of LL. D. was conferred among others upon Judge Aaron S. Swartz, an elder of First church, Norristown, and that of D. D. upon Rev. George H. Wailes, a member of the Philadelphia Presbytery.

Brief News of Recent Events—Oxford church on North Broad street, Rev. John W. Francis pastor, evidenced recently its prosperous condition by a largely attended communion service and an enthusiastic Rally Day of the Sunday school in which a specially prepared program of exercises was observed.—On the occasion of the meeting of the elders' association of Philadelphia North Presbytery in Germantown appreciative testimony was borne by Dr. Cheesman A. Herrick to the worth of Elder J. Milton Colton, ex-president of the association, who died since the last meeting.—Funeral services of Miss Adelaide M. Smuller, daughter of the late Rev. H. W. Smuller and sister-in-law of Professor James Carter of Lincoln University, were held Oct. 6 at the residence of Dr. James H. Worden, secretary of the Sabbath school work. Interment was at Kingston, N. Y.

Big Growth in Sunday Schools—The Sunday school enrollment of Philadelphia made the largest gain the past year of any in the state, viz., 11,560, according to the report of the state convention. An increase of 5,613 in the membership of the Sunday schools of Philadelphia Presbytery is reported by the committee on Sunday school work. The committee of 100 men having in charge the three year advance movement for Philadelphia Sunday schools met recently and outlined a definite campaign for the next and third year.

Missions Around the World—"Missions as Seen on the Cruise of the Atlantic Fleet Around the World" was the topic of Chaplain George E. T. Stevenson before the ministers last Monday. October 20 Dr. George H. Hemingway will speak on "The English Lakes and Their Literary Associations." On Oct. 27 Dr. D. Scott Clark will discuss "Pentateuchal Partitions."

Add to Bala Home—Two extensions, a powerhouse and a laundry, costing $125,000, were dedicated recently at the Bala Home for aged men and aged couples. Dr. L. T. Graham presided and Rev. Alexander McClelland and Rev. William Muir Auld were the speakers.

Give Boys Industrial Education — More than 2,000 boys now working in factories will soon be receiving the advantages of an industrial education as the result of the combined efforts of the Y. M. C. A. and their employers. The Y. M. C. A. will bear the brunt of the expense.

ASKED THAT ALL CHURCHES CLOSE

Demands of Evangelist Sunday Not Well Received—Compromise Reached—Three Day Campaign for All Mission Boards.

PITTSBURG—Rev. W. A. Sunday with eight of his helpers visited Pittsburg Oct. 6 and addressed the union ministerial meeting with regard to the proposed evangelistic campaign to begin Dec. 28. Mr. Sunday's demand that all of the churches close their morning service and midweek prayer meeting, or he would not come, was not well received. A compromise was reached in the afternoon in which the pastors agreed to divide the city into eight sections and have each section close the churches for one morning service during the eight weeks of the campaign. It was also proposed that tickets be given the church people in the section closing to insure them seats. The question of site has not yet been settled. Efforts are being made to obtain the old Cathedral site downtown, and many are advocating the construction of a permanent hall in connection with the exposition building.

Plan Program for Missions—A committee was appointed by the Ministerial Union to arrange an interdenominational change of pulpits Sunday, Nov. 9, in connection with the united missionary campaign. A program lasting for three days will be arranged for Nov. 9-11. Among the speakers will be J. Campbell White and Robert E. Speer. The campaign will extend to seventy cities and towns in western Pennsylvania, eastern Ohio and West Virginia.

Obtain 2,000 New Members—More than 2,000 new members were secured in the recent campaign by the Y. M. C. A., making the total membership more than 10,000 and putting Pittsburg in third place in the United States in point of numbers.

Burn Mortgage; Gift to Pastor — Highland church celebrated its twenty-second anniversary and the burning of the mortgage on the church property with a jubilee Friday evening, Oct. 10. More than $19,000 was raised in a recent campaign to clear the church of debt. Aside from the pastor, Doctors C. P. Cheeseman, Frank Sneed, W. L. McEwan, A. R. Robinson and George Chalfant took part in the program.—Dr. Samuel Callen, pastor of Fourth church, is to have a three months' vacation and a trip to Palestine, Egypt and Southern Europe as a gift from the congregation.

WORK FOR GREATER EFFICIENCY

BUFFALO—The ministers of Buffalo Presbytery have just returned from their annual "retreat." It was held at Pine Lodge, twenty miles out from the city by the lakeside. "The Ministry of Jesus" was the general topic. The leaders had carefully prepared their parts, but all was informal and filled with a delightful spirit.

Commission Handles Routine—The recent fall meeting of presbytery made clear certain changes which the existence of a strong executive commission is causing. At no stated meeting has there been so little of routine and so much time for the discussion of great subjects. The evening popular meeting was devoted to a conference in religious education led by Rev. W. H. Boocock. The Sunday school workers of presbytery were present. The conference was preceded by a supper at which the superintendents sat down together. Dr. J. W. Cochran was present at a later session. Presbytery adopted a comprehensive scheme whereby the work shall be grouped into five separate departments: Missions, religious education, church extension and Christian life, men's clubs, women's societies.

Want Country Life Department—General Assembly has been overtured to direct its Home Board to retain the present department of church and country life, and a committee was appointed to prepare and present at a subsequent meeting of presbytery an overture petitioning General Assembly to continue its work along the distinctive lines of social service and community betterment.

WOULD GET DENOMINATION TOGETHER

ILLINOIS—An annual Presbyterian night has been instituted by churches of Springfield, when all the officers of the Presbyterian churches in the city will meet to plan cooperative work. The stimulus for this new scheme grew out of the recent reception given Dr. Donald MacLeod, new pastor of First church.—Among those taking part in the recent installation services of Rev. C. E. Jenney, pastor of First church, Decatur, were Dr. B. P. Fullerton, Dr. W. H. Penhallegon, Rev. Arthur L. Odell, Dr. J. W. McDonald and Rev. Elisha Safford.—A payment of $300 on the bonded debt of the gymnasium of Central church, Joliet, has been recently made. The large attendance of men at services is an interesting feature of the work this fall. Rev. C. D. Jacobs is pastor.—Under the auspices of the evangelistic committee a meeting of ministers and elders of the various churches of Alton Presbytery was held in Madison. The day was spent in prayer and fasting.

The

will publish approximately 2,562,560 words of reading matter alone—more than fourteen times the number of words in the twenty-seven books of the New Testament—with contributions by the men and women best qualified to write on subjects of religion and theology, history, art, poetry and literature; travel and exploration; archeological discoveries and research; science and invention; problems of church and government, and all other topics of current and vital interest to those who would be well informed on the progress of the world and of the Kingdom.

World-important news will be faithfully chronicled by a staff of 200 correspondents living in all habitable parts of the globe, and the usual bright, relevant departmental features for both adults and young people will appear weekly, devoted to every church and home interest; in all, fifty-two splendidly illustrated numbers, generally with a magnificent art cover in colors, 10½ by 14 inches, suitable for framing. A wellspring of literary fullness, pictorial beauty, and pure spiritual enrichment.

founder of the Christian Endeavor, will begin a new and intensely interesting series dealing with the cities of Scripture. The dusky veil of the years will be lifted and the dim past linked with the present in graphic visual imagery.

Dr. J. H. Jowett,

whose "Daily Meditations" have proved one of the most popular and helpful features ever introduced into our pages, will contribute a series of spiritually inspiring articles on various vital topics.

Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.,

brings new charm to a name beloved in American literature. The gentle spirit and literary mantle of our late associate has fallen, as by ordainment, upon the shoulders of her granddaughter and namesake, who continues to spread the Gospel of sunshine through our "Friendship Columns."

Pastor Charles M. Sheldon, D.D.,

author of In His Steps, has contributed a new and remarkable story bearing the striking title "Jesus Is Here!" Out of a conviction that has long been growing in his heart, he has written it—and as a Gospel of our modern day it seems truly an inspired work. The first chapter appears elsewhere in this issue. It is a story no one should miss.

Many Splendid Features.

Space does not permit even the names of the writers who will supply the lesser features for 1914 and the remainder of 1913. Such a list might fill two pages and be incomplete. The following personalities in the realm of religion and letters are, however, fairly indicative of the depth and scope of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as projected for the coming months:

Eleanor H. Porter, author of Pollyanna; Irving Bacheller, author of Eben Holden and other novels; Kathleen Norris, author of Mother; Florence M. Kingsley, author of Stephen and other famous books; Dr. Anna M. Shaw, leader of the Woman Suffrage Movement in America; Professor Edgar J. Banks, Distinguished Orientalist; Bishop Frank W. Warne, of Central Asia; Dr. Orison Swett Marden, the philosopher of optimism; Marietta Holley, creator of the characters "Aunt Samantha" and Josiah Allen"; Ferdinand C. Iglehart, D.D., who conducts the department, "The Bible and the Newspaper"; Dr. W. E. Biederwolf, the distinguished evangelist; Rev. Charles H. Parkhurst, noted metropolitan pastor; Professor W. H. T. Dau; Rev. David J. Burrell; J. Wilbur Chapman, "the spiritual successor of Moody"; Professor R. A. Torrey; Rev. A. C. Dixon.

CONFER ON TURKISH MISSION WORK

Secretaries Talk with New Ambassador—A Celebration of Beecher Anniversary Participated In by Well-Known Preachers.

NEW YORK—Dr. Charles Watson, secretary of the U. P. Board of Foreign Missions, and Dr. J. L. Barton of Boston, secretary of the American Board, were in New York Oct. 8 to join the secretaries of the Presbyterian Board in a conference with Henry Morgenthau, the distinguished Hebrew citizen who has just been appointed ambassador to Turkey. Mr. Morgenthau, though not minimizing his own religious convictions, expressed an enthusiastic interest and approval of the foreign mission work which these three denominations represented in the conference are doing within the bounds of the Turkish empire. Apart from their religious influence, he said the social meaning of missionary activity would command his heartiest support.

Will Celebrate Anniversary—The Church of the Covenant, which is affiliated with Brick church, is planning to celebrate its twentieth anniversary Nov. 30. The pastor, Dr. George Sidney Webster, is trying to get in touch with as many former members as possible for this occasion. Two Union Seminary students are assisting in the Bible school and other activities of the church, Charles H. Wickets and William G. Simpson.

Bible School Opens Session—The National Bible Institute's School for Christian Workers begins its winter session today with a public meeting at the Marble Collegiate church. The object of the school is to prepare volunteer and other workers to teach the Bible intelligently. Don O. Shelton, president of the institute, is conducting a series of monthly lectures on Bible study at Manhattan Gospel hall Monday evenings.

Elect Successor to F. A. Booth—At the fall meeting of New York Presbytery Henry Cole Smith was elected treasurer in place of the late Frederick A. Booth. Six Union Seminary students were received under the care of presbytery: James H. Howard, Ernest J. Weeks, Albert J. Murphy, William Neeley Ross, B. Y. Spare and Lyman R. Heartley.

Recent Brooklyn News—The Italian Presbyterian church on Franklin avenue celebrated "Citizens' Sunday" last week. The pastor, Rev. Stephen L. Testa, spoke to his people on their duty to the commonwealth.—The W. C. T. U. held a day of prayer at the opening of the new headquarters on Schermerhorn street. Special attention was called to the coming convention of the World's Christian Temperance Union.—Tuesday evening, Oct. 21, in Bedford church the Brooklyn Social Union will hold its first meeting of the season. Sir William Ramsay will be the guest of the union.—Port Jefferson church celebrated all last week as "Rally Week." Every evening except Monday was given over to special exercises. Thursday night Dr. Orville Reed, assistant secretary of the Foreign Board, was the principal speaker. Rev. Arthur M. Elliott is pastor.

Dr. Cadman Has Not Decided—Dr. S. Parkes Cadman of Central Congregational church announces that he has not yet made a decision with reference to the renewed call which he has received from Second church in Chicago to become its pastor.

Social Workers' Home Opened—The new Home for Social Workers has just been opened in Gramercy Park. The building is the gift of Mrs. John S. Kennedy and cost over $200,000. It will be occupied by fifty young women, many of them college graduates, all preparing for work among the poorer classes. The building contains besides bedrooms and classrooms ample reception halls to be used for social gatherings for the girls of the east side. The home is connected with the New York City Mission Society, which, although undenominational, is largely supported by Presbyterian gifts.

Observe Memory of Beecher—A Beecher centennial was held last Sunday afternoon in the Academy of Music. Dr. Newell Dwight Hills, present pastor of Plymouth church, delivered the address. Special music was furnished for the occasion under the direction of R. Huntington Woodman, organist of First church. Dr. Lyman Abbott, editor of The Outlook and a former pastor of Plymouth church, took part in the program. The colored citizens of Brooklyn will hold a Beecher centennial Oct. 21 in Plymouth church with special speakers and a chorus of 100 voices, chosen from the choirs of the various colored churches of Brooklyn.

Mainly About People — Rev. Douglas Putnam Birnie, for fifteen years pastor at Rye, N. Y., almost the senior pastor of Westchester Presbytery in point of service, has resigned and proposes to remove to Washington, D. C. With the very regretful consent of the congregation, Westchester Presbytery dissolved the relation last week.—Philip Allen Swartz, son of Dr. William P. Swartz, secretary of the New York Sabbath committee, has gone abroad to become a student secretary among the university men of Russia with headquarters at St. Petersburg.

Brief Bits of News—Dr. Edward M. Deems, who for several years has been connected with the American Seaman's Friend Society, on Nov. 1 will sever his relationship with that organization to become chaplain at Sailors' Snug Harbor.—Dan Crawford is delivering at Union Seminary a series of six addresses on "The Insolent Paradox of Africa." He will give the third talk on Oct. 22 at 5 o'clock. The others will come Oct. 24, 29 and 31 at the same hour.—Broadway church will dedicate its new building Sunday, Oct 25. The pastor, Dr. Walter D. Buchanan, will begin this month his fifteenth year in the Broadway pulpit.—The ministers of Brooklyn Presbytery, who have the habit of lunching together once a year, will meet at University Club of Brooklyn at noon Oct. 28.—Home mission boards in New York City will unite to hire Grand Central Palace for an all-day exhibition on Nov. 20 of various phases of their work. In the evening groups of children from Protestant churches for foreign-speaking people will be brought to the Palace to sing folk songs.

The Best Item of the Week

Sheriff Holds Evangelistic Services While on His Vacation

Louis T. Kniffen, ex-mayor of Wilkes-Barre and now sheriff of Luzerne county, recently took a trip down the Susquehanna river in a houseboat for an outing and stopped at several towns where he held evangelistic services. Wyalusing was especially favored, for the houseboat was laid up there for repairs for almost a week. During this time Sheriff Kniffen held special services in the town, at which a number of conversions took place. Being one of the converts of the "Billy" Sunday campaign in Wilkes-Barre last April and having since led more than a thousand souls to seek salvation, he has a wonderful story to tell of the power of the gospel to save men.

LAYMEN'S GOSPEL WORKERS TO MEET

A convention of laymen's gospel teams will be held at Woodward, Okla., Oct. 21-23. It is expected that twenty-eight gospel teams in Northwestern Oklahoma and in the panhandle of Texas will send representatives with at least 300 men in attendance. A description of the work of one of these teams, that of Tom Blodgett of Wichita, Kan., was given by The Continent several months ago. The team at Woodward was organized last February and has made eleven visits to other towns since then. As a result of their meetings nearly 300 conversions have been recorded.

Sunday School Teacher for 78 Years

Although Mrs. Anna M. Bruen, Belvidere, N. J., is 91 years old she still attends Sunday school regularly. She has been a teacher for seventy-eight years and has seldom missed a Sunday. Her son, Rev. J. de Hart Bruen, is Presbyterian pastor at Belvidere.

Dr. Floyd Poe, pastor of First church, Independence, Kan., spent his vacation on the chautauqua platform and delivered ninety lectures and four sermons.

RESCUE TEN CHINESE "SLAVE" GIRLS

Women Hear of Work of Home—San Francisco Presbytery Hunting Combination Man—Tells Slavs Dangers of Tuberculosis.

SAN FRANCISCO—At the monthly meeting of the Occidental Board Miss Donaldina Cameron, superintendent of the Chinese Home, told of the rescue of ten new Chinese girls from the thrall of the white slave traffic.—Presbytery is now seeking a combination man, as in Seattle Presbytery, who shall be home missionary, Sunday school missionary and immigration secretary for the city.

Reaches Slavic People—Rev. Joachin Glazko, recently appointed for work among the Russians, is succeeding in interesting all the Slav peoples of the Potrero district. He speaks five languages and is putting the social service program before them in unique fashion, lecturing and teaching them the dangers of tuberculosis and the rules for proper housing, as well as giving the distinct gospel message.

Evangelistic Meetings; Expect Dr. Matthews—St. Paul and Bethany churches are holding evangelistic meetings preparatory to the next cummunion service. Neighboring pastors contribute to the pulpit supply on week nights.—Calvary church is waiting longingly for a promised preaching visit from Dr. Mark Matthews of Seattle, who will come to San Francisco the first week in November.

Plan for Exposition Services—On Monday, Oct. 21, Dr. Charles S. Macfarland, secretary of the Federal Council, will address the united associations of ministers of the bay region. He comes primarily to arrange for a committee of 100 to take over the fostering of an evangelistic campaign for the 1915 exposition and look over the ground for the general representation that the Federal Council shall make at that time.

Forty Years in Bay Cities—James Curry, D. D., of Newark, who has been on a prolonged tour of the east, has returned to his charge and last week celebrated forty years of membership in the bay city presbyteries.

WELSH OBSERVE QUARTER CENTURY

Dr. Mark A. Matthews Speaks at Seattle Celebration—Want Pastor for Foreign-Speaking Peoples in Mining Towns.

SEATTLE—Welsh church celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary Oct. 5 with a great gathering. Doctors M. A. Matthews and W. A. Major spoke in behalf of the city and presbytery. The pastor, Rev. Josiah Daniel, is doing a fine work and, together with his work in Seattle, has recently begun a large work among the Welsh in Spokane, projecting a church organization and building.

Pastor for Mining Camps—A pastor to the foreign populations of the coal mining towns of Roslyn, Cle Elum and Jonesville has been asked for and the Home Board will be asked for his support. In the three towns there are 6,500 persons and over 4,000 of them are foreign-speaking people representing twenty-three nationalities.

Special Church Meetings—Madrona church has begun a series of Wednesday night Bible readings under the leadership of Rev. Franklin T. Conner of Brighton church. There will be thirty lessons in the course. Mr. Conner gave his course last year with great success.—Woodward Park church, Rev. J. W. Haman, Ph. D., pastor, has just closed a week of rally. Every night was taken: Fathers' day, brotherhood day, young people's and Sunday school day and all church day, ending with a communion on Sunday morning, Oct. 5, and a sacred concert at night.

Dissolve Church; Hear Council Secretary—A commission of presbytery, W. O. Forbes, D. D., chairman, dissolved Kent church Oct. 3, and will reorganize it again after the meeting of synod. Rev. C. R. McMillin, former assistant pastor of First church, will take charge of the new enterprise with the expectation of making it self-supporting—Dr. C. S. Macfarland, secretary of the Federal Council, occupied pulpits in Seattle Oct. 5 and lectured before the Ministers' Federation on Monday on "Federal Unity."

Western Synods Join in Philanthropic Enterprise

Synods of South Dakota and Nebraska have recently had under consideration further details connected with the organization of a Presbyterian sanitarium and hospital to be located at Hot Springs, S. D. This enterprise was authorized by South Dakota Synod a year ago and at the meeting this fall articles of incorporation were approved. The Synod of Nebraska is cooperating in the enterprise. Rev. D. D. Tallman of Hot Springs is manager of the hospital project and has obtained the cordial approval and cooperation of a number of eminent surgeons and Presbyterian leaders.

Effort is being made to raise $150,000 to start operations and a portion of this has already been pledged. Business men of Hot Springs are heartily cooperating and urging the promotion of this philanthropic enterprise. According to the articles of incorporation the majority of the trustees of the institution will always be Presbyterian. Three members each year are elected by each synod and this nucleus appoints twelve other members of the board. The present trustees include representatives from twelve cities in the two states. Among them are Colonel James A. Mattison, governor of the national sanitarium, a federal institution established at Hot Spring at a cost of $1,000,000, C. C. O'Hara, president of South Dakota School of Mines, Congressman E. W. Martin of Deadwood, F. M. Byrne, governor of South Dakota, C. H. French, D. D., and H. P. Carson, D. D.

Hot Springs was chosen as the location for this new hospital on account of its climate and the further fact that it was selected a number of years ago for the home for disabled United States government soldiers and sailors, a hospital of the state of South Dakota, a cancer hospital and a Catholic hospital. The waters of the springs have large medicinal qualities and the location of the town is such that there is an average of 332 days of sunshine a year. The pine covered Black Hills, which shelter the town, contribute to the healthful qualities. There has been a large demand for a general hospital under Protestant auspices. A site of fourteen acres near the city has been deeded to the hospital.

"JESUS IS HERE!"

CHAPTER I.

It was fifteen years after the First church in Raymond had adopted the motto, "What Would Jesus Do?" The pledge as carried out by the members who had taken it had revolutionized the church. Henry Maxwell still continued as the pastor. Many of the members had been much disturbed by the rule which Mr. Maxwell had introduced into the lives of the members, but a majority had sustained him and he had continued to grow in the respect and affection of his people.

Mr. and Mrs. Maxwell were talking early one Friday evening about a gathering of old friends who were coming to the parsonage that night. It was the anniversary of the day when the First church had taken the pledge to try to do as Jesus would do, and following a custom of several years, a dozen or more of the original company that had taken the pledge then were coming to talk over the old and new phases of their discipleship.

This evening Mr. Maxwell seemed strangely restless. He paced back and forth, pausing to look with deepening and what seemed awed curiosity out of the window into the waning twilight.

"Will Rollin be able to come tonight?" Mrs. Maxwell had asked.

"I'm afraid not. He has been asked to go to Chicago and advise with the Commercial Club on the social evil, but Rachel will come with Virginia."

"Doesn't it seem like a miracle to think of Rollin Page becoming an authority on those great social service questions?" Mrs. Maxwell said.

"It is a miracle. Mary, why should we take for granted that miracles are unnatural or uncommon, or that they belong to any special age of the world? Why may we not expect miracles in our time?

"Do you know, Mary," he continued, "I find myself of late longing, with a feeling I cannot express or explain, for a superhuman vision, for a real manifestation of the Divine Presence that somehow I cannot avoid feeling will be given to Christian disciples of this age. Oh, I long so for a real actual flesh and blood glimpse of Jesus. I feel at times as if I must see Him face to face. I must see Him. My heart cries out for Him. I need Him. And of late I keep wondering what Jesus would do and say in the world where we live. It is so different from the world in which He lived."

Mrs. Maxwell was startled by the deep and passionate outburst of her husband. She rose and came over to him. Before she could speak, he had started forward and pointed eagerly out toward the farthest distance.

"There! It is out there again! That strange light! See, Mary, how it fills the sky! It cannot be twilight; it is too late, and we have seen it now for more than a month! What is it?"

Mrs. Maxwell could feel her husband tremble.

"We have spoken of it before," she answered quickly. "You remember the peculiar light that flooded the sky several years ago?"

"But there is something about this wholly unlike all that. See, Mary! It is not an earthly light!"

The softest, mellowest suffusion of pale blue swept up from the horizon and was met by what seemed an answering wave of deep crimson, and as the two waves mingled the colors were softly blended into an unspeakably dissolving shade of pure white that could not be compared for one moment with sun or moon or star light. It pulsated like a wave backward and forward, and filled not only the entire expanse of sky but seemed as well to fill up all interspaces of the firmament, and then slowly subsided.

Henry Maxwell turned to his wife.

"Mary! It was the very glory of heaven! It was—what if it really was?—the harbinger of His coming to earth again! What if——"

"Henry," she pleaded, "you have allowed your imagination or your longing to get the better of your usual judgment." And she gently drew down the shade of the window.

"I expect you are right," he said with a sigh. "But—I cannot account for it."

"Mr. Norman mentioned it in the News yesterday."

"True. He did. But the Gazette has not had a line. Mary——" Mr. Maxwell started up with a recurrence of his eager excitement as a new thought suddenly possessed him. "Do you suppose—but no, it is all improbable. But we will ask Virginia and Rachel when they come. And Felicia. She and Stephen will be here. They are visiting Rachel this week. It will seem good to see them. And Alexander Powers and Dr. West. They must have seen the light! And the bishop—— There is some one now."

Answering a ring at the door, Mr. Maxwell went himself and ushered in Virginia, Rachel and Felicia. The moment they came in Mr. Maxwell noted the look of deep excitement on their faces.

"Have you seen the light, Mr. Maxwell?" asked Rachel. "We all noticed it on our way here."

"All of you?"

"Yes. We all saw it."

"We have never seen anything like it in all our lives," Virginia said. "It seemed as if we were being enveloped in fire."

"Yes!" Rachel said quickly. "But the people we passed did not seem to notice what seemed so strange to us."

"Only," Virginia broke in eagerly, "don't you remember, Rachel, once in a while some person would stop and exclaim, and point up into the sky?"

"Do you know who they were?" Mr. Maxwell asked, still leaning forward.

"I thought I heard Martha's voice," replied Rachel.

"Our Martha?" Mrs. Maxwell asked. "She just started a little while ago to the church service."

"It was Martha, I am sure," said Virginia eagerly. "We passed her at the corner of Main and Third, and I was going to stop and speak to her."

"You never saw a girl like Martha," Mrs. Maxwell said with deep feeling. "The fearful things that girl suffered in Chicago are past belief, and now, today, she is the most devoted, faithful, enthusiastic disciple of Jesus you ever saw. I think I never saw a more complete love for Christ."

The bell rang and Mr. Maxwell, starting up as from a reverie, went to the door and admitted Dr. West and Alexander Powers and Stephen Clyde. The moment they entered the room they revealed in their faces the same serious look which had been borne by Rachel, Virginia and Felicia.

"Have you seen it?" they asked.

"The Light!" exclaimed Mr. Maxwell, and his voice was instantly echoed by the others. "You all saw it?" he asked, his old excitement rising again.

"Yes, all of us."

The bell rang again, and Mr. Maxwell welcomed into the room President Marsh and Mr. Norman. The moment they entered their faces revealed the same excitement the others had shown. Edward Norman could hardly speak for emotion.

"Maxwell!" he panted, "this is a most astounding thing—this light. It is not explainable!"

"Unless——" Maxwell's face was deathly pale. "Unless, Norman—do you regard it as entirely out of the range of human events that Jesus might live among men again——"

"Henry!" pleaded Mrs. Maxwell, who had come up to him where he stood. The entire company was hushed. "Henry! What an impossibility!"

"But why? Why?" Mr. Maxwell persisted. "If one age was permitted an actual sight of Jesus——"

Mrs. Maxwell gently placed her hand on his arm. "Mr. Norman," she said, "I think Henry is rather nervous, and not just his usual self. He has been working beyond his strength for several months."

"I know he has, Mrs. Maxwell. It's going to be a fine thing for him to have an assistant. By the way, Maxwell, when does Stanton arrive?"

"Stanton? Oh, I told him to come right here, and he may come in any time. He is one out of ten thousand, a splendid fellow."

The bell had rung as he spoke, and he went hastily to open the door. The next moment Maxwell ushered in Richard Stanton, his new assistant, who exchanged greetings as he shook hands; and when he had completed the circle he found himself by Virginia. The others had begun to talk about various matters.

"Miss Page," said Stanton, in low, earnest tones, "I had the most remarkable experience as I came along up here from the station. On the way a most astonishing gleam of light shot up across the sky and seemed to open and shut like a great white blossom. I wonder if you or any of the others have seen it."

Virginia quickly turned to Mr. Maxwell, who was near enough to hear a part of what Stanton said.

"Mr. Maxwell," she cried, "Mr. Stanton, too, saw the light. Can you describe it, Mr. Stanton?"

"I have never seen anything with which to compare it. I never had such a feeling in all my life."

Mr. Maxwell leaned forward and laid a trembling hand on his new assistant's arm.

"Did you notice other people?"

"That was one of the most bewildering things about it. I could not help exclaiming to a man I met, 'Isn't that great?' 'What?' he said, looking at me curiously. 'That light,' I said to him, pointing up at it. He looked up and replied, 'I don't see anything.' Have you people seen anything——"

"We have all seen it," replied Mr. Maxwell. A silence fell over the company, which no one seemed to wish to break.

A door opened in the dining room. Some one walked, almost ran, through the room, and Martha stood at the library opening. As long as life continues, no one in the group assembled there will ever forget the look on Martha's face. She stepped into the room. Everybody had risen. Mr. Maxwell had faced her, as he was nearest, and Martha said, not brokenly, but clearly:

"Jesus is here!"

"Here?" Mr. Maxwell spoke from lips that whispered.

"He is come to earth again! I have seen Him!"

No one stirred or spoke. Martha stood, her face glowing, her eyes fixed on Mr. Maxwell. No one knew how much time had passed when Mr. Maxwell, his face white and a new look in his eyes, said: "Wait! Let Martha speak. Tell us—what—you—have—seen and heard."

This is the opening chapter of the greatest story Pastor Sheldon has ever written. In it he has striven to give expression to the fulfillment of the "World's Desire," and with spiritual vision or foreshadowing has pictured phases of this great event, which he believes might come to pass any day. The story, which is reverent and spiritual throughout, is full of dramatic power. We meet Him in the homes of wealth and fashion and in the abodes of poverty, in Congress, in Wall street, in church and theater, at one time the idol of the multitude, and again the object of their hatred as of old. It is a story that will be read everywhere. It has been written exclusively for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and will begin in that periodical in the October 22 issue. As a special introduction offer to the readers of The Continent who will want to receive all the installments of this great serial, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will, upon receipt of the yearly subscription price ($1.50) and a clipping of the last eight lines of this offer, enter subscriptions to begin October 22 and continue until January, 1915, making in all sixty-two large and beautifully illustrated numbers, one each week. Also, to those who order immediately will be sent a copy of the new 100-page 1914 Christian Herald Almanac free of charge. Address THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 164 Bible House, New York City.—Advertisement.

TO OPEN CHURCHES FOR LABOR UNIONS

Workingmen to Have Offer of Free Meeting Places—Churches Give Little to Temperance Board—Moody Institute Pupils Are Busy.

CHICAGO—Presbyterian churches of the city under the control of the Church Extension Board will be available for meetings of labor unions, according to Dr. E. P. Hill, superintendent. The Illinois Vigilance Association has discovered that there are more than 1,100 labor unions in the city, many of which meet in rooms connected with saloons. It has been proposed that churches be offered for their meetings. It is expected that individual churches will be glad to cooperate with this effort to provide wholesome meeting places for workingmen.

Plan for Assembly Meeting—According to precedent, the session of the church which entertains General Assembly forms the committee in charge of local arrangements. The session of Fourth church, together with others appointed on an advisory committee, will meet soon to organize.

Give Little to Temperance Board—According to a report by Rev. E. R. Worrell, chairman of the temperance committee, at the recent meeting of presbytery at Austin, twenty-seven churches last year gave nothing to temperance. Fifty churches gave a total of $431 to the Temperance Board. Seventy-seven churches gave a total of $3,396 to other temperance agencies. This total included the amounts of Highland Park and Lake Forest churches, which help support a special officer on the north shore. The churches which gave to the Temperance Board contributed an average of 2 1-3 cents per capita, those giving to outside agencies 16 cents per capita. It was resolved by presbytery that the churches should be urged to give at least 5 cents a member to the Board.

Students Hold Many Meetings — Students of Moody Institute last year held or assisted in 16,033 religious meetings in Chicago and taught 13,161 Bible and mission study classes. As a result of personal talks a total of 4,721 conversions was reported at the annual meeting recently held. H. P. Crowell and H. S. Osborne were reelected president and vice president respectively. A Sunday school department to train workers is being introduced at the institute. There has been 66 per cent increase in the correspondence course and the institute has been the clearing house for hundreds of calls for speakers and pastors. Two new buildings are needed.

Improve Missions; Plan Monthly Meetings—The Church Extension Board is putting a furnace into the building occupied by the Ohio Street mission and is improving and redecorating Taylor Street mission.—Plans are under way for the holding of a conference of all Presbyterian workers among the foreign-speaking people of Chicago once a month in rotation at the various missions.

Tells of Flooded Churches—Rev. Daniel Breeze of Shawneetown, Ill., is conferring with local church leaders regarding the rehabilitation of churches in the southern part of the state damaged by the spring floods. The Shawneetown church basement has been repaired, but the manse still has evidences of the action of the nine feet of water that swept the building. Churches in some of the smaller towns are almost helpless; in Equality, for example, half of the church members left the community at the time of the flood. Mr. Breeze represents synod's committee for this relief.

First Luncheon Success—The first of eight fellowship luncheons of the Presbyterian men of Chicago last Tuesday was highly successful. Over 200 men were present to hear Dr. C. B. McAfee. The gatherings will continue for seven Tuesdays.

Gets Pushcarts for Men—The first installment of pushcarts which the Chicago Industrial League has offered to lend men of the city who are out of work appeared on the downtown streets the first of the week. Arrangements have been made through the Associated Charities to care for men who need employment. They gather waste paper and sell it to the league at a price which will enable them to pay for their room and board. The number of pushcarts will be increased in accordance with the demand.

Offer Help for Churches—The Church Extension Board through the new immigration secretary, Rev. W. Clyde Smith, is offering to churches a program telling of work among foreign peoples of the city.—Teams of students from McCormick Seminary will be available this year, as last, for special meetings with young people. The students have been a big help in centering attention on the ministry as a life work.

Catholic Priest Turns Presbyterian—R. A. Fant, pastor of First Italian church, will soon be examined by presbytery to be taken under its care. He was formerly a Roman Catholic priest and has taught in Roman theological schools. He was reached through the Church of Our Savior at Chicago Heights, Rev. E. De Luca pastor.

Five Brief Items—A temperance rally of the Chicago C. E. Union will be held Oct. 23 at Association Hall, when Daniel A. Poling of Ohio will speak.—A dramatization of the story of Ruth and Boaz was acted by children of Kenwood Evangelical church last week. The lines were written and the production supervised by members of the church.—Churches of the city are to be asked to send the pastor and one other representative to the Anti-Saloon League convention at Columbus Nov. 10.—Officers were elected at the annual meeting of the Federation of Churches Tuesday noon.—A conference of men of this presbytery on men's work is being arranged for the near future.

HAVE $1,000 THEY DON'T WANT TO KEEP

Y. M. C. A. Accepts Contribution from Brewers and Arouses Storm of Protest—Beer Men Refuse to Have It Returned.

ROCHESTER—A puzzling problem of Rochester church life has claimed attention for several months, caused by the solicitation and acceptance by the Y. M. C. A. of a $1,000 contribution from the Brewers' Association. In the stress of a "whirlwind campaign" to raise money for a new Y. M. C. A. building the brewers were approached by one of the teams and contributed as an association. At once prominent temperance workers challenged the righteousness of accepting a gift from such source and demanded its return. The various ministerial associations, the W. C. T. U., the Presbytery of Rochester and other bodies have urged the Y. M. C. A. directors to send back the money.

But the Brewers' Association, seeing their advantage, positively refuse to take back the money, or even to change the form of the contribution to that of a personal gift from the brewers as individuals. They say the donation was made officially by the Brewers' Association, was accepted officially by the Y. M. C. A. directors and cannot be returned or modified.

Meanwhile the whole city has the highest regard for the Christian character, eminent qualities and purposive righteousness of the Y. M. C. A. directors and deeply regrets the snare into which they have heedlessly fallen and from which they find no escape.

Some leading ministers deprecate further discussion, others maintain that, as nothing is settled until it is settled right, this thing unsettled will never down. Presbytery, on its part, suggests as a compromise that the $1,000 be handed over to "some local institution devoted to the reclamation of the victims of the traffic, as an act of reparation to the Christian conscience of the city."

After long counsel, the Y. M. C. A. directors issued a statement holding that it would be an unwarranted affront and transgression of the bounds of justice and Christian courtesy to return the money. They, however, suggested that all Christian associations be warned not to solicit money from liquor dealers and not to accept money from liquor associations.

Will Have $60,000 Church—Westminster church will break ground in a few weeks for a beautiful $60,000 church. Rev. H. H. Barstow, late of Anti-Saloon League work, is their new pastor.

A LOOK AHEAD

WITH THE CONTINENT FAMILY

One minister's opinion of Dr. Jowett.

"Dr. Jowett is a priceless blessing to the American pulpit. He calls it back to sound homiletics, to scholarly, evangelical, passionate Gospel discourse. His sermons are doctrinal, yet in the dress of a simple, beautiful rhetoric; a master style of cultured English. They attract without in any way being partakers of the bizarre methods of the popular entertainments of the present day

"He uses the great texts, reasons out the mighty conclusions; and presenting these as the massive themes of Christian truth, he lays them upon the hear with pure and winning illustration He rather hides his logic behind hi analogy; and when he finishes, one rejoices together with him. Dr. Jowet has been long enough in America t have proved that a city pastor need no be either a "mixer" or "winner" in th popular sense of these terms; but tha a man of God, who knows his Scripture and his Saviour, and presents thes in a dignified, cultured, loving way, ca 'move the multitude at will' in th most trying center of Christendom.

"Between New York and San Francisco there are thousands of humbl preachers in country and small town and cities, men of the best college an seminary culture, men who have t live upon salaries that barely give the enough nourishment for their bodie and the life of their dear ones (let alon their mental needs), but men who hav been reared to the same ideal that D Jowett realizes, and in their smalle way have worked this out; and toda they gird themselves anew for th battle with kindling courage becaus this champion is in our midst."

BEST NEWS FROM SIX STATES

Dallas Takes Church Census—Nearly 4,000 visitors were enlisted in the recent religious census taken in Dallas, Tex., which has a population of about 100,000. The last mass meeting in preparation for the gathering of information was held in First church Oct. 3, when instructions were given.

Country Church Helps City Men—The people of Fairbury, Ill., church last week sent to the Chicago Christian Industrial League a carload of furniture, fruit, vegetables, oats and straw for the use of that organization in its efforts to give men of the city an opportunity to earn their living. The furniture will be repaired by the men out of work and sold through the stores of the league at reduced prices to the poor people of Chicago. The other contributions will find useful places. Other country churches have contributed to the city work in similar manner, although not to so large a degree.

Get Children to Go to Church — First church, Pueblo, Colo., has started a new plan of holding but one service on Sunday morning beginning at 10:30 and closing at noon, combining both Sunday school and preaching services. Every one above 6 years of age will meet in the auditorium of the church. The first half hour will be devoted to an opening service. Then will come the sermon, to be followed in the third half hour by study of the regular Sunday school lesson classes. It is hoped that this plan will persuade families to come as such to the church and Bible study exercises.

Woman's Bequest Brings Church—Twenty years ago $175 was left by a poor woman of New York City to be sent to a western mission by Dr. W. M. Paxton, then pastor of First church, New York. The money went to Rev. Theodore J. Weeks, who at General Assembly had told Dr. Paxton of a small mission at Gig Harbor, Wash. Mr. Weeks frequently preached there, but the small congregation finally became broken up. A year ago the people began talking about a church and the old bequest, doubled with interest, was the nucleus for a new building, which was dedicated Sept. 21. Among those taking part were Rev. D. O. Ghormley, Rev. R. P. Shaws and Rev. T. D. Acheson.

Man of 85 Joins Church — Shelbyville, Ind., Church, Rev. Earl R. North pastor, held its general rally Oct. 2 with a large attendance. This is a feature which has proved particularly helpful in exhibiting the strength of the church at the beginning of autumn. At the communion on the following Sunday there was among the number received on confession a resident 85 years of age whose wife had been for fifty-nine years a member of the church.

Drive Liquor Men Out of Trenches—Ventura, Cal., has voted out the saloons by a majority of 168. This victory has been won after many efforts which have failed. The women deserve some of the credit, but the success was largely due to the splendid leadership of Guy W. Wadsworth, D. D., associate secretary of the Temperance Board. He was released from other duties that he might give his whole time to the Ventura campaign. His splendid work in organizing both men and women, addressing meetings, arranging a most interesting temperance exhibit and in every way creating sentiment and winning votes has demonstrated his ability as a campaigner.

MANY CHURCHES ARE ACTIVE

NEW JERSEY—The Southern church has been strengthened at the great expense of Jersey City Presbytery and New Jersey Synod in the call of Dr. James H. Owens from Paterson to be pastor of Pineville Avenue church, Macon, Ga. Dr. Owens, after a brief pastorate at Perth Amboy, came to the East Side church of Paterson twenty years ago.—Passaic First church, where Rev. James D. Steele is pastor, has for ten years supported as its representatives abroad Rev. and Mrs. Walter J. Clark of India. Just before their return to India from their first furlough they spent with their Passaic friends a Sabbath which the church will long remember. A special purse of $100 was presented to them.

Third Church South. The church now under construction at Abington avenue and Ridge street will be known as Third Church North. When these two churches are completed the congregation of Third church will join with High Street church and the old church organization will be discontinued. The building of High Street church will be the center of the new church group. The present pastor of Third church is Rev. Robert S. Inglis.

Newark News—The Presbyterian Union, Newark, at its first meeting in First church Oct. 13 heard the African missionary, Dan Crawford.—The Essex county Sunday school association met in all-day session Oct. 8 in Central church, Newark.—Dr. Dawson of First church, Newark, will begin on Nov. 3 the lecture course which he has conducted for several years.

OPEN IOWA INSTITUTIONAL CHURCH

An institutional church, one of the best in Iowa, was dedicated at Vinton last Sunday. It cost $60,000 and was built in part through the sale of souvenirs of the old bell which was ruined in the fire which destroyed the previous structure in May, 1912. The church seats 700 persons with an additional 300 in classrooms opening into the auditorium. The assembly room of the Sunday school and a number of classrooms provide for that portion of the church in the basement. In the rear of the building, with a separate entrance, is a Y. M. and Y. W. C. A. department with a gymnasium and various rooms. This portion of the church activity is supported by an independent organization composed of citizens of the town. The charity work which the church for five years has been conducting in rented quarters downtown will be transferred to the church, and the building will be open every day. Domestic science classes for poor mothers and others will be one of the features of the institutional work.

New Church at Vinton, Iowa

The church works in harmony with the public schools and has been able to do a large amount of personal work with people ill or in need of assistance of various sorts. Dr. P. Marion Simms, the pastor, was assisted in the dedication exercises Sunday by a number of out of town speakers.

TEMPERANCE NEWS IN THIS ISSUE

Next Sunday is one of the days set apart specially for the consideration of temperance in the churches. For those who desire material for temperance talks or for those who want to keep in touch with the advances made against the liquor forces there is ample information in this issue of The Continent. In addition to the brief items of temperance advance from around the world, on page 1435, there is a specific example of the way in which the foes of liquor are privileged to suffer in the account of the plot against the North Carolina minister, page 1422. For those who wish general suggestions of the way in which various forms of evil may be overcome or counteracted there is Mr. Ellis's sketch of "Holman: High Private," page 1423. Entrance into the saloonkeepers' camp is noted in the item on page 1434, "Puts Invitation Cards in Saloons." The difficulty into which the Rochester Y. M. C. A. was put over a contribution from the liquor association is told on page 1440.

Attention to this special subject this week does not mean that The Continent is neglecting other important topics. The effort is always made to provide a well-balanced paper.

Carroll College opened with the largest freshman class in its history.

The next meeting of the department of superintendence of the National Educational Association will be held at Richmond, Va., Feb. 23-28.

The latest improvement at Todd Seminary for Boys is the installation of a print shop where all of the school printing will be done.

Two important changes took place this fall in the faculty of Western Theological Seminary of the Reformed Church at Holland, Mich. Dr. E. J. Blekkink succeeded the late Dr. N. M. Steffens (father of Dr. C. M. Steffens of Dubuque German College and Seminary) as professor of systematic theology; while Dr. John W. Beardslee, who resigned last spring as professor of Bibical languages and literature, is succeeded by his son, Dr. John W. Beardslee, Jr.

Kentucky Military Institute opened with the largest enrollment in eighteen years. Twelve new rooms are being added to the barracks to relieve the congestion.

Park College students during August in the self-help department canned 2,203 quarts of corn and 1,298 gallons of peaches in addition to doing a large amount of other work.

Beloit College opened with a somewhat larger proportion of young women than last year. The young men have voted to admit young women to membership on the student council.

The Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. of Hastings College are the most active in their history. Nearly every man and woman in the college and academy is now an active member of one or the other of these organizations.

Enrollment in Coe College this fall is 353 as against 271 a year ago. This does not include those attending the music department. The students are registered from fourteen states and six foreign countries.

Lafayette College opened with the largest enrollment in its history, about 600. The faculty for the first time now exceeds sixty in number. Samuel A. Martin, D. D., formerly president of Wilson College, entered upon his duties as professor of philosophy. The annual Founders' Day will be observed Oct. 22.

Unless the small denominational colleges receive a larger percentage of young people, the churches of the country will be compelled to close their doors in a quarter of a century according to predictions made by Dr. M. T. Hodgman, president of Macalester College, in addressing Winona Presbytery. He said that 84 per cent of all the ministers of the country come from denominational colleges and also 93 per cent of all home and foreign missionaries.

Alumnæ of Oxford College are determined that the college shall have an adequate endowment. During the recent Oxford fair, a College Inn was operated by Oxford College girls. The waitresses were college girls. So were the cooks and dishwashers. The bare fact that over $180 was cleared in four days is refutation of the false claims concerning the ability of college women. One of the most successful devices for adding to the fund has been through the Friday evening benefits at the Oxford moving picture show. The proprietor divides the receipts in return for patronage and advertising.

MATERIAL ADVANCE OF CHURCHES

Will Build in the Spring — Emmanuel church, Rochester, N. Y., has sold its property and bought land in another portion of the city on which a building will be constructed in the spring.

New Manses—Lawrenceville, Ill., church has just completed a new modern manse at a cost, with the lot, of approximately $6,000 for the pastor, R. R. Marquis, D. D.—The officers of Middletown, Ohio, church have decided to buy a site for a parsonage.

Replace Burned Church—Park church, Dayton, Ohio, has decided to rebuild on the site of the old structure the edifice which was destroyed by fire during the March flood. Plans are being prepared for a building which will cost about $31,000.

CLERGY AND LAITY

Mrs. T. S. McWilliams, wife of the pastor of Calvary church, Cleveland, Ohio, was recently injured in an automobile accident in Edinburgh, Scotland, while touring with her husband.

Dr. Robert F. Coyle, pastor of Central church, Denver, Colo., has declined the invitation of Dr. G. Campbell Morgan to occupy Westminster church, London, during October and November.

Rev. H. A. Manchester of East Boston, Mass., is sought as pastor of the Union church in Peking, China. His name is also under consideration for the important office of synodical superintendent in New England.

Promises to Leave Masons

The Brooklyn Eagle states what had not been made public before, that Rev. Joseph L. Hervey, pastor of East Brooklyn U. P. church, was permitted by his synod to go uncondemned for his membership in the Masonic order only after he had signed a written promise to withdraw from the Masons.

Financial Situation

Tariff Bill Seems to Have Optimistic Effect—Bankers Consider Better Farming—How One Pastor Saved.

The effect of the passage of the tariff bill on business seems to have been stimulating, although considerable agitation has been aroused over the relation of the steel trust to the new economic situation. The independent steel producers have been slashing prices, and there were reports, immediately contradicted, that some of the western steel plants would curtail output. Reports from abroad indicate that European manufacturers hope for considerable business with America next year. Meanwhile conditions with the wholesale trade are excellent. Collections are better by far than they were during the summer and sales in practically all lines are large. Money has been slightly firmer in New York market and there has been little inclination to enlarge the extent of speculation in stocks.

Circulars Attract Money—Hundreds of investors, mostly people of limited means, are said to be threatened with complete loss of $300,000 through the failure of an implement company in Iowa last week. The concern had luxuriously furnished offices and issued circulars in profusion intimating splendid profits for investors.

North Dakota Resources Increase—According to a compilation of the resources of the state banks of North Dakota it is shown that the assets during the past year have increased $490,000, making a total of $62,460,000. The next call of the comptroller will probably show a still larger increase through the deposits made at the sale of the recent crops.

Following Insurance Companies—Under the regulations which are now in force governing the sort of investments which may be made by life insurance companies, these organizations are rather safe guides to one who is at a loss to know where to invest his money. It will be found upon investigation that insurance companies generally, as well as many other trustees of large funds, invest largely in farm mortgages. It is essential to an insurance company that the security be absolutely safe and that the return be as large as reasonably possible. Investment is made for a long period and the convertibility of the security is not, therefore, a factor. Recently published figures concerning Georgia show that ten insurance companies have invested in that state more than $15,000,000, 60 per cent of which is on Georgia farms. During the last quarter of a century the total losses by these concerns in Georgia through poor investments have been less than $5,000. The increasing value of Georgia land makes such investments increasingly attractive.

Bankers Consider Farm Improvements — The National Bankers' Association at a recent convention gave considerable attention to reports from its agricultural committee in regard to efforts made in recent years by bankers in many parts of the country to stimulate diversified farming and to direct attention to the highest form of efficiency in handling soil. The bankers realize that their deposits and their profits will grow in proportion to the increase in wealth in the community. It has been proved time and again in many parts of the country that the wealth of an agricultural community can be very largely increased through intelligent application of the principles of soil culture developed in the agricultural colleges. Business men generally can well follow the lead of the bankers in encouraging intelligent farming.

Saved His Money $2 at a Time—"I saved my first $500," remarked a preacher the other day, "by depositing $2 or $5 at a time in a building and loan association. When I had $500 I bought a lot in the town where I was then pastor and was about to build on it when called to another charge. I sold the lot at an advance and in the town to which I went I bought an old house and lot for $2,500. The house had been offered to me by another real estate agent at a rental of $30 a month. By being able to buy the property I saved several hundred dollars a year. I was gradually able to pay for my house and have recently sold it and invested the money in a mortgage secured by a good farm which I happened to know about."

"Let us not forget that it is not what we eat but what we digest that makes us strong; not what we read but what we remember that makes us learned; not what we earn but what we save that makes us rich."

among the tenements! You can't sing there!"

"I must. Bob has to have fresh air or die, and if he dies the tousle-headed boy and Jerry and Skinny and Pete and all the rest down there are going to hold me responsible. I've simply got to go. Come, we've barely time. I'll explain on the way—if I can."

"What would the exclusive set think of this venture, Margaret?" asked Mr. Gordon smilingly, after his wife had explained.

"I don't know, I'm sure. I'm not able to classify my own opinion of it. I only know that Bob must have fresh air and that in some way I'm responsible for his getting it. I've always supposed that fresh air was free, but it seems that it's not. And Bob hasn't the price."

"JERRY! Jerry! Skinny! Pete! Here she is!" The tousle-headed boy spoke in a hoarse, guarded whisper. "Gee, boys, see the sparkles on that dress! Ain't it a hummer! Here you kid, go round quick and tell Mugg alley that she's here, after all—the shiny lady. That'll stir 'em up. Quick, boys, work up a crowd! Pack the hall. We want a full house for Bob. Gee, ain't it luck! I say, ain't it luck!"

"We're mighty glad you come," he said politely, turning to Mrs. Gordon. "These chaps was terrible disappointed when I told 'em that you wouldn't. They most mobbed me. My, won't Bob be glad! I just kept a-thinkin' maybe you'd come, but the rest didn't. We fixed him up in a nice chair, and put him in the front row. See?" He pointed toward the platform in the front of the dingy hall. "Us boys was goin' to do some stunts, so's he wouldn't feel too bad. Of course we wouldn't 'a' got enough money to get much fresh air, but we was in for it, you see. Just go on up there and talk to him while the crowd comes. It won't take long when the folks know you're here. Just go straight on up—you'll like Bob."

The dimes began to clink into the little tin box which the tousle-headed boy held safely in his hands. Mugg alley dressed but once a day, in the morning, and thus there was little delay in filling the hall.

Mrs. Gordon sang her songs of robins and trees and leaves and water and green things, and the applause was given in good measure, as promised. Skinny whistled, Jerry imitated the steel hammers, and Pete broke the record with his rendition of the Mugg alley yell. Encore after encore was shamelessly demanded, but the singer never faltered.

Afterwards Mr. Gordon asked to see the tin box. The tousle-headed boy never knew just what he did with it—he only knew that the proceeds of the concert were beyond belief. "Ain't it luck, Jerry?" he exclaimed as they counted the money. "This'll get dead loads of fresh air for Bob. Say, won't it, pard? And he won't have to—to—die!"

"It was the climax of the week, Edward," said Mrs. Gordon as they sat in their home a little later. "How pleased they were! I never knew Mugg alley was like that. So appreciative, so eager, so hungry for the very same things as folks on the boulevards. I enjoyed it very much, more than all the others, I think. Isn't it strange? And how near I came to missing it! We must look after Bob, the boss, and perhaps we can help the tousle-headed boy and Jerry and Skinny and Pete and the rest," she went on musingly. "No, I didn't know Mugg alley would be so—so interesting and human. I think I feel a little proud, Edward, to know that the gang picked me out to draw the crowd. I'm sure Bob will thrive on fresh air."

"And the glory, Margaret?"

Mrs. Gordon smiled. "I had forgotten about that, Edward, but I'm sure there's plenty of it in Mugg alley—glory full blown, too!"

Immediately the newspapers of the state, without regard to political complexion or attitude on the liquor question, took up, editorially and in their news columns, the whole story and declared that it was a "frame-up" by those who did not want prohibition to succeed, and sought to embarrass Davis and the Anti-Saloon League. The Raleigh Times carried this significant sentence in its editorial:

"It might be said in passing that the good Samaritan could be sentenced to the electric chair in Wake county, that the twelve apostles could be hanged and that Moses and Aaron could be confined in a dungeon horrible. All of this is said without reflection on the court or its officers."

Mr. Davis appealed the case to the supreme court, but before that body had an opportunity to pass on the matter, Governor Craig acted. He did not wait or waver, but when the proper affidavits had come to his notice and he had inquired into the case he issued a pardon. Under the law he could not, of course, acquit Mr. Davis or nullify the verdicts of the lower courts, so Mr. Davis must stand on record as found guilty of a crime but given executive clemency.

Nobody knows, of course, just how far-reaching the conspirators hoped their scheme would be. It is certain that they expected to bring prohibition into ill repute in North Carolina and elsewhere through accusing Mr. Davis of descending to their own level—that of committing with a weapon a brutal assault. Without a doubt the fact that he was tried and found guilty will be used by the wets all over the country—indeed, certain wet journals already have used it—as a slap at prohibition, the Anti-Saloon League and the ministry. Of course the wets won't mention the fact that Mr. Davis was exonerated by the governor, or, if they do, they will declare that the reformers compelled the governor to bow the knee.

There were given the governor affidavits going to prove a conspiracy; since the trial was held new evidence was discovered. The application for pardon was indorsed by Judge Cooke, who heard the case, and by Solicitor Herbert E. Norris, state prosecutor. Among the petitioners for the pardon were Senators Simmons and Overman and Secretary of the Navy Josephus Daniels.

The feeling of the right-thinking citizens is perhaps best summed up in these words from an editorial in The Raleigh News-Observer:

"The action of Governor Craig will be fully indorsed throughout the state, the exceptions so few as to be unnoticed. That the charges against Rev. R. L. Davis were born of retaliation for his vigorous course as superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League has been and is the belief of vast numbers of people of North Carolina."

The conspiracy has proved a boomerang. It has stirred up the temperance people of North Carolina as they were never stirred before.

MINISTERIAL OBITUARY

Rev. Charles E. Thomas, pastor of First church, Hillsdale, Mich., who died Oct. 8, will be greatly missed from the councils of the Synod of Michigan, as well as by his family and his congregation. He took hold of the evangelistic work of the synod when it was at its lowest ebb and made it a force in the synod. He was just planning a systematic campaign throughout the state. He was born near Baltimore, Md., where he grew up, and for six years before entering the ministry practiced law in Baltimore. He was ordained by Lansing Presbytery in 1893. He had had a remarkably practical experience, having been Y. M. C. A. general secretary at Richmond, Va., Nashville, Tenn., and Lansing, Mich. His first charge was at Brooklyn, Mich., where he remained three years, going to Sturgis, Mich., in 1896, where he remained until 1900, when he was dismissed to Lafayette Presbytery (Southern Church). In 1903 he returned to Michigan as pastor of Franklin Avenue church, Lansing. In the spring of 1907 he accepted a call to Hillsdale. He will be a great loss to the ministry in Michigan, where he did such good work for more than twenty years.

SYNODS ARE MEETING

Against Abolishing Country Work — Indiana Synod, meeting at Peru Oct. 6-8, adopted without dissent an overture asking General Assembly to rescind its action instructing the Home Board to discontinue the department of church and country life when practicable. Dr. John P. Hale of Lafayette is to be home mission superintendent with five assistants caring for a like number of districts into which the state will be divided. Religious work at the state university and at the important secular colleges received much attention. Dr. O. D. Odell of Indianapolis was elected moderator.

Favor Synod Hospital—South Dakota Synod met Oct. 2-5 in the new house of worship at Groton, where Rev. Jacob Scott Butt has been pastor twenty-five years. Rev. J. W. Christianson of Sisseton was chosen moderator. The Sabbath school and Christian education institute that preceded synod was stimulating and included besides the remarks of members of synod addresses by Doctors S. R. Ferguson and J. A. Marquis, president of Coe College, Cedar Rapids, Iowa, and Richard C. Hughes of the Board of Education. The popular conferences and discussions on church finance and evangelistic work quickened the interest of all. They were led by Rev. Moses Breeze and Dr. W. H. Kearns and Rev. George G. Mahy. Sabbath evening Dr. C. E. Bradt of Chicago spoke on "The Chinese Puzzle and Its Solution." The survey of the work showed some advance, but not quite so much per capita contributed to beneficence or expended for congregational expense, nor quite so few churches failing to report accessions by profession and a few more were reported vacant. Synod expressed earnest appreciation of Dr. C. H. French and the work he has done as president of Huron College and also approved the incorporation of a hospital and sanitarium to be erected and operated in Hot Springs, S. D., under the auspices of synod. The meeting of the Women's Synodical Missionary Society, whose annual report, read at the popular meeting Sabbath evening, showed more advance than synod's reports, was pronounced, as was the meeting of the synod, "the best yet."

WORK OF THE PRESBYTERIES

Start Endowment Movement—Dallas Presbytery at Grand Prairie, Tex., elected Rev. E. T. Neel moderator. Earl Rodgers was received as a candidate for the ministry. Union with Reformed Church was approved. A movement for the further endowment of Trinity University was inaugurated.

Approve Vacancy Apportionment—Huron Presbytery met at Huron, S. D. Rev. C. K. Smoyer, who began his ministry forty years ago in the Huron church, was elected moderator. The every-member canvass was heartily indorsed. The overture on the Reformed Church was affirmed. It was ordered that one-half cent per member be added to the apportionment for vacancy and supply. Loren Hester of Peru church and Eugene Terry of Norwalk church were recommended for scholarships. A special feature was a conference on Christian education.

Increase Salaries of Pastors—Utica Presbytery met in Olivet church, Utica. A step forward was taken when the presbytery voted to increase by $50 each the salaries of ministers serving home mission churches. An overture was ordered sent to Assembly asking it not to discontinue Home Board's department of church and country life. The feature of the closing session was an address by Dr. Joseph W. Cochran.

Visit All Home Mission Churches—Corning Presbytery met at Diagonal, La., and chose Rev. George Korteling moderator. Addresses were made by C. E. Bradt, D. D., Rev. D. R. Leland and Rev. L. E. Koenig. Rev. A. B. DeLong of Creston was placed upon the honorably retired roll. Rev. J. K. Driver, chairman of the home mission committee, and Rev. C. H. Purmort, D. D., synodical superintendent of home missions, assisted by neighboring pastors, are engaged upon a visitation of the home mission churches, holding conferences and delivering addresses and evangelistic sermons.

Big Gains in Five Years—Tulsa Presbytery met in First church, Tulsa, Okla. The report of the evangelistic committee showed a substantial gain in the membership of twenty-two churches. There has been a gain in the membership in the last five years of over 63 per cent, a gain of gifts for local expenses of over 30 per cent, and a gain in the benevolences of over 150 per cent. The home mission committee recommended that every church observe Home Mission Week with suitable services. Reformed Church overture was answered in the affirmative. Overture asking an assessment of one-half cent per member for vacancy and supply was laid on the table.

Refuse Money for Committee—Lehigh Presbytery met in College Hill church, Easton, Pa. One session and parts of the others were devoted to conferences and addresses upon Christian education and the increase of students for the ministry, the speakers being J. W. Cochran, D. D., and John E. Tuttle, D. D., of York. These conferences are to be followed by others to be arranged locally throughout the winter. Presbytery affirmed union with the Reformed Church, but negatived the request for an appropriation for the committee on vacancy and supply. J. A. McCurdy, son of I. P. McCurdy, D. D., of Lansford, was received as a candidate for the ministry. A petition from ninety-two residents of North Allentown, asking for a church, was favored.

Consider Rural Churches — Cayuga Presbytery meeting was held in Dryden. A helpful address on Christian leadership was given by Rev. J. A. MacIntosh of Ithaca. After the devotional service Wednesday morning a tribute to the memory of her husband from Mrs. W. H. Hubbard was read. The recommendation of the General Assembly of a tax for the committee on vacancy and supply was rejected. The proposed union with the Reformed Church was approved. Candidates Huntsman, Beecher, McClennan and DeSimone were taken under care of presbytery. The conference on rural churches was opened with a paper by Dr. Palmer covering thoroughly the conditions in the rural churches of presbytery. An overture was adopted requesting General Assembly to reverse its action of last year touching the department of church and country life. A committee was appointed to confer with officers of other denominations to seek friendly discussion looking to unification of work of sister churches where feasible and to the uniting or merging of weak churches in communities where it is desirable.

Favor Church Union—Larned Presbytery met in Bucklin, Kan. Rev. J. T. M. Knox was elected moderator. Presbytery voted in favor of the union with Reformed Church.

Approve Union Plan—Osborne Presbytery at Hoxie, Kan., elected Rev. W. B. Brown moderator. Union with Reformed Church was approved. Conferences on evangelistic work and on Christian education were held.

Ready to Consolidate Committees—Springfield Presbytery in session at Virginia, Ill., elected S. M. Morton, D. D., moderator; received H. C. Stoll and J. R. Hastings under care as candidates; approved plan for union with Reformed Church and plan for consolidation of home mission, church erection and Sabbath school work in synod; heard addresses by Rev. C. E. Jenney and Rev. D. C. MacLeod on Christian education, and approved the proposed transfer of the Union church from the Presbytery of Peoria to that of Springfield.

Vary Business Session—The monotonous grind of business was broken up in the meeting of Redstone Presbytery at Belle Vernon, Pa., by conferences and devotional services. A two-hour conference on evangelism conducted by Rev. E. D. Bevier was enjoyed. Dr. George W. Shelton of Pittsburg made the principal address. James E. Hutchison, D. D., of Scottsdale was elected moderator. A new standing committee on men's work was created. The proposed union with Reformed Church was approved. The request for one-half cent per member for vacancy and supply was refused.

May Unite Two Presbyteries—Steuben Presbytery at Cuba, N. Y., heard an address on "Religious Education" by Rev. Harry Hopkins Hubbell of Lafayette Avenue church, Buffalo. Rev. Walter S. Davison of Bath was elected moderator. Presbytery answered in the affirmative the question relative to union with the Reformed Church. A committee was appointed to confer with a like committee from Chemung Presbytery regarding a possible union of the two presbyteries. The stated clerk was directed to write the Home Board strongly commending the work of the country life department and urging the board to continue it.

Evangelism Is Keynote—Genesee Presbytery at Bergen, N. Y., had in all the sessions the keynote "Evangelism." A conference on evangelistic work was led by Rev. Samuel Riddagh. At the popular meeting addresses were given by Rev. John U. Steele, Rev. Samuel Riddagh and Rev. Evan M. Jones. Overture on union with the Reformed Church affirmed. It was voted to recommend that the churches place Auburn Seminary in their budgets. The policy of the Home Board in placing emphasis on the needs and plans for improvement in country church life was approved. The membership of the executive commission was increased for the purpose of assisting in the every member canvass campaign.

Form Southwest Bible Conference

Rev. Howard A. Clark is president of the newly organized Southwest Bible and Missionary conference which will meet annually at Flagstaff, Ariz. The conference has been held in Flagstaff for the past seven years but has considered only the work among Indians of the Southwest. It was thought wise to broaden the scope of the gathering in order to include consideration of Christian work in various fields.

OBITUARY

Death notices will be inserted at the rate of one cent a word. Payment must be sent with the notice. Those who ask their pastor to write such notices should be careful to hand him the money to forward with the copy.

Treadwell—John Noble Treadwell, born Nov. 20, 1828, passed from this life at his home in St. Peter, Minn., June 22 last. Mr. Treadwell was a true man of God and his life is above all criticism. He took a deep interest in the welfare of the community and he exerted a strong influence for good in its commercial, educational and social life. As a worker in the church he bore a unique record. Since 1866 he served continuously as elder in the Union Presbyterian church of St. Peter, having been clerk of the session since 1869. During much of this time he also served as superintendent of the Sunday school. In his passing the home, the community and the church have lost a wise counselor and a true man of God. But his influence and memory will still live and continue to bring forth fruit in the Master's service.

What Presbyterians Say

President and faculty and trustees cannot by themselves make a Christian institution. Back of it must be the sympathy, the prayers and the financial support of those who recognize the responsibility of the great church to which they belong. All over the country Presbyterians are following our announcements in The Continent. Hundreds of them write to us for information. Here is

A TYPICAL LETTER

President C. M. Steffens, D.D.—Dear Sir: I read your earnest appeals for help in The Continent. My heart goes out in prayerful thought toward you and the foreign students who are preparing for the grand soul-saving work and uplifting of the lives and character of those who are to be our [illegible]izens, making our laws and carrying on the reforms [illegible]ave our country and build up the kingdom of our Lord [illegible] My small contribution is but a drop in the ocean of your need. It goes with my prayers for you and yours.—Mrs. S. J. E.

This lady has seen the need and has done her part. Perhaps you have not been fully informed regarding our work. Let us tell you some of the facts that we cannot present here for lack of space. You will be placed under no obligation by your request. Address Dubuque German College and Seminary, President C. M. Steffens, D.D., Dubuque, Iowa.

Around the Shop

As our train sped through the outer section of the city an ancient gateman shook his fist at the man in uniform who stood on the rear platform—a motion clearly not one of malice. Presently we were in the country. . . . A little child, striving manfully to force a fat puppy to occupy a seat in the swing, lost his grip on the struggling dog as he waved his chubby hands at the passing choo-choo. . . . A housewife at her kitchen door, pausing by habit to wipe her hands in her apron; a farmer, with his wagon a safe distance from the rails; a negro with his plow, vastly enjoying the respite—all hands waving to the speeding train.

Whatever instinct it is that leads folk impulsively to wave to the hurrying train, the Around-the-Shop Man trusts no sense of dignity or snobbishness will ever be allowed to check it. He is reminded now of a certain dear old Quaker whose abode was by the track. Crippled and enfeebled though he was, scarcely a train, either passenger or freight, went by that he did not greet. The railroad men came to know him and to watch for him. (The Around-the-Shop Man could tell a pretty story of this truly "passing" acquaintance if he had space.) By and by there came a day when the old man was not seen, but his little grandson occupied his place by his command—for he said with a touch of pride, "They'll expect us not to forget just because I'm not there." And perhaps from the door someone still perpetuates the instinct of a kindly soul.

Are we training those who will follow us to lay upon the best that we have sought to do, and to make it better? The Around-the-Shop Man has noticed that in every instance when someone writes, "I began to read your paper when I was a child at home," that someone has done honor to his parents. Have you thought what the lack of such an influence in the families of your friends may lose to them?

How Much Is Christ Able For?

"No scheme for reorganizing society by legislation induces in me any serious faith. It see no hope for the ultimate cure of the world's social ills elsewhere than in the increasing development of such individual character as shall be able and willing by free personal choice to limit personal action within social bounds. Only Christianity, I believe, is capable of producing that character. Therefore, I maintain that Christianity alone can solve the social problems of the age."

"My dear sir, Christianity has had two thousand years to produce that type of character and bring about that social revolution. It has not done it yet. I do not believe it ever will. We must also have human law to compel the individual to act, as you say, within social bounds."

The respondent in this wholly unimaginary conversation was not an infidel. He was not a non-church-goer. Instead, he was an outspoken Christian of the evangelical sort. In fact, to tell all the truth, he was a minister of the gospel whose record of successful service testified to his consecration in the preaching of Christ.

But he didn't believe that that gospel—indispensable though it is in many spiritual ways for which he had perfect faith—is going to prove sufficient for all the needs of humanity. He thought it would require a human supplement—a mechanical extension—to make it compass the whole insistent problem of replacing unrighteousness with righteousness in the world.

That, soberly measured, is an enormous skepticism.

Is it common in the church?

This particular sort of doubt is not to be confounded with that reversed and negative faith resulting from extreme predestinarian and premillenarian ideas—the dark doctrine that God never did intend to save more than a small fraction of mankind and now purposes speedily to end the world as an outworn failure.

Such was not the point of view of the minister here quoted. Neither is there enough of that sort of thinking to give color to the present-day church anywhere. What we are here confronting is something much more pervasive—and very much more startling.

This far bigger pessimism is not doubting that God wishes to purify the world but doubting whether he is able.

It is not merely taking account of men's freedom to reject God, which renders it problematic how many will eventually accept the gospel. It is questioning whether the message if accepted will do the work it is calculated for.

Suppose the majority of men do come to confess Christ as Lord and Saviour—will his grace in their hearts then make them self-denying, gentle, loving, helpful, seeking the welfare of their neighbors in preference to comforts and gains for their own lives?

This melancholy disbelief says, No.

To master men's selfishness society will still need to appoint its own policemen and kindle their lanterns with the fires of its own humane ideals.

All of which, put in a blunt and uncomfortable word, signifies: "God is a failure; his way won't work."

Does the church really feel so?

Assuredly the church would use no such ghastly phrase as that. But its attitudes again and again betray some such unvoiced unfaith.

What else can be the reason why Christian citizens put so little confidence in making over communities through the regeneration of individual men?

And what else prompts the constant repetition of that hopeless phrase, "You know you can't change human nature"—when as a matter of fact the whole scheme of Christianity turns on a colossal proposal to change human nature utterly, give it new birth.

What else, as a chief and final consideration, can account for the reluctance and timidity of the modern church about attacking its evangelistic duty—for its constant disposition to resort in preference to plans for reforming laws and stimulating social spirit?

This is not impugning the religious sincerity of the church. The church believes the gospel is good and true and worth preaching.

But the vital matter here at issue is how extensively the church believes the gospel.

Does the church believe the gospel is good for something—or sufficient for everything?

There is a world of difference between these two measures.

The first means that the church will push the gospel—and a lot of other things along with it.

The second means that the church will push the gospel.

The stumbling block that lies big in the path of this argument is the sickening, staggering truth of what this minister said: Christianity has indeed had two thousand years to prove itself able to cleanse human society and it hasn't done it yet.

The very church itself, accepting Christianity, is a society still honeycombed with the gangrene of the selfishness Jesus came to cure. The world sees the ugliness of unbrotherhood sticking out of the "body of Christ" at every pore. No wonder some say the life in the body is impotent.

But honest Christendom knows in its soul that its putrefying sores are the sores of its unfaithfulness—not of its Lord's life. These hated spots fester where it had rejected its Lord's blood.

Christendom knows Christ never had a real chance yet in his own church—say nothing of the rest of the world.

The power of the living Master does work with thousands—does make them new creatures—heroic missionaries, self-forgetful comrades of the poor, unresting mothers, steadfast fathers, dependable sons, tender daughters, sacrificial ministers of salvation and consecrated almoners of many another godly grace for men.

Even the veriest cynic knows some real Christians.

Fill the world with such real Christians, and injustice and oppression would flee forever—laws and devices of men being needless to hasten their exit.

A craven church might doubt God and say so many real Christians could never be.

But a church worthy of Jesus will vow that at least the power of his Spirit to make men right-living brothers of men in this world shall not be discounted until for one generation at least he has been given free way to prove it.

And now is the time not to doubt him—

But to go in for living Christianity to the limit—

And see if it doesn't demonstrate itself equal to all necessities, social as well as spiritual.

Mrs. Pankhurst Halted; President Intervenes

Mrs. Emmeline Pankhurst of London is the latest foreigner of prominence to run up against the United States immigration laws. When she arrived at New York on a steamer from Paris last Saturday she was denied permission to land by a special board of inquiry sitting at Ellis Island. Immediately an appeal was taken to the department of labor at Washington, with the promise that if she were ordered deported a writ of habeas corpus would be sought in the federal court—the same proceedings by which the notorious ex-President Castro of Venezuela circumvented the immigration authorities. As a further alternative Mrs. O. H. P. Belmont offered to give a $100,000 bond to guarantee that Mrs. Pankhurst would leave the country within a definite time and would not violate the laws in the meanwhile. The commissioner of immigration, Anthony Caminetti, at once granted a hearing on the appeal, devoting a considerable part of Sunday to the matter. President Wilson held a special conference on Monday morning with the commissioner and the secretary of labor, W. B. Wilson, to review the case.

Section 2 of the immigration statute provides that "persons who have been convicted of or who admit having committed a felony or other crime involving moral turpitude" shall be excluded. The board held that conspiracy to commit arson involved moral turpitude, as did Mrs. Pankhurst's admission that she had advised the destruction of property "if necessary." As a result of the President's conference, however, the ruling of the lower board was reversed and Mrs. Pankhurst was admitted, just in time to be the heroine at a big mass meeting in Madison Square Garden. Her case was hurried along in order to enable her to fill this and other public speaking engagements.

Protests Against "Ritual Murder" Trial Are General

The United States Congress has been asked to take cognizance of the trial of Mendel Beiliss, the poor Jewish laborer charged with "ritual murder" at Kiev, Russia. In The Continent last week a brief summary was given of the proceeding in which a Jew is formally accused of shedding the blood of a Christian boy for a sacrificial ceremony. Congressman Sabath of Chicago presented the resolution, which was referred to the house committee on foreign affairs. The preamble recites that the civilized world is aroused by this false and senseless accusation; that the object is to create anti-Jewish prejudice in Russia, and that such accusations have in the past been followed by massacres of Jews and the destruction of their property. The resolution then declares that the principles of eternal justice and the interests of civilization demand that the charges of ritual murder against this defendant or against any other Jew be withdrawn.

Meetings of protest and indignation were held by Jews and non-Jews during the past few days in Washington, Chicago, New York and in other parts of the country. In Chicago last Sunday afternoon two theater auditoriums were filled to overflowing by the protestants. The speakers as well as the attendants at most of the meetings were in many instances Christians and they did not hesitate to arraign the Russian government itself for encouraging the astonishing outcropping of mediæval superstition and persecution at Kiev.

President Wilson Not to Recognize Mexican Election

Hopes of improvement in the Mexican situation were dashed last week by President Wilson's announcement that the American government would refuse to recognize or approve the elections in Mexico long ago set for the 26th of this month. The high-handed action of Provisional President Huerta in wiping out the chamber of deputies and virtually assuming a military dictatorship was disappointing and displeasing to President Wilson and his advisers, and the more Huerta's recent "decrees" were studied in Washington the deeper this feeling became. And thereafter Huerta reiterated that he would not resign pending the election, nor would he leave the capital except to fight the rebels. A plausible rumor was circulated last Monday to the effect that Huerta himself would be an eleventh hour candidate for the presidency in spite of previous promises to the contrary.

Seventy-four of the 110 deputies arrested by Huerta's orders October 10 were arraigned in Mexico City last Saturday, and charges entered against them of rebellion, sedition and "insults" to public functionaries—political offenses reminiscent of the days of Charles I. or Louis XIV. The same day ten of the deputies were released, the remainder having previously been freed.

Step Toward Independence for Philippines

Home rule and possible independence for the Filipinos has been brought a step nearer. President Wilson and Secretary Garrison last week selected four members of the Philippine commission, the real governing body of the islands, and these four, added to one Filipino already a member of the body, will make five of the nine members of the commission natives. Heretofore Americans have held a majority of the membership in this body, which in reality is the upper house of the Philippine legislature. The new governor general, Francis Burton Harrison, recommended the native appointees as among the most prominent and best educated men in the islands. One of them had been a justice of the supreme court and another had been an assemblyman. The plan is to put the government of the entire archipelago under native control.

Governor General Harrison in his recent inaugural address promised the Filipinos that the whole conduct of the government would be with a view to ultimate independence. He said: "We hope to move toward that end as rapidly as the safety and the permanent interests of the island will permit. We regard ourselves as trustees, acting not for the advantage of the United States but for the benefit of the Philippine people." As a word of warning the governor said that after each step taken experience would guide the administration to the next, and that the present advance is made with the expectation that the political capacity of citizens of the islands will be successfully tested. The islanders were reminded that for the present the United States is responsible before the world for their welfare and progress and until independence is complete "we shall demand unremitting recognition of our sovereignty." And again: "You are on trial before an international tribunal and we eagerly await convincing proof that you are capable of establishing a stable government. We place within your reach the instruments of redemption. The door of opportunity stands open, and the event, under providence, is in your hands."

Under the new plan the only veto over Philippine legislation will be in Washington. Critics of the administration policy are pointing out the disadvantage of having the legislative body on one side of the world and the veto power on the other. But in Manila and in the islands the governor general's official announcement was received by the natives with enthusiastic approval. According to newspaper dispatches last week, however, business conditions have been disturbed by the change in policy, and it is asserted that the natives are growing "bumptious."

Lloyd George Opens Campaign Against "Landlordism"

The land issue in Great Britain was placed before the public by Chancellor David Lloyd George in an address at Bedford on the 11th instant. He called it a campaign "to free British land from landlordism, and get the people back to it." Although lacking in definite details, the chancellor's speech made it plain that he believes—and presumably he speaks with the sanction and support of the Liberal government—that the most desirable thing just now is to improve the condition of the agricultural class and increase its numbers. If this class held its proper position in the state it would offset the vagaries of the radical labor element with no stake in the country.

Lloyd George told his auditors that the percentage of cultivated land in Great Britain is lower than in any country of Europe and that British farm laborers work longer hours and receive lower pay than any others—no wonder scores of thousands are emigrating. "The country must choose," said he, "between the power of the land owners and the prosperity of the laborers." For one thing, he asserted, the game preserves of the British Isles must be reduced by two-thirds—trees and underbrush must yield to tillage and vacant acres must be peopled and the excess of urban population reduced. This all means the nationalization of rents and eventually the nationalization of land. Lloyd George and his friends consider this a fundamental reform which underlies and dominates all the other reforms on the Asquith program, such as old-age pensions, accident, unemployment and health insurance, maternity benefits, minimum wage laws, or compulsory arbitration.

Both the Unionists and the Liberals would take political advantage of the existing land problem, the Unionists proposing peasant proprietorship under state aid and the Liberals, in this respect led by Lloyd George, asking first for peasant occupancy under state proprietorship. These plans sound somewhat similar to outside observers, but all parties, including the organized laborites, apparently realize that reform in the system of land tenure is the paramount issue. On this issue, rather than on Irish home rule, the next British election will probably turn.

Over twenty-five years ago Joseph Chamberlain had an analogous plan, never carried into effect, for the expropriation and redistribution of the land of the country, which one of his followers crytallized into the phrase "three acres and a cow" for every man.

President of France Visits King of Spain

Spain and France have been exchanging official courtesies of late, the most recent being a visit a few days ago of President Poincare to Madrid. One object of the French executive's trip was reputed to be an agreement that may cause the re-entry of Spain into European politics, where of late years she has been a negligible factor. Spain and France have important colonial interests in North Africa, where each is involved in war with native tribes. These wars are very unpopular with the powerful Spanish Socialistic party, and a mass meeting was held in Madrid last week to protest against them.

An elaborate series of fetes was arranged by King Alfonso for the entertainment of his guest, including a gala bull fight, but the latter festivity President Poincare declined to attend. It is stated that the president is a noted lover of animals and this form of sport does not appeal to him.

New Polar Land Is Discovered

What is believed to be the last discovery of new land which can ever be made was announced last week at St. Petersburg. A Russian government exploring party reported the discovery of a continent 500 miles north of Siberia in the Arctic circle, midway between Franz Jozef Land and the New Siberia islands, in latitude 77 north, longitude 148 east. Commander Wilkitzky of the Russian navy, who was in charge of the expedition, gave it the name of Nicholas II. Land and took possession in behalf of the czar.

The land is uninhabited and mountainous, with a number of volcanic peaks. Walrus, reindeer and polar bears were reported and also the presence of scant vegetation. Economically and politically the value of the newly discovered territory is nothing, but geographically it is, of course, most interesting and will make a striking addition to the polar map. The explorer Stefansson, who is aided by the Canadian government, is expected to pass to the east of the point covered by the Russian expedition, and may bring back further information concerning the new and perhaps additional lands, though, like the lamented Captain Scott at the south pole, he will not have the first glory of the discovery.

Governor Sulzer Convicted and Ousted

For William Sulzer, latest elected governor of New York state, the end has come politically. Last week he was deposed from office after being found guilty on three counts of the impeachment articles following a protracted trial before the state senate and the judges of the court of appeals. The lower house of the legislature acted as prosecutors. Practically no substantial defense was made to the charges. The governor was removed from office as a result of the verdict, which was based on the following charges: Making a false statement of campaign receipts and payments; perjury in stating that this statement was true; practicing deceit and fraud and using threats to suppress testimony desired by the legislative investigating committee prior to the impeachment.

Presiding Judge Cullen voted not guilty, although he stated he found that Mr. Sulzer did take advantage of his nomination and candidacy for the governorship to seek personally to enrich himself by diverting contributions received for campaign purposes; also that he knowingly signed and swore to a false campaign statement.

The Sulzer trial has attracted an immense amount of attention because of the prominent position of the respondent and his peculiar personality and because it is generally believed that the prosecution would not have been begun nor persisted in had not the governor openly and violently defied the Tammany political machine. During his several terms in Congress Mr. Sulzer, although regarded as somewhat erratic, made a creditable record. Some of his former colleagues in Washington are of the opinion that the germ of evil reached Sulzer late in his public life.

—That industrial warfare can approximate actual war in point of costliness is shown by the Dublin strike. More than 100,000 persons are in want and the losses to the trade of the one city alone were estimated at $60,000 a day for the past five weeks of the strike.

Unity Preferred to Change of Church Name

Although it has been accepted by all concerned that no attempt will be made in the present session of the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church to force the issue of changing the name of the denomination to "American Catholic," yet the underlying difference of opinion on this subject frequently breaks forth in discussions on other matters. The question came to the surface in a form of peculiar interest when Dr. Manning, rector of the famous old Trinity parish in New York City, and himself a strong advocate to the change, surprised all his colleagues by introducing an amendment to the canons providing that alterations of church law shall hereafter be accomplished only by a vote of two-thirds majority in the house of deputies.

Dr. Manning said frankly that he was convinced a new church name should be adopted. But to make so radical a departure on a bare majority would be almost certain to introduce schism, and Dr. Manning declared his zeal for Christian unity very much greater than his zeal for the name change. Only the day before he had presented the report of the committee working to arrange for a conference on faith and order in which the views of all the varying divisions of Christendom shall be fully presented for friendly comparison. This effort for unity, said Dr. Manning, would self-evidently be stultified if Episcopalians should divide at the very moment when they were urging others to unite. Therefore he besought the General Convention to give guaranties of its own unity by adopting the amendment he proposed, although it must obviously delay changes which he favored.

Strangely enough, antagonism to this proposal sprang forth instantly from the Protestant party that has been fighting adoption of a new name. Although its effect would certainly be to defend the historic name to which these leaders are attached, they suspected Dr. Manning of an ulterior endeaver to checkmate other progressive movements. But arguments from this standpoint did not prevent the adoption of Dr. Manning's motion, which was carried by a majority considerably more than the prescribed two-thirds.

Other important actions were the adoption of a new canon dividing America into eight church provinces, which are empowered to hold provincial synods and legislate for their particular sections, and the appointment of a commission to revise the Book of Common Prayer in the direction of a simpler and more modern ritual.

Anti-Vice Movement Splendidly Successful

The ministers in the churches of Austin, Texas, have achieved a great moral victory over commercialized vice in their city, which is having the effect of a moral revival throughout the great state of which Austin is the capital. When a peculiarly flagrant crime was committed in Austin, the ministers called a mass meeting of protest. There Mayor Wooldridge appeared and boldly challenged the meeting to assist in producing such a state of public sentiment as would sustain an executive order closing the houses of vice in the city. The united Protestant pastors accepted the challenge, and planned a publicity campaign of newspaper advertising quite on the lines made familiar by the example at Atlanta.

The circulation of these appeals to public sentiment was sufficient, when backed by much preaching on the subject and two more union mass meetings of the churches, to afford the mayor the support he needed for action. Sustained by a bare majority of the council, an order went forth closing the vice resorts of the town at the first of October. The ministers had already offered to give proper sustenance and care to any of the women involved who desired to leave the life they had been leading, but only one accepted the offer. All the others left Austin.

It was promptly realized, however, that this victory could be preserved only by constant vigilance against reaction. To fortify Austin in this particular the ministers have secured the cooperation of influential laymen in the organization of the Austin Anti-Vice League. The league already has a membership of hundreds, rapidly increasing. The president is Dr. W. T. Mather, professor in the state university and an elder in the First Presbyterian church, whose pastor, Dr. Arthur F. Bishop, has been an outstanding leader in the whole campaign.

All this development of sentiment in Austin has attracted attention in other cities of Texas, and in Dallas the county attorney has publicly expressed his determination to clean up that city.

Public Goodness

THERE IS NOTHING in the Bible that forbids public goodness. It is only goodness that is public for the sake of publicity that gets condemned. It is not said that we are not to do our alms before men. The fact is, it is often a good thing to let goodness be seen. It is our way of letting our light shine before men. It acquaints some people with the appearance of righteousness who might never see it otherwise. They have to see it in other people or not see it at all.

Some forms of good are not half so good when they are done under cover as when they are out in the light. Charity wants to keep quiet, but it doesn't want to do any sneaking. The world is better for knowing what goodness is going on. You are better for reading of the unostentatious work that strong men and women are doing in the city slums. For years there was a beautiful work done in London for crippled children. The poor, helpless little ones were tenderly cared for and made to see joy. And no one knew it. Men said hard things of the heartlessness of their fellows.

Then a woman learned of the beautiful charity and told its story in the magazines, and many hearts were softened and some who had said hard things learned to say tender ones. Similar work was undertaken in other cities and other cripples were made glad. Such alms double their value by getting out into view. Bugle tones are softer and sweeter when they are muffled, but they carry farther and stir more men to bravery and victory when the bugle-throat is clear and the notes ring out undisguised.

All this is true of churches. There is a hiding which is hindering. There is a humility which is hurtful. Pastors refuse to say what good things the Lord has done for their churches lest some thoughtless reader may think more of them than of their Lord. Yet many a church is made more enthusiastic and earnest by hearing of the good work that is being done elsewhere and of the blessing that is coming there.

There is often more new life and inspiration in the columns of "church news" than in the carefully prepared articles or striking editorials. A congregation can often be stirred into a cash consideration of foreign missions more quickly by a symposium of news of the work actually being done than by reading the last chapter of Matthew or the first chapter of Romans. One is goodness that is quiet and lowers its voice. The other is goodness that is making a stir and talking in italics in order to start more goodness going.

We lay stress on the quietness of Jesus' life and work. He put the crowd out when he was about to work a miracle. He told a man not to tell what he had done. He wanted no man to know that he was in a certain place. All that is true. Yet we are specially told of the time when he went into the temple and cried with a loud voice in the midst of the crowd, drawing the eyes of all men to himself and their ears to his message. He told one man to go back and tell all his friends what great things the Lord had done for him. He told his disciples to go everywhere telling about him and his work.

Jesus did not love publicity, but he did not fear it. He would not let them make him a king, but he told Pilate the reason why—he was already a king, did not need human crowning or laurel. He bids us proclaim everywhere his salvation, yet his salvation is simply himself. God has printed his name and his power everywhere. You cannot look at a mountain or a mite without having a chance to see or hear God.

No, public goodness is not forbidden. It is proclaimed as helpful. The thing that is scored and rebuked is goodness that is good only for the sake of publicity. It is righteousness that wants to be looked at before it cares to be right. It is kindness that would be cruel if it were behind the scenes. There is enough of such goodness to explain why we are all shy about praising it when it does become public. But it is not proved that men who are not willing to let God's goodness to them and through them be known are therefore so very humble. They may in fact be thinking of themselves, afraid of what men may say about them, but not thinking enough about what men may be led to say about their Lord.

Has any follower of Christ a right to let men suppose he is selfish and stingy, when actually he is helping broadly and generously, because he keeps his goodness hid? How then are men to know what the grace of God has done in his life? What are men to think of the Master of a man whom they believe to be stingy and mean? Has any pastor a right to slip along through times of great blessing, all of whose glory belongs to Christ, hiding the facts of that blessing, lest men may misunderstand him? Is it not possible that men's ignorance of the work of Christ is a sadder thing than their misunderstanding of a particular servant of His? No man is to let his light shine that men may see him; but every man is to let his light shine that other men may glorify the Father in heaven.

Pivot Point for Temperance at Columbus

Many men of thought and vision are confident that the skies of November 10 to 15, in the latitude and longitude of Columbus, Ohio, will display prophetic omens of the most potential advance yet made toward the settlement of America's liquor problem. Indeed, there are observers not given to reckless anticipations who seriously believe that the date and place aforesaid will mark the beginning of the end for the liquor traffic in the United States.

At the least, there is in view a congress of the foes of the business comprising a far larger number of representative citizens and a far wider range of experience and opinion than have anywhere before been drawn together to consult over this colossal problem. Not only men and women distinguished as specialists in various forms of the temperance crusade, but eminent senators, congressmen, governors, judges and other national and state officials, who from their general public outlook have come to realize the peculiar urgency of this issue, will be seen in the assemblage and heard in the deliberations at Columbus in mid-November.

The week's procedure will be as varied as it will be momentous. There is first to come a double-decennial anniversary of the Anti-Saloon League, commemorating Dr. Howard H. Russell's organization twenty years ago of an agency at first intended only to humble the then unbridled insolence of the saloons in the one state of Ohio. But even about this celebration there will be much less of pride over the league's growth into a mighty national power than there will be of eager and resolute counsel for a vastly more aggressive campaign in the decade next ahead. This phase of the program at Columbus will last from Monday evening to Thursday evening.

Then on Friday, November 14, it will be succeeded by an event even more significant and promising. This is to be nothing less than a comprehensive conference for amity and cooperation among all the numerous American organizations working in favor of a sober nation. In this union convocation no lines of difference are to be drawn to define how one or another may propose to destroy the drink curse. The welcome of any comer depends altogether on his own word that he would destroy it if he could. And if he brings credentials from any church, Sunday school or society which stands for total abstinence, he may vote on the decision how these different opinions and organizations may work together for their common object. Certainly if the hour and day come anywhere in sight of the purposes professed—solidification of all temperance advocates in a simultaneous forward movement for national prohibition—the occasion will be memorable enough to justify any citizen in extraordinary efforts to be present.

The Negro as a Bond for Sectional Unity

Don't say that Christians of the South are prejudiced against the uplift of the negroes—they are not. Did you note how eagerly quick was Dr. Morris, secretary of Southern Presbyterian home missions, to take advantage of The Continent's story about Sam Daly in order to enlist aid that will perpetuate Sam Daly's work? The Continent did not print the story with a view to evoking benevolence; it was to us just another striking tale of the sort we best like to publish—an exhibition of the power of faith and love in humble Christian lives. But whoever else might hear or read the history of Sam Daly as merely a passing instance of life, without being moved to action thereby, a genuine Southern Christian could not; he must be something less than a Southerner and something less than a Christian to listen inactively to the echo of Sam Daly's dying words: "Take good care ob mah little niggahs." There is an accent in such an appeal from the helplessness of a race long dependent to which the best chords of the Southern temperament vibrate, and real religion makes the sentiment vital.

The response in this instance is an earnest of the constantly increasing seriousness with which Southern white Christians in general, and Southern Presbyterians especially, view their duty to the colored people—their responsibility for promoting right life and right living conditions among the negro race. And herein Northern Christians in general, and Northern Presbyterians especially, should strike hands with them. If there were nothing else in which church people North and South ought to be in partnership, they should be partners in serving the welfare of the black man. To say that the negro is the problem of the South alone is as narrow-minded as to deny that the South has sincere and intelligent concern for his well-being. The only right attitude is a broad recognition that the South has an intimacy of understanding, and the North a certain detachment of view, which are both necessary to a just discharge of the white man's obligations to the brother in black.

So far then from timidly avoiding the negro question as a probable danger point for friction between the Presbyterian denominations, sagacity will insist that through this question is the most direct high road to learning to work trustfully together in all other lines of endeavor. It is by the mutual forwarding of such work as John Little, a cultivated white man, is doing at Louisville and Sam Daly, an almost illiterate colored man, has been doing in Alabama, that a fellowship of service can most quickly be established between sectionally sundered churches. And fellowship of service is the only bond which can restore that sundering to unity. So to bless the negro under the conspiring hands of North and South is to win for both North and South a blessing through him.

The Law Against Going to Law

Of findings and opinions developed by Assembly's committee investigating Union Seminary in New York City, it may be assumed that the public will learn nothing whatever until the committee reports to the Assembly of 1914. Discussion of details of the case is therefore scarcely in order meantime. But that perhaps makes it all the more important for the church to clarify its mind on the principles involved while it waits for information as to the facts.

One such principle is very clearly defined in the word of God, and pending the committee's return of its commission, public sentiment ought to be so thoroughly strengthened around that scriptural injunction that no sudden flare of feeling anywhere can possibly loosen the church from the hold of it. This is the injunction that Paul laid on the Corinthian converts not to go to law against other Christians in the courts of the civil power. The passage covering this imperative apostolic rule is to be found in the sixth chapter of I. Corinthians, and as any one who reads it may see, it has no loopholes in it. And one need not add that Paul simply amplifies the teaching of the Master himself in the eighteenth chapter of Matthew —the fifteenth and following verses.

From what it knows of the history of the case The Continent does not imagine that the committee will discover any breach of trust on the part of Union Seminary whereof a court of civil jurisprudence would take account. The break between Assembly and seminary twenty years ago would seem to have been of quite another character. But that is a question not to be prejudged now. The point now to be upheld in the equable Presbyterian mind is that even in case the committee should reveal the most undeniable fraud upon the church, legal measures to recover the church's rights would still remain totally unthinkable in a loyal Christian body, sincerely receiving the Bible as an infallible rule of faith and practice.

Conciliatory negotiations seeking an adjustment of the church's claims; public testimony to wrong done; at length a solemn repudiation of persons responsible for an act of faithlessness—all these are within the church's proper spiritual reach. But to use Paul's own word, it "dare" not go farther. What the church may do to defend the right—not mere rights—when dragged to law, is another matter. But it "dare" not "go to law," unless willing in the face of a jeering world to discredit the meekness of the Master's spirit and the spirit of its Master's words. Rather, to apply Paul again, it must prefer to be defrauded.

—The Federal Council's new evangelistic commission doubtless knows that it is venturing on an enterprise of many risks when it proposes to lay on Dr. Biederwolf, its secretary, the responsibility of distinguishing between worthy and unworthy evangelists. Dr. Biederwolf is certainly as well qualified for the task as any other man who could be chosen, but the task is itself one so essentially difficult as to be almost forbidding. If the committee is content with the negative side of it—that is, with discrediting men whose evangelistic pretensions have been demonstrated insincere by un-Christlike behavior—its activity will undoubtedly be vindicated by its usefulness. But an affirmative attempt to sanction evangelists as effective workers would soon result in intolerable embarrassments. That sanction is something which no human organization has the right to bestow. The only indorsement for an evangelist which means anything actual is the indorsement of the Holy Spirit in giving spiritual results to follow his labors. A man whom the Holy Spirit so honors will not lack calls from the churches; a man who does not enjoy that divine favor cannot be made an acceptable evangelist by any certificate of good opinion from his brethren.

—Bishop Logan H. Roots of Hankow, who represents the American Episcopal Board of Missions in the interior of China, is "persona non grata" to the high church section of his denomination at home. The sin for which the high churchmen have tabooed him is his unblushing habit of attending union missionary conferences in which missionaries of non-Episcopal bodies are recognized as ministers of Christ. But Bishop Roots, who is now at home to attend the General Convention of his church, does not sing small on this fraternal feeling of his when he gets backs into the immediate presence of his critics. Preaching the triennial missionary sermon during General Convention time in New York City, he stoutly declared: "For a long time the missionaries have found that they had to pass denominational barriers to do good. The old jealousies have been rooted out among those who have stood shoulder to shoulder nursing the wounded in battle and feeding the starving." May the good Lord soon bring us past the time when it is possible for any Christian leader to incur unpopularity among church people by the freedom with which he fraternizes with other Christian workers.

—The prince of Monaco, who owns at Monte Carlo, on the Mediterrancan coast, the greatest gambling establishment in the world, told reporters in Chicago that he doesn't believe in gambling; "it brings unhappiness." Such talk from such a man is certainly absurd, but perhaps not as contemptible as it sounds. Doubtless the prince, who is a very modern sort of personage, it seems, has been caught in that great wave of contemporary moral questioning which has made many a rich man wonder whether he is getting his wealth in a way to be proud of. And if the prince has not yet come far enough along in his questioning to quit the practices that he is uneasy over, it must be granted that "he is not by himself in that" either. Let us hope that he will "keep coming" till he does get to the point of chucking all his infamous gambling tables into the sea—the only place where they can be guaranteed not to cause the unhappiness which their princely proprietor now deplores.

—Evangelist Billy Sunday has been called an enormously rigid man, but he can be pliable when there is necessity of it. One of the rules in which hitherto Sunday has been unyielding has been the demand that all the churches in any town he visits must close and stay closed all the while his tabernacle meetings are in progress. He stipulated this at first for Pittsburg, where he is going this winter and where preparations for his coming are in active state already. But Pittsburg is far the biggest town that Sunday ever entered for a campaign, and the local committee put it up to him strongly that methods workable in a smaller place won't work in such a vast and scattered metropolis as Pittsburg is. And Sunday saw the point and let his rule go to smash. The compromise arrangement is that the churches of the city shall be classified into eight groups, and each group will close on one of the eight Sabbaths that the evangelist is to be in town.

—The "alcohol motive" is what Professor Patrick of the University of Iowa in a magazine article tells readers that he is in search of. He means that he wants to know why men drink intoxicating liquor. The professor's inquiry is an agreeable sign of one thing at least—that science today has decided that drinking is not a normal and rational habit for men. It is something for which a reason has to be sought in the unreasonable. But it seems to us that Professor Patrick, after the manner of many scientific men, makes with all his profound air of investigation very much of a mystery out of what an ordinary onlooker would think quite simple. Young men drink because other men do. In the start of it, this is the most imitative of all vices—least promoted by inner impulses. Afterward men drink because alcohol has produced a diseased and unnatural appetite. Isn't that the whole of the "alcohol motive"?

—Ex-Governor Patterson of Tennessee, when in office and since, has been a notorious friend of the liquor interests. He did everything in his power to prevent the passage of Tennesee's liquor-prohibition law, and then after it was passed, everything in his power to keep it from being enforced. But a few months ago he suddenly turned square round, and today he is a strenuous advocate of new measures designed to make prohibition really effective. The change has been almost miraculous. It is not surprising therefore to learn that the cause of the change is miraculous too—Patterson has been converted to religion. At least, he says he has, and the turn-around of the man seems good evidence. The former governor has joined the Presbyterian church in Memphis.

—In 1903 the Universalist denomination in this country included 980 parishes; today it counts but 861. Its ordained ministry has meanwhile dropped in total. The lay membership has not declined in proportion, yet it numbers today only 54,226, where it stood ten years ago at 54,325.

"To Them That Love"

BY H. H. McQUILKIN

"TO THEM THAT LOVE GOD, all things work together for good, even to them that are called according to his purpose" (Romans 8:28). "To them that love . . . all things work." It is the mechanics of the spiritual life. Laws, forces, reactions, resultants crowd the context to bursting. Midway stands this tabulation of the ultimate conclusion, "To them that love God, all things work together for good." The location is significant. On one side is an intercession; on the other a conformation. "The Spirit itself maketh intercession for us" . . . "foreordained to be conformed to the image of his Son." The "infirmity" of verse 26 gives place to the "glorified" of verse 30. The process of intercession issues in the product, a Christ-conformed character. It is a blessed nexus.

Come back to the tabulation. It sounds strange in the ears of the careless multitude. It is for advanced students in the school of experience. It forms part of an elective course leading to the master's degree—"more than conquerors." Notice the range of the experimentation—"All things." This is to be literally construed. Gather up every minutest circumstance and every experience—the physical and the spiritual; the joys and the sorrows; the victories and the defeats; the temptations and the falls—"gather up the fragments." What a comfort to know that there is no waste in the economy of Christian experience! Every fact has a function. There are no driftwood circumstances. The varied experiences of life are like the machinist's kit of tools. Each is different from the rest, yet each has its peculiar purpose in the hand of the workman and the tools must be varied as the parts of the machine. The complexity and variety inhere in the character of man and demand the complexity and variety in the experiences and environment.

Propelling Force of a Life-Attitude

Down under all the working there lies the silent, determining law. It is a law of propulsion. A life-attitude has propelling force. The affection becomes an alchemy; the tie tugs; the love is found to be a loadstone. "To them that love . . . all things work." Tools plus the workman make the completion of the task. The same tools that build up tear down. The same set of circumstances enrich or impoverish according to the workman in charge. Get right with God, then let life do its work. We need not fret about his choice of tools. He knows which ones he needs for the perfecting of our character.

The propulsive character of attitude depends on several things. First, it is generated by the consequent interpretation of the circumstances and experiences of our lives. The attitude of love enables us to discover the purpose of love that runs through them all. Only love can discern love. My love for him opens my eyes to behold his love choosing for me my path and directing my feet into it. "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for thou art with me." The fellowship illumines the way. Love dispels the gloom and turns even the valley into a fruitful garden.

Paul, too, had entered into intimate appreciation of love's leverage. "We rejoice in our tribulations." And then follows the revealing assurance, "knowing that tribulation worketh." Upward he traces the constructive process through patience to probation and through probation to hope and then he rests the whole process down on the deathless love of God. Then in another letter he says, "Our light affliction . . worketh." Adversity working in the atmosphere of a mutual love becomes the minister of a "far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." It is our privilege and bounden duty to share with Paul in this transforming attitude of love, which sees love, the love of God, directing, controlling, participating in all the discipline through which he seeks to make us perfect. "In all their affliction he was afflicted."

Burning Out the Deposit of Worldliness

I saw a copper tube that had become so filled with a certain deposit that it had become useless. The mechanician took it and held it in the fierce flame of a blow-torch until the deposit was melted out. It was a desperate discipline, but it brought the tube back again into usefulness. It was a kindness to the tube. It fitly represents our Father's way with his own when the deposit of worldliness or what not needs to be put out of our lives. Love will understand this and turn repining into rejoicing.

And then straightway the interpretation becomes a point of application for our life experiences. Given the proper direction, all movement is progress. Face toward God and every step is heavenward. There is something stimulating in Paul's muscular word where he analyzes the outcome of "tribulation" and "the light affliction" in his own soul. It is the word "worketh." It is his attitude of loving confidence in God that energizes or, rather, that determines the application of the energy on his life. "To them that love . . . all things work." Any other attitude would have changed the whole result. So we may harness every factor in our environment and press it into service as a minister of enrichment.

"E'en though it be a cross that raiseth me."

Back of All, God's Irresistible Purpose

But the ultimate secret of the propulsive power of a life-attitude lies in the calm, unremitting, irresistible purpose of the eternal God. Hear Paul's formulation of this purpose or law. "Foreknew . . . foreordained . . .called . . . justified . . . glorified." Milestones on the pathway to the celestial city! Blessed is he whose feet walk in it! But the Way is also the Life. Energy emerges from the heavenly catena of divine ministries and lifts the soul up into the conqueror's seat.

But the formulation is followed by the demonstration of the law. "He that spared not his own Son, how shall he not also with him freely give us all things?" Calvary is the final and all-convincing proof of the Father's love for a lost world. Every perplexity of the baffled heart is put at rest there. Philosophy is hushed into silence and interrogations resolve themselves under the uplifted cross of the Son of God.

Finally there is the estimation of the law of divine love. Formulation; demonstration; estimation. Two loves are found interlaced in these last verses of the eighth of Romans, mine and His. Verse 28 contains them both, the first explicitly, the second implicitly. But mine is soon swallowed up in His. And Paul swings on with giant tread into the final estimation of His eternal love. "I am persuaded." It is the word of the calculator. The evidence is all in, every side has been considered; then the power of God's love in Christ Jesus is declared.

Stronger than death, stronger than life, stronger than angels, stronger than principalities, stronger than powers, stronger than things present, stronger than things to come, stronger than height, stronger than depth, stronger than any other creature. That is the deliberate estimate of the power of God's love for his believing children. It is a sublime reckoning. And it may be yours and mine—literally. At Calvary let us find the entering place into this upward-moving purpose of love and keep our lives right in the very center of it every moment henceforward. "Keep yourselves in the love of God."

With this attitude maintained by us, all things will "work together for good" for us. And we will no more grumble at his choice of tools for the perfecting of us into the image of his Son.

"A Little While"

"A little while and ye shall not see me, and again a little while and ye shall see me."—John 16:16.

"A little while"—yet it seems so long!
I walk in the dark and hear no song;
The one that I loved is gone from me now,
I try to be brave yet know not how.

"A little while!" Did my Master know
I would weary thus and miss him so?
How long is a little while to him!
How far must I walk in the darkness dim?

I want to see him! It seems so long
Since I heard his voice! Don't say it's wrong
To mourn for him thus and count the days
Till yonder we meet where morning stays!

"A little while"—it will soon be o'er!
My friend is not dead, just gone before;
I'll bear the dark till we meet again,
And sunshine follows after the rain!

Palms on Site of Memphis and Statue of Rameses II.

A Few of the Grand Old Cedars of Lebanon Mountains

A PANORAMA OF FAMOUS TREES

BY MASON P. YOUNG

MAN HAS always loved trees and they have always been closely associated with him in literature and in history. They were with our first parents in the garden of Eden, and our heavenly home is described as having "a tree of life" by the side of a river of water. We have no richer heritage today than the old trees that have stood the storms and tempests of the ages and still stand, solemn reminders of bygone days. While in all cases these trees are not the exact ones that legend would have them be, they are in every case, if not originals, probably offsprings of parent trunks which have persisted.

The Sycamore Tree (Moslem Grave in Foreground)

Palms on the Site of Ancient Memphis—These palms stand over the ancient city of Memphis, the once fair city of the world. Today it is deeply buried by a thick deposit of Nile mud and over it the peasant Egyptians carry on their agricultural pursuits. Here are found many monuments of ancient royalty, notably a statue of Rameses II. The stately palms yield a luscious fruit. This makes up the entire food of the peasants during a large part of the year.

Cedars of Lebanon—Never did the strength and beauty of a tree appeal to a people more strongly than did the cedars of Lebanon to the children of Israel. In the building of their temple it was chosen as one of the materials worthy to adorn the house of God. The picture shows two ancient patriarchs that are hundreds of years old. Each measures about fifty feet in circumference. Of the large forests that once clothed the Lebanons only about 400 of the famous trees now survive.

The Sycamore Tree—The sycamore is mentioned in both the Old and New Testaments. It yields an insipid, figlike fruit which is used as food by the poorest and most despised class. From such a humble stratum Amos was called to be a prophet of God. "I was no prophet, neither was I a prophet's son, but I was an herdsman and a gatherer of sycamore fruit." It is a low spreading tree and can be easily climbed, as told in the incident of Zacchæus mentioned in the New Testament.

Isaiah's Tree—In the lower part of the Kedron valley stands an old mulberry tree that is the object of tender care. Under this tree Isaiah is said to have been sawn asunder in the presence of King Manasseh. It is called by all "Isaiah's tree."

Abraham's Oak—We find this old patriarch near the little village of Hebron on the Plains of Mamre. Under this tree the friend of God entertained his three angelic visitors and in its shade was given the assurance of the fulfillment of God's early promise. It is about thirty-two feet in circumference and presents marks of extreme old age. In spite of utmost care on the part of the Turkish government it is slowly dying.

Judas's Tree—This tree stands near the potter's field on the outskirts of Jerusalem and is looked upon with superstition. It is believed to be the tree under which Judas hanged himself.

"Let's Talk About Our Work"

Democracy in the Missionary Society

BY
MONTGOMERY

Can the active propaganda which characterizes the equal suffrage movement be applied to a stimulation of missionary interest in the missionary societies of the local churches? Yes, says Mrs. Montgomery, who is an enthusiastic and experienced champion of missions. Previous articles by her appeared in February and April

A MISSIONARY SOCIETY ought to be the most democratic organization in the world, for it is a militant expression of belief in the source of all democracy, the gospel of Jesus Christ. But it is only slowly and by degrees that the irresistible conclusion to Christ's teachings and practice is translated into life. We have reached a point where for the most part we yield a theoretical assent to the great democratic fundamentals of the gospel—the fatherhood of God, the brotherhood of man, the dignity of service, the organic unity and mutual dependence of mankind. We cheer democracy in the abstract, admit most of its premises, and deny many of its conclusions. Yet only so far as Christ's followers catch the spirit of the divine Comrade can his kingdom prosper; only so far as we translate his teachings into action can his triumph be hastened.

Society's Membership Should Be All-Inclusive

What are some of the implications of democracy in the missionary society? One of the biggest is in our very conception of the makeup of our membership. A truly democratic conception of the woman's missionary society will see that it should include nothing less than all the women who are members of the church; this not as a languid theory, but as a working program of intense and sustained propaganda. Have not we taken it too much for granted that the missionary society should be composed of a small and select group of the most spiritual among the church members? Have we realized that Jesus makes but one call, and that missionary; recognizes but one type of follower, one sent even as he was sent? Have we passionately believed that it was the business of the whole church to give the whole gospel to the whole world?

For fifty years now the women's missionary societies of the Protestant churches of the United States have been carrying on a beneficent and far reaching work for the women and children of non-Christian lands. They have built schools, hospitals, colleges, have collected millions of dollars; have won great trophies for Christ in many lands; but at the end of fifty years they have succeeded in securing the cooperation of only one-sixth of the women of the churches. To be sure, some denominations have a better proportion, but many have a worse, and on the whole it is safe to estimate 16 per cent as the average number enlisted. The Episcopal Church was the first, apparently, to recognize in theory that every woman by virtue of her baptismal vows was a member of the missionary society; but this recognition has not been operative to secure a larger porportion in actual contribution and cooperation than are found in other communions.

Is not the trouble one of viewpoint, of conviction? We have been too content to rest down on a "large auxiliary," a "flourishing branch," with no urgency for the nine-tenths, the three-fifths or the one-third yet unreached. Just supposing for a moment that the 2,000,000 women in Canada and the United States already enlisted in the campaign were thoroughly convinced that their task was the common task of all Christian women, how long would it take to double the whole number! There is many a woman grieving because she cannot give more for the Christianizing of women and children in heathen lands who would add immensely to her effectiveness if she could see that her part of the task was to recruit on the home field, with all the persistence, prayer, ingenuity and devotion with which the missionary seeks to plant the empire of Jesus Christ in the foreign field.

How One Girl Led 300 Into Service

A heartening instance lately came to light of the work of one girl in a single church. When she began there were about fifty women in the missionary society and 350 in the church. After a year of calling, prayer, explanation and invitation, during which she made over a thousand calls, the proportions were reversed. All but fifty of these women were enrolled in the society as contributing members and the contributions had increased from $200 to $1,200.

When asked the secret of her amazing achievement she said, "I prayed that God would give me tact to say the right word; I studied that I might know the facts; I distributed literature; I did not scold. I always spoke of the love of Jesus."

One of the pressing needs of the hour is that thousands of women shall be inspired by like convictions of the reasonableness, the righteousness and the practicability of enlisting all the women of the church in the Christian woman's noblest work. There are churches, many in the aggregate though small in proportion to the whole number, in which this great democratic ideal—every church member enrolled in the society—is already realized. What has been done in one church is not impossible in any other. Here is the opportunity by personal calls, by annual every-member canvass, by intercessory prayer, by dissemination of literature, by lovingkindness and unfailing, cheerful persistence in well doing to increase membership and offerings with surprising rapidity.

The second implication of democracy is in our fellowship. No society that allows the caste of wealth or social position or culture to dominate can be warmly missionary. All unconsciously many a missionary circle has become little not only in numbers but in spirit. The newcomer feels like an outsider; the best places on programs and official lists seem to belong by right to a certain inner group. The meetings are always held at a time and place which suits the convenience of this group but is prohibitive to the attendance of other groups. The program is always such as ministers to the tastes of this group, though it may be Greek to others. Half-sadly, half-resentfully the woman who has gone once or twice to meetings where she was plainly a spectator and not a participator has said: "They don't want me, they don't need me; they don't consider me, but only my contribution. I cannot help and I cannot share; I guess I'll drop out." We all like to be in things, not at things. We all love a sisterhood, a sharing, a cooperating. The missionary society can be all three. Where it is no one can stop its growth.

"Taxation Without Representation" Not Liked

There is need for democracy, too, in the gathering of missionary funds. Taxation without representation is only less odious in religion than in politics. Apportionments, imposed wholly from above and without, never win that loyalty and sense of responsibility that accompany burdens freely assumed. The Methodist women, who give nearly a million dollars each year to foreign missions (and almost as much to home missions), have emphasized this principle. Each branch solemnly pledges what it will assume and then voluntarily sets a higher sum as its "aim" in addition to the amount pledged. In the Presbytery of Colorado the two directors for home and foreign missions, Mrs. Silverthorn and Mrs. Raymond, devised a form of blank which was sent to each auxiliary. In this were tabulated the offerings for the past year, the needs of the present, the sum which it was hoped might be reached. The auxiliary was then asked to vote definitely on just what it was willing to assume as its share in the different enterprises for the ensuing year. This policy worked an immediate and permanent increase in gifts and interest.

To replace annual dues by free will offerings, as God has preferred, has proved a boon in many societies. "We seek not yours but you," may well be a motto in securing support for missionary enterprises. The big cause appeals to some gifted with imagination, the concrete work to others more practical. The great systems of education win the support of one class; the tender ministry of the nurse and physician interests others. Some will give for Bible women and others for orphans. The compassionate care of the lepers awakes the sympathy of some, while others are stirred by the industrial mission that seeks to lift a whole people into economic independence and decency. Many are enlisted by a story, a few rare spirits by the presentation of statistics. Then, why in the name of efficiency should we reduce all to one common denominator of a budget and the curt announcement "Our apportionment is $175"?

Our work is democratic, varied, personal, terribly concrete, many-sided, with appeal in it for every type of mind and heart. Why not make the appeal for money equally democratic, vital and homely? A concrete budget, explained, illustrated, talked over, prayed over, with emphasis on the work and not on the machinery, the product and not the process, will transform any society. The "budget" is good, system is necessary, apportionments doubtless beneficial, but why thrust them forward continually? We clothe our bony framework with flesh and cover it with clothes. We do not urge proteids and carbohydrates, but meat and vegetables upon our family. A devitalized, dehumanized, monetary demand imposed from above is not the way to popularize missions.

Appealing Only to the Cultured Minority

Again there is room for more democracy in the nature of our presentation of missions. The appeal in the past has been too largely directed to the staid, well-educated, mature Christian who dotes on lectures, enjoys reading biography, is familiar with jaw-breaking geographical terms, knows how to use a library, writes papers, belongs to clubs, reads Browning, has an appetite for study. No doubt this woman is to be found in most churches, but she is not in the majority. A propaganda adapted to the needs of a cultured minority will never bring in the whole constituency. In our churches are women with brains too rusty to crave hard study; women whom neither lectures nor clubs nor study classes attract, simple women engaged in a hard, hand-to-hand contact with the primitive realities of life.

How do other causes attract and hold this biggest and potentially most valuable constituency of all? When the people will not read legislative reports on child labor, a child welfare exhibit, thrillingly, compellingly concrete, is brought to them. When they cannot be affected by scientific exposition in regard to the prevention of typhoid fever clever cartoons are drawn, the slogan "swat the fly" is evolved, rhymes are made to be sung by school children and a big popular crusade is launched.

Why, oh, why, are we missionary women afraid of the dramatic, the spectacular, the melodramatic, the primitive in our presentation of missions? Why are we so correct, so academic, so tepid, when we have a cause with color, tragedy, heroism, daring, heart-interest, and romance to make it above all others a people's cause, a crusade?

We may tear a leaf from the experience of the political equality clubs. For years they pursued a career of uninterrupted peacefulness and innocuous activity. They held meetings (sparsely attended) collected annual dues, had occasional pink teas, converted few, offended fewer. No one took them seriously; they were seldom the topic of conversation at dinner tables. People regarded them much as they do foreign missionary women today, as mild but harmless enthusiasts in a good but impracticable cause.

But today the suffrage movement is in process of getting itself democratized. Its leaders have awakened to the realization that they must convert not only students but teamsters; not only the colleges but the crowds; and furthermore that the conversion of the man in the street is quite as necessary to their success as that of the professor—for one reason, because there are more of him! So we have the old academic discussion supplanted by talks in factories and on street corners, by automobile pilgrimages, processions, pictures, food sales, pageants and booths at fairs. They are all things to all men if by any means they may win some.

Room for Moving Pictures, Plays, Pageants, Publicity

Self-consciousness, timidity, shrinking self-indulgence in the lives of these suffrage workers are burned up in the fires of consecration to a cause that demands of them their utmost of time and strength in a big democratic appeal to the people—wise and ignorant, progressive, reactionary, thoughtful and careless, subtle and primitive —the people, all the people, all the time. Five years of this sort of devotion has taken the woman's suffrage cause out of the realms of academic interest into that of practical politics, where it must be reckoned with.

When we are willing to become fools for the sake of Christ, to bear reproach and ridicule because we are dead in earnest on this missionary matter, something will happen. Why should not the missionary propaganda join to itself every normal human interest and appeal to every wholesome instinct? There is room for missionary story telling and missionary moving pictures, for missionary plays and pageants, songs and poems, for cartoons and advertising and publicity, for meetings with a tang of originality to them that makes them the talk of every dinner party. There is need for a social fellowship so precious and comradeship in work so rewarding that it makes up to women for cards and teas and association on the purely social basis and leaves them wondering how the other ever satisfied.

Missions, like art and music and literature, must have a broad democratic basis in life or become increasingly formal, sterile and lifeless. The women who think must be reenforced by the women who feel, the women with money by those whose only gift is a passion of prayer and good will, the leaders by the loyalty of the obscure multitude bound to them in the glory of a common vision.

To democratize missions among the women and children of the nation is to impart a fresh vitality to the impress of Christianity, a new vigor to Christian experience, a deeper note to individual consecration. It is the task committed to the women of the present organized missionary societies. It is worthy of all their power. . It is of equal dignity and urgency with the work of the missionaries on the field. It can never be accomplished by women who are satisfied to be the exponents of a cult, however precious, but only by those who are convinced of the imperative of Christ resting upon his whole church.

Japanese View of Japanese in California

BY K. MIYAZAKI

Mr. Miyazaki, who is pastor of the Japanese Presbyterian church in San Francisco, believes that his race has a twofold mission in Western America—material and spiritual

WHEN THE SECRETARY OF STATE, Mr. Bryan, was in Sacramento last April, a committee from the farming districts of Yolo and San Joaquin counties stated that the men who could bend the knees or perform "squat" labor to do the necessary work in the asparagus, strawberry, sugar beet and other vast fields of agricultural industry were greatly needed. I wonder where you can find laborers who will do the work demanded if the Japanese be excluded? Japanese laborers, it seems to me, have been preparing California to meet her necessity. Japanese have come to this country not only for their living, but to improve the agricultural condition of America. In any town and country where they have settled it is clearly seen that this is true. Here is one mission of the Japanese. They are to cultivate farms, enrich the country and also help to solve the problems of the day.

The mission of the Japanese on the Pacific coast, however, must not be on the material side alone, but on the spiritual side also. The Japanese in America are the interpreters of and for our two nations. They should interpret the American spirit and religion to the Japanese in the Orient, and the spirit and civilization of Japan to the Occident. By doing this our two great nations will understand each other better, and the traditional friendship will be perfectly cemented.

Interpretation, however, is a very hard task. It somewhat resembles the work of Jesus Christ, who came to this world to interpret the will of God, our heavenly Father. He was born in the flesh, spoke the language which the people understood and lived among us. Yet he was misunderstood and finally crucified by the representatives of the people.

Nineteen hundred years have gone since he came, but there are still more than half of the whole population of the world who understand neither Christ the Son nor God the Father. This is the saddest and largest misunderstanding that ever happened in this world. So the most fundamental enterprise may be the undertaking governed by the principle of Christ the mediator. Therefore the Japanese as interpreters should interpret the national spirit of either country from a Christian point of view and not an antialien movement from the agitators' point of view. At present the public opinion of Japan in regard to the action taken by the last legislature of California is not for war but for peace. The people are often stirred by agitators, but they know that now is a critical time in which to overcome by their patience.

Robert C. Ogden's "Stepping Stones"

The late Robert C. Ogden, the well known New York and Philadelphia business man and Presbyterian layman, had the ability to express himself in forceful, epigrammatic language. Since his recent death attention has been called to a series of maxims entitled "Stepping Stones," which were practically the rules of his life. They are as follows:

Keep faith in humanity.

A man becomes what he most desires to be.

Do not mistake a prejudice for a principle.

Keep your intellectual and spiritual life bright.

Be energetic, wide awake, pushing, but be patient.

The world wants men who are well equipped and worthy.

False witness may be given by a gesture or a grimace.

Honor womanhood if you would keep faith in humanity.

What a marvel of a business man's guide is the book of Proverbs!

The longer you live, if you live right, the less you will think of yourself.

Be true. Stand up and believe in yourself, then other people will believe in you.

A vigorous, healthy man has really only one right in the world, only one thing to demand, and that is a chance to work.

In every life comes some crisis when conscious integrity gives a power and heroic strength that can come from no other source.

The charity that we are bidden to display is broad as God's sunshine, but his laws are fine as a razor's edge, and quite as keen.

Seek high friendship, and when good fortune brings you into acquaintance with men and women who are above you in true station in life, wisely make the most of your opportunity.

The true man will always look at his business through his character, not his character through his business. In short, the true man, the truest in the highest and best sense, must be a Christian and must pattern his life accordingly, even though the world may call him fanciful, romantic and queer.

THE WAYFARER

TO RIDE IN THE surf-boats of Hawaii is thrilling. To adventure one's feet upon the edge of an active volcano is a great experience. To look upon the heavenly heights of the glistening Himalayas is a transporting delight. To ride alone over the mysterious desert is to win a peculiar pleasure. But to fight a good fight with a warrior fish, and to win the victory in the end, is a keener joy than any of these other experiences. The Wayfarer claims to follow, afar off, in apostolic succession to Peter, whose "I go a-fishing" was a deal wiser than many other words he said.

"I Go
A-Fishing"
—Peter

* * * * *

Fishing means water, and water usually means beauty. There are two lakes up on Cape Cod known to the Wayfarer which to his spirit are the portals to peace. The larger is but three miles long by a mile wide, and the smaller is only as long as its big neighbor is wide. A little river, flowing between flourishing cranberry bogs, unites them. Along its bottom the long grasses wave gracefully, like pennants of pleasure as if they were exhilarated by the swift flow of the stream. Save for a few pools in which the big pickerel and bass lurk the bottom is visible for the full half mile of the little river's length, and it is a rare picture of grace and beauty and motion. Out of their element these grasses and mosses and other water growth would seem but a pulpy, slimy mass, as uninteresting as people transported from their natural environment. Here, however, they are a picture to delight an artist's soul. The darting pickerel, like swift-shot arrows, the sluggish turtle and the ubiquitous frog with his panicky plunge into the water, give the needed touch of animal life to the scene. Often, amid harried days, that little river flows like a stream of refreshing through the Wayfarer's tired spirit.

* * * * *

"Fishing parties" are not misrepresented by the cartoonists. Men may go carousing in crowds; the real fisherman has but one or two companions. The friend who has none of the magpie's gifts is the only one to choose for a fishing trip; a sign of discipleship is silence. The communion that lies too deep for words is practiced on the banks of the water or in the fishing boat. Fishing is for men who think more than they talk. Even the small boys must learn the art of quietness when they go fishing with father; and what other form of outing brings parent and children closer together than those quiet, confidential times in pursuit of the wary fish?

Professional guides and hired assistants may have their place in the pleasure of fishing; but lucky is the fisherman whose own sons are big enough to share in rowing the boat and preparing the tackle and in gathering the harvest of the deep. The youngsters feel never so grown up as then. They accept as serious the statement that at least they can "earn their keep." The pride with which they master the art of rowing, and acquire the poise and skill which even the most elementary fishing imparts, is wholesome, man-making sport.

Of the fish themselves the fisherman scarcely dares to speak to a skeptical world. On the day now in mind a sufficient store of the gamy and succulent perch had been easily garnered. Pickerel, and, perchance, bass, were the next objective. Now, Mr. Pickerel, who is a doughty and well-armed warrior, is a great glutton, of cosmopolitan appetite, and as likely to grab a strip of bacon as a spinning, feathered spoon or a barbed minnow. There is no accounting for tastes on the part of fish. So the Wayfarer was making trial of a ridiculous German bait, a green and gold wooden bobbin with red revolving blades. One Junior Wayfarer was at the oars and another trolled, ready to handle the landing net.

* * * * *

A strike! The new pole of split bamboo, the family pride, bent as no archer's bow ever was drawn. Fifty feet behind the boat the water broke into spray, and three feet into the air leaped, tail to head, not a lithesome pickerel, but a great bass, seeming in the distance like the father of all bass, and twin brother of the one lost weeks before by the breaking of the tackle at the end of a fight. (That was the day that editor chap who was along fell sprawling into the lake; which gave the Wayfarer less concern by far than the loss of the great fish. For an editor is only a man when he gets away from his office, but a big bass is a prize.) It was this previous tragedy which had justified the expense of new tackle throughout. Now the test had come. Would pole and line and leaders and hooks all prove true? If there should develop a fault in that German bait in this crisis, the Wayfarer would join the British army straightway in hope of a march upon Berlin!

Softly now; row steady, Buster; and you, Teddy, look that your landing net is clear; we are in for a fight. See how he leaps again! There he runs; give him his head a bit. Coming in; welcome, old master warrior! You have an engagement over at the other side of the lake, have you? Well, we'll change your mind before you get there. Wow! What a pull! But we're reeling him in. You're homeward bound, old fellow. Now to the bottom he goes; see that he does not tangle the line amid the weeds. See; he thinks wisdom is at the bottom of a well! No; here he comes up again. "Going up!" Ah, thank you, beautiful balloonist! Nearer, steadily nearer we're getting him. Look at that bamboo! The real line of beauty, if the artist only knew it, is the curve of a fine fishing rod when a worthy foe is fighting. Now, overboard with the landing net; we may get him upon this next circle. See him swim! Now mind your eye! Get the net well under him. A-a-h! There you are! Isn't he a beauty! And hooked fairly in the mouth. Out with the scales; three pounds and a half! He fought like forty. Who envies President Wilson or King George his job, or Carnegie or Rockefeller his money? Neither wealth nor power can buy a thrill such as this. Here's indeed "one crowned hour of glorious life," Mr. Browning.

There are passive pleasures in fishing, also. Floating on the water as the shadows gather—out upon the housekeeper who invented early supper when the fishing is good. Even the boys yield to the spell of the empurpled hills and the glow of eventide. There are some beauties of nature that may not be seen from the seats of an automobile. Sunset on the water is one of these. Only from out in the middle of his favorite lake has the Wayfarer seen these unspeakable glories of dying day. Local atmospheric conditions, authorities say, may entirely alter the appearance of a sunset within a radius of a mile. While the fisherman is sitting quietly in a boat, or rowing softly at trolling speed, the wonder of nature is wrought. The shadows along the western shore deepen. Like a dying man whose feelings are mellowed as he sees the world retreating, the sun abates the fierceness and glare of its direct rays. The clouds take on the glory of the gates beyond. All around the horizon the outline of the forest-clad hills is softened. The coves of the lake become shadowy mysteries. The wind has died down, that all nature may behold in stillness the miracle of the passing of day. A distant owl proclaims that he has awakened to sentinel duty. In the bushes there is a twittering of birds as they snuggle down to sleep, while overhead a swift flying hawk hastens homeward. On every side the fish are leaping and splashing as they rise to their evening repast. There are no other boats on the lake; practical folk have departed for the scheduled evening meals. The lake at sunset is a sanctuary of peace.

* * * * *

Can it be that somewhere, beyond that soft and purple rim, lies the world of care and hurry and distraction? Ah, men, weary and worrying, turn your backs upon it all, and for a day come fishing, that you may return in new victoriousness with the smoke and dust of the city cleansed from your eyes, and with a new clearness of spiritual vision.

THE WAYFARER.

Winning Happiness Through Work

BY CORA S. DAY

I HAD JUST commenced to wash the breakfast dishes one morning when a friend dropped in to see me, and she came out into the kitchen so that our chat might not interrupt my work. She had lately returned from a visit with relatives.

"I never was more miserable in my life than I've been the whole week past at Cousin Catherine's," she declared as she sat down.

She was such a bright-eyed, rosy-cheeked, cheery little woman that misery and she seemed strange companions.

"Oh, yes, she treated me just lovely," she went on, in response to my incredulous exclamation. "It wasn't that. But I'm used to being busy, unless I'm downright sick abed. And there at Catherine's I wasn't allowed to raise my hand to do a single thing. Catherine and the girls flew around and did things up mornings, and if I peeped about helping it was, 'Indeed, you're not going to do anything! The idea of working when you're visiting! You just sit still and have a good rest.' Rest! And there my fingers were fairly itching for the broom and the dust cloth. Here," she cried, jumping up, "give me that tea towel and let me help and be happy while we visit," and she set to work beamingly.

How true it is that, save where there's actual overwork, the busiest people are the happiest. While they're keeping mind and hand working in skillful cooperation they have no time or thought for misery—that sort of misery that springs not from actual ill or trouble but from lack of occupation and from vagrant thoughts. This doesn't mean that rest and relaxation are not good and needful in their proper places; but we really are entitled to them only after periods of happy, useful employment. Then we can lay aside the burden with the pleasant consciousness that good work well done has earned us our rest.

If, as Tom Masson says, "happiness is the feeling that we experience when we are too busy to be miserable," then it behooves us all to busy ourselves in some good, useful way, and earn our share of the happiness that God would have us all possess. My friend of the dish towel and duster had solved in her own way the problem of happiness, and a good way it was, too.

Verses Old and New

MY PRAYER

To grow a little wiser day by day,
To school my mind and body to obey,
To keep my inner life both clean and strong,
To free my life from guile, my hand from wrong,
To shut the door on hate and scorn and pride;
To open then to love the windows wide.
To meet with cheerful heart what comes to me,
To turn life's discords into harmony,
To share some weary worker's heavy load,
To point some straying comrade to the road,
To know that what I have is not my own,
To feel that I am never quite alone.
This would I pray from day to day,
For then I know my life will flow
In peace until it be God's will I go.

A Case of Misguided Fancy

THE STORY in the Home Council Sept. 18 of the little girl who could not tell the truth presented a not unusual case. If her home life is such as to encourage truthful speaking, it must be that her imagination has been allowed to run riot until her own mind fails to distinguish between fact and fancy.

I know of a child who seemingly could not speak the truth. She would tell the most grotesque tales of what she had seen on her way to and from school; lions and great snakes, beautiful children in marvelous attire, or wonderful characters of some sort, and fairy stories of the neighbors' doings. Punishment and entreaty were of no avail.

A wise teacher, however, to whom she was sent diagnosed the trouble as the wrong use of the imagination. When she came to her with such tales she would gravely take her on her lap and say, "Now, tell me, Stella, is this really true or are you telling me just a make-believe fairy story?" At first the idea startled the child and confused her somewhat, but after patient, tactful questioning she saw the point and began to enjoy making the distinction herself when telling anything. The result was a truthful, well-ordered little mind.

As the little girl of the Home Council is older it may require more patient and careful explanations and even some disappointing experiences, as illustrations of what unguided fancy may lead to. If her vagrant imagination is frankly recognized, however, she will see the folly and inconvenience of using it too frequently in everyday life. JANET DONJEAN.

Lightning Robbed of Terrors

A great many people actually believe that lightning can be blown into a house with a strong draught and so always close windows and doors during a thunderstorm. Donald Cameron Shafer denies this possibility in an article in Country Life in America. With the terrific speed of lightning—186,000 miles a second—there is no danger, he says, of its being blown aside from its course, only that the wind might, and probably does, change the direction of the air currents, but not to such a degree as greatly to affect the direction of the discharge and carry it into a building.

There is absolutely no record where a discharge of lightning from the sky struck the side of the house and came into an open window or an open door. Houses are struck, but they are always struck on the roof first, and nearly always on the very highest point of the roof at that, unless the current leaps off a telephone or electric light wire. This is because with the enormous voltage or pressure of lightning, dry wood is almost as good a conductor as copper wire is to a weaker current, and lightning, traveling always in the easiest paths, quickly leaves the air, which is a nonconductor, to run down the wooden timbers of a building.

The College Course and Home-Making

A COLLEGE education as an aid to a woman's preparation for the business of life Laura Clarke Rockford discusses in an article in The American Journal of Sociology—"A Woman's Handicap in Efficiency." Her conclusion after the experience of being for four years a student in a coeducational college, and becoming later a wife and mother, is that in general our colleges for women have not yet successfully planned their courses in preparation for the real business of home-making and of raising men and women to be sound physically, mentally and morally. A day of the average homemaker in the middle walks of life calls, she declares, for a wit and wisdom and efficiency on her part which can be developed not by domestic science studies alone, nor by cultural studies alone, but by a suitable combination of them all.

To be sure, her college training brought her some help in her homemaking profession. It brought her, she says, "an appreciation of literature and history, some ability to sift out the kernel of a subject, some discrimination in recognizing a character for what it is worth, and some social instincts." But she feels now, after several years' experience, that her real need was, first, to cultivate an attitude of mind to make her conscious that "no work is drudgery which leads to a worthy end, except that we make ourselves think that it is drudgery." Next, to increase her efficiency. "I must be cook and nurse and business manager in the home," she says. "In addition I must give all I could to the outside world in the way of sympathetic cooperation. I must learn to do well all I could with the least possible expenditure of energy. A course in my senior year by some practical as well as theoretical person on the application of college studies and science to home life would have saved much friction and many mistakes.

"I had had," she goes on, "no careful training in chemistry and physics, bacteriology and physiology as applied to disinfection and disease, sanitary construction, disposal of waste, etc. To be sure, these principles were taught somewhere in our university, but nowhere were they correlated to make a course adapted to girls who were to have in charge the physical, moral and mental welfare of the race.

> "We have our standards and ideals, not by which we live, but by which we judge one another."

"When in the early days of my married life I spoiled an expensive aluminum roasting pan by trying to clean it with lye I wished for some scientific information of more practical bearing than the knowledge of the circulation of an earthworm. I felt the same need when little John was brought in senseless from a fall from the barn. Some way nothing from Homer or Virgil seemed quite suitable in the extremity. Again and again in treating the cuts of childhood and adult life I have wished for an intelligent course in emergency nursing.

"I have felt in diverse difficulties the need of more of a study of science with special application to homemaking. For example, one morning when the cream in the neighborhood turned ropy, the neighbors came running to me because they thought that I, being a college girl, ought to be able to explain the difficulty and tell them if the milk would injure their children. I was obliged to own to myself in confusion that the ability to quote Dante freely had in no way fortified me for such predicaments of practical life.

"The need seems clear," the author concludes, "and the path of remedy plain. The difficulty for the next few years will be to find teachers of college and university grade with high ideals and broad culture, with wide training and successful experience in home life, who because of these qualifications are thus capable of removing from woman this handicap in her efficiency."

Most Small Boys Can Qualify

The teacher in a country school always tried to make the lessons as interesting as possible, says Lippincott's.

"Now, children," she said, "let us see what you remember about the animal kingdom and the domestic animals that belong to it. You have named all the domestic animals but one. Who can tell what that one is?"

There was no reply.

"What!" exclaimed the teacher. "Does no one know? It has bristly hair, likes the dirt, and is fond of getting into the mud."

A small boy at the end of the class raised a timid hand.

"Well, Allan," said teacher.

"Please, ma'am," said the little boy reflectively, "it's me."

YOUNG AMERICA

Some Guests of the Bat Hotel

BY FRANCES MARGARET FOX

IT SEEMS almost too good to be true, but one of the two men who wrote the book called "American Animals" says that little brown bats wash their faces, like cats. He ought to know because he has watched them do it.

This man seems to have kept a sort of hotel for bats. That is, he kept the blinds belonging to one of the windows in his home closed most of the time to attract bats. Then he experimented with his guests. He took their pictures and otherwise amused himself for our benefit, when the bats had expected a good, quiet sleep. Doubtless they had paid for it, too, by eating flies and mosquitoes before they sought their lodging place.

Here is an example given in his own words of the ungentlemanly way in which that man helped himself to bats:

"This year the blinds were left open for the first part of the summer and the bats were obliged to look up new sleeping quarters. In July I closed the blinds, hoping to entice the bats back to their former apartments; and, sure enough, about the first of the month I was delighted to see a solitary individual hanging by his toes in one corner of the window, fast asleep. Wishing to have him pose as a model for an illustration, I unceremoniously routed him out and deposited him on my desk, where he spent a most unhappy morning, losing all patience with me before the portrait was half completed—which was hardly to be wondered at, considering the circumstances. As often as I tried to get him to change his position he would break forth into shrill, stuttering protests and snap viciously at everything within reach; but he soon quieted down on being left alone and slept complacently close to my hand while I sketched him.

"Several times he escaped and flew deliberately downstairs, which I think few birds would have the intelligence or coolness to do. All those that I have seen in similar circumstances fluttered helplessly against the glass or ceiling and absolutely refused to fly downward under any provocation; but my bat flew up or down with equal willingness and from room to room, earnestly searching for a passage to the open air.

"Whenever he felt tired he would hang himself up in the fold of a curtain to rest, apparently being fast asleep as soon as he was fairly settled. Glass he soon learned to avoid as slippery and treacherous; but the mosquito screens furnished better foothold and the way he would scuttle about over these was something marvelous. Finally I carried him outdoors and gave him his freedom and in spite of the sun he seemed to find no difficulty in seeing, but started directly for the barn window, which was partly open, and entered it as the swallows did."

And then follows the face-washing wonder, worth walking miles to see. But first, speaking of the little brown bat whose portrait he made, this entertaining man goes on thus:

"He evidently decided that he had chosen an unsafe sleeping place and for a little while the window was deserted, but in a few days I noticed a smaller specimen of his race in the opposite corner and the day following there were nine of varying size ranged along the upper sash in their usual characteristic attitudes. One near the middle of the row was wide awake, washing himself after the manner of a cat. He would lick his foot or a portion of his wing and rub his head with it the wrong way of the fur and scratch himself rapidly behind the ear with one of his little thumb nails at the bend of his wing, the long bone of the forearm beating a tattoo on the glass beside him as he did so. The elasticity of the wing membrane is truly astonishing; he would seize an edge of it in his mouth and stretch it into all kinds of grotesque shapes in his endeavor to get it clean enough to suit his fancy, and sometimes, when at work on the inside, he would wrap his head up in it entirely, the thin, rubbery stuff conforming to the general outline of his skull in the most startling manner."

What a pity that more houses in these days are not provided with blinds; they would be so convenient for bats and give the rest of us a possible chance to see a bat wash his face.

Most writers on the subject have little to say about the bat families, so that it was truly getting news to be told by the man of the bat hotel that each bat mother carries her two baby bats with her. This is what he says:

"These helpless things"—referring to the baby bats—"are not left at home at the mercy of foraging rats and mice. When the old bat flits off into the twilight the youngsters often go with her, clinging about her neck, swinging away over the treetops and along the foggy waterside, while she chases the numberless little flying things of the dark."

Of course we all know that bats have wide mouths because they catch their food on the wing, and that they eat beetles, gnats, mosquitoes and other insects; also that Mr. Bat's neck is short, so that he can turn his head and body at the same time. We know that bats have a flying membrane instead of wings, and that they sleep and hang suspended by their feet. We know that they work at night, and sleep all winter. We know that their sight is poor and their hearing keen; but it must certainly be a surprise to the majority of persons to learn that the bat washes his face like a cat.

If you doubt it, consult "American Animals," written by William Everitt Cram and Witmer Stone. Also, if your windows are provided with blinds, consult the bat.

A House That Turns Green

Did you ever see a sod house? If you had been traveling through Dakota with the editor last summer you would have seen a number of them, on farms owned by Russian Jews. They are not pretty to look at, but are very comfortable to live in.

It is said that one of the finest houses ever designed is the sod house of the Wichitas, the only tribe that ever accomplished successfully the erection of such a structure. A few years ago the Wichitas abandoned these huts to take up their life in the two-room frame shacks provided for them by a beneficent government; and there are only a few old men of the tribe alive today who understand the art of building a sod house.

A sod house, says Harper's Weekly, looks easy to build, but it is not. The turf was gathered early in the spring, while it was yet fresh. The sod cutting usually took place immediately after a rain, and the sod was removed to a thickness of about eight inches. Buffalo grass sod was the only kind that answered the purpose of the builder. He began to lay the foundation as does the stone mason, digging away the earth to the depth of about one foot. The grass portion of the chunks of sod was laid to the outside, and the house was built to a height of twelve or fifteen feet, in the form of a pointed dome. There was no hole in the top for smoke to pass out; it was carried away through a pipe on the outside of the hut. The door was usually in the south, and there were no windows.

Through each tuft of sod was run a willow wand, and these wands were bound round the structure. The grass remained green and would grow if there was plenty of rain. It was not at all uncommon to see the sides of a sod house turn green as spring approached, just as did the pastures near it. The houses were warm in winter and cool in summer. They never leaked. Often the Indians had barns made of the same material.

One Way to Get Bait

One day a boy was going fishing. The first thing he had to do, of course, was to get some bait.

"I'm going for worms," he told his mother, "but I don't need a spade. This can of water will take its place. Come on and I'll show you."

They went to the garden, and there the boy sprinkled his water over a spot of ground about a yard in diameter.

"They'll be up in a minute or so," he said, "see if they aren't!"

Sure enough. Presently by twos and threes small worms began to poke their heads up out of the soil. Earthworms have no ears, but they have a very sensitive skin. The worms had felt the patter of the water on the ground, and had crept up to enjoy what they thought was cool rain. It didn't take the boy long to fill his can.

The Loss Wasn't His

Freddie was at his first party, and was enjoying it immensely. The only disappointment was, says The Pictorial Review, that he hadn't been able to take Sister Sue with him, as she had a bad cold.

"Now, Freddie," said the hostess as he was leaving, "I want you to take a box of chocolates home to your sister, and here's another for yourself for your trouble."

Freddie thanked her nicely and trotted off home with his nurse, the two boxes of chocolates clutched tightly in his two little fat hands. Suddenly he stumbled, and down went one of the boxes, spilling the chocolates over the muddy pavement.

Freddie picked himself up and looked at the box intact in his hand. Then he looked at the one in the mud. "Poor Sue!" he said.

The Cup That Cheers

BY A. P. V.

When, 'neath the sweet wistaria,
We sip our cups of tea,
We always feel so very glad
We're Japanese. You see,
The English children only have
The "cambric" kind, we hear;
And tea that isn't tea at all
Must taste so very queer!

NEW BOOKS

Prevention of Accidents and Disease

Safety: Methods for Preventing Occupational and Other Accidents and Diseases, by W. H. Tolman and Leonard Kendall. Captains of industry in America have too often forgotten that the industrial regime is not primarily military—as their generic title of captain might suggest—but brotherly. That the Christian ethic of responsibility for one's brother is the only ethic under which industry can progress is, however, the fact; and it is not without significance in support of that fact that industry and the brother arose in the same soil, the soil of the family in which all primitive industry was originally carried on.

Europe, perhaps because the brothers there have been more aware of their mutual relationships and less tempted by the prospect of getting rich quickly, is much ahead of America in the application of the principle that even the large employer is after all his brother's keeper as well as his brother's boss. Hence a work like "Safety"—which should rank as the most important book for industry that has been published in some years—can be written only with abundant help from European sources, from which one of its authors, Dr. Tolman, has gathered much material for the American Museum of Safety, of which institution he is the director. It is encouraging to note, however, that he is enabled to cite many examples of systematic safeguarding from some of the largest American corporations.

It is generally assumed that it is very necessary to advocate such reforms as this book suggests in terms of economy in production rather than in terms of mere benevolence. If that indeed be true, then safety is not without its arguments. Dr. Tolman claims that 50 per cent of industrial accidents are preventable by taking proper precautions; and when that is figured in terms of time saved, litigation saved, and machinery saved, even the selfish manufacturer should take heed. Nor are the safety devices themselves necessarily expensive; some are almost absurdly simple, as the authors prove by examples.

The book should not only be read by every employer of labor, every union man who wishes to use his union power legitimately, but by every consumer who wishes to know just the cost in life and health of the things that go to the enrichment of his own life. [Harper and Brothers, New York. $3 net.]

Art and Architecture

The Mediæval Church Architecture of England, by Charles Herbert Moore, is a book which must at once take its place as a standard authority in the study of Gothic architecture, the history of which becomes of increasing value to architectural students in America as the Gothic type is revived in this country. While the author enlarges to an extent on the technical phases of the transitional growth of the Gothic from the early to the middle ages, his general style will be found attractive to the lay student interested in architectural history. The work is invaluable to the architect who seeks reasonable motives for his structural design in the ecclesiastical work in this country. [Macmillan Company, New York. $3.50.

Successful Houses and How to Build Them, by Charles E. White, Jr. To attempt to indicate all the helpful points in this fine book would have the effect of reproducing the index. It deals with every consideration, from selection of site and plan of house to the completion and use of the building. For the man or woman "at sea" in regard to specifications, construction contracts and costs it is particularly valuable. The illustrations are bountifully numerous. [Macmillan Company, New York. $2 net.

The Saints in Art, by Margaret E. Tabor. A second and corrected edition, in which the original purpose of the author—an effort to interpret the traditions of Christian hagiology as they presented themselves to the artists whose masterpieces are in the most important art galleries and churches of Europe—remains unchanged. The book is convenient in size and in its conclusions cannot fail to serve a useful purpose. [E. P. Dutton and Company, New York. $1.25 net.

Theology and Philosophy

Rudolf Eucken's Message to Our Age, by Henry C. Sheldon. With the increasing interest in Professor Eucken's views, and the growth of confidence in him as a leader in philosophy and religion, it is fitting that a competent appreciation and criticism of his theories should be given to the lay public. Dr. Sheldon aims to do this. He points out some of the elements of strength and also some of the defects of the new philosopher's system. [Eaton and Mains, New York. 35 cents net.

Religious Liberty, by Francesco Ruffini; translated by J. Parker Heyes, with a preface by J. D. Bury. Professor Ruffini begins with the distinction between liberty of thought and ecclesiastical liberty, and then proceeds to the difference between both of these and religious liberty. The whole department of history which is concerned with religious persecutions falls out of the field as defined by the author for his investigation in this work. His aim is to trace the rise, the development and the definite triumph of the idea that nobody ought to be deprived of juridical rights in his community. This is a task that, in spite of the multitude of ways in which the subject of religious liberty has been investigated, has thus far remained unperformed. Professor Ruffini has filled the gap with diligence and learning. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.

The Book of Job Interpreted, by James Strahan. In a brief introduction Mr. Strahan treats in an unexpectedly fresh and interesting manner the critical problems arising in the study of Job. Among these naturally come the question of the theme of the work, namely, why should the righteous man suffer? The authorship, the historical background, the date, the text, the analysis of the argument also naturally have a place in the discussion of introductory critical matters. But Mr. Strahan excels in the expository treatment of the successive discourses. His exposition is lucid and happy in its frequent transference of the eternal thought from its ancient literary garb to a modern one. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $3 net.

The Book of Wisdom, edited by Rev. A. T. S. Goodrick, appears in the Oxford Church Bible Commentary. The author treats this "deuterocanonical" book from the point of view of the Anglican Church. The Book of Wisdom is full of good things, but it lacks unity of point of view and consistency of thought, and Mr. Goodrick aims to explain such obscurities as growing out of the lack of self-consistency on the part of the author. The work is constructed upon the model of the present day commentaries, and the text is given with full and ample notes. [Macmillan Company, New York. $2.

The Deciding Voice of the Monuments in Biblical Criticism, by M. G. Kyle. Although in his introduction Dr. James Orr asserts that it "clearly and ably exhibits its own purpose," it is not quite evident from the work itself just what the author considers the decision of archæology to be. It is plain enough that he claims a decision against some specific type of Biblical criticism, but what sort of Biblical criticism is testified against by the light of the monuments he never makes clear. There is the unbending traditionalism of the ultra-conservative who would take every word of the Pentateuch to have been written by Moses, and the free conservatism of many who claim historical trustworthiness for the biblical documents only in the general and important outline. Presumably it is this latter type of thought that Dr. Kyle finds favored by the monuments. But he does not say so, and leaves the impression that in the effort to controvert certain views regarded dangerous and abhorrent he has forgotten the need of the simple seeker for light. [Bibliotheca Sacra Company, Oberlin, Ohio.

The Fundamental Christian Faith, by Charles A. Briggs. Taking up the two earliest summaries of the Christian faith (the apostles' and the Nicene creeds), the late Dr. Briggs gives a somewhat detailed account of their origin and history with an effort at their correct interpretation. The book is based upon much careful study and embodies the labor of many years, but it presents very little that is original or striking. Dr. Briggs's well-known radicalism in Old Testament criticism changes into stanch, even polemic, conservatism when he enters the doctrinal field. His zeal as a conservative does not permit him to spare even such a man as his colleague, Professor A. C. McGiffert, whose work on the apostles' creed comes in for some severe condemnation in the pages of this volume. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $1.50 net.

For Young People

Comrades from Other Lands, by Leila Allen Dimock. The former editor of Over Sea and Land has in no degree lost the art of making Christian facts engaging to children. In this little volume, which is prepared as one of the junior books of the international home mission study course, she devotes her powers of fascination to children somewhat older than those who read Over Sea and Land, but with the same vivacity and attractiveness which held the attention of her magazine readers a few years ago. This time the theme is what older students call the immigration question. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. Paper, 25 cents net.

The Red House Children at Grafton, by Amanda M. Douglas. There is so much wholesome fun and such a lot of lessons beautifully taught in this story that it makes one think of the immortal "Little Pepper" books. [Lothrop, Lee and Shepard Company, Boston. $1 net.

Dave Porter and the Runaways, by Edward Stratemeyer, tells of Dave's last year at the academy and the exciting chase caused by some students who flee from school to avoid detection in a crime. [Lothrop, Lee and Shepard Company, Boston. $1.25 net.

W. A. G.'s Tale, by Margaret Turnbull. A little sick boy, tired of books about nature and animals and fairies, writes a story "his own self" about a little boy. It is ingeniously done and most amusingly illustrated. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1 net.

The Sunbridge Girls at Six Star Ranch, by Eleanor Stuart. Some New Hampshire girls spend happy, exciting days on a ranch in Texas. Written in a way to absorb any girl reader of 12 years or thereabouts. [L. C. Page and Company, Boston. $1.50.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

November 2, 1913—Balak and Balaam

Everyday View of the Lesson

By J. L. Scott

Lesson Text, Numbers 22:1—23:10. Golden Text, James 1:8: A double-minded man, unstable in all his ways.

"The third time conquers" is a saying that finds verification in the life of Moses. Twice he had encamped upon the borders of Canaan and twice he had turned about to resume his journeyings in the desert. Kadesh was a sorry experience and proved that the land of promise must be entered by a different gate. Things began to assume the aspect of finality. Miriam was dead and Aaron had gone up the slope of Mount Hor, where, stripped of his pontifical garments, he lay down and awaited the falling of the stars. The lawgiver must have felt the loneliness that comes over everyone as he approaches the sunset. The old friends with whom we have tramped the desert one by one disappear. Life loses its inspiration and the future comes down the way to meet us. Moses knew perfectly well that for him there was no land of promise. The ambition of his life had proved a vain dream, but he kept on in the interest of others. The nation was greater than himself. Real worth is never limited to a single life.

No Man Lives, or Sows, Unto Himself Alone

Moses might have argued, "Let those fight for Canaan who expect to occupy it," but such was not the spirit of his life, nor of the life of any man worthy to bear the image of God. Few ever reap fully the harvest of their own sowing. The tree under which we sit was planted by other hands than ours, but we may gather its fruits.

There are no bridges to the River Jordan. It must be forded by those who would possess it. The lawgiver found the passes guarded by an army of warriors who prepared to dispute his coming. His policy was one of peace. The king was addressed as a brother and permission asked to march by the beaten road to the country beyond. The request was courteous, but politeness is lost on some men. Suspicious of everything, they see a painted raven in the whitest dove.

The lawgiver dreaded war and marched on. His next experience was less pacific. Another of the fierce tribes thrust its spear in the face of Israel, only to discover that he who takes the sword is liable to perish by it. He may not in the first instance, but there is a Waterloo for every Napoleon. No one was ever great enough to fight successfully his way across the earth. Some unknown champion awaits him farther on.

Where Israel learned the secrets of war is a mystery. Those who had fought at Rephidim were now either old men or else they had passed into the shadowy realms of peace. But an army sprang out of that desert like the harvest from the dragons' teeth. Israel had become a nation and the foot of the victor rested upon the neck of the Amorite.

King of Moab Proposes to Buy Omnipotence with Gifts

Success always inspires respect. Among the kings most interested in Israel's triumph was Balak, king of Moab. Of this man we know but little. He seems, however, to have been a king of more than ordinary discretion and knew the value of counsel. Not only in human counsel but in divine did he seek strength. The elders of Midian were brought into consultation and the friendly offices of Balaam, a prophet of reputation, were also sought. With the one he would form an alliance, and from the other purchase the curse of God against Israel. The spirituality of those days was necessarily low. Every tribe was supposed to have its deity. Jehovah was the God of Israel. With him Balaam's influence was assumed to be great, so great that the curse of one became the curse of the other. The proposition of the king's was purely commercial. He would buy Omnipotence with gifts.

A similar idea lies at the basis of all primitive religions. The patriarchs were not entirely free from it. We worship the God of our fathers, but to us he is a very different Being from what he was to them. The history of civilization is marked by man's growing conception of the Almighty. What is God? The story of Israel in but a journey toward the answer. Its history fails to reveal it. Eliminate the Christ and the journey is not over.

Balaam was a product of his time. How far he may have possessed the spirit of true prophecy can never be known. There are those who live at the horizon. They touch the earth and sky with equal facility. Such men are common. They make up a countless host both in the church and out. One's estimate of their character depends on the particular phase which he happens to know best. For this reason there is difference of opinion as to worth. Your hypocrite may be my saint.

Balaam to All Appearances Possessed of Dual Personality

The scientists recognize what they term a double nature. In this way they account for many self-contradictions both in thought and in life. Saul belonged to this class and so did Balaam. He could bless and curse with the same breath. The early theologians taught that Balaam was a magician inspired of the devil, while others saw in him a special agent chosen of God. All depends on which of the two accounts of his life one is disposed to accept, the one recorded here or the one to be found in chapter 31. Both are no doubt true, but are simply different photographs taken at different times.

One of the most faithful men the writer ever knew at times seemed marked of Satan. Against will and purpose he fell as if smitten by a demon. His efforts at restoration were enough to awaken the sympathies of the most indifferent. No prodigal ever returned more broken in life and heart. That he was a good man no one who really knew him ever doubted. He had seen the Christ—afar off, it may be, but none the less he had seen him.

Balaam's character cannot be read with entire satisfaction, but this much is evident: No one can resist God. The plottings of evil are never successful; to his will all must ultimately submit.

The Lesson Verse by Verse

By Hermon D. Jenkins

Analysis—In the Orient there have always been men who possessed the fragments of a prepatriarchal faith. The enemies of religion often fear the progress of the faith more than its defenders know. Balaam, the money-loving priest, lets "I dare not" wait upon "I would."

The lesson seems to make it plain that the main tenets of the Old Testament theology were not unknown to the better informed spirits of the times. We have never found any good reason for believing that the religion of Jehovah was taught Moses by Jethro, although that seems to be the popular belief now. It is true that Abraham recognized in Melchizedek the priest of a monotheistic religion worthy of respect (Gen. 14:16-20), and the author of the epistle to the Hebrews sees him to be in some respects greater than Abraham (Heb. 7:1-15). That Jethro was a priest of Midian (Ex. 3:1) is mentioned in a very different spirit from that in which the writers of the Old Testament mention the "priests of Baal." When a missionary in India encounters a Parsee today he recognizes immediately that he is face to face with a very different faith from that of the Hindu multitude. He discovers a monotheism as pure as his own, though not so intelligent or comforting.

The Creed of Moses Similar to Balaam's Own

This will help us to understand that when the ruler of Moab invoked the magical interference of a Midianite priest to "curse Israel" he found that priest possessed of a purer theism and a sterner sense of duty than his own. Balaam recognized that the creed of Moses was similar to his own, only purer, and he dared not throw himself across the path of a people led by the one true God. It was just because Balak recognized Balaam's creed to be something like that of Moses that he thought Balaam could, by going through a similar ritual and by offering sacrifices not unlike those of Israel, "stand off" the Israelites and their God.

Verse 3—When the Israelites and the Moabites clashed, both the attackers and the defenders had fear one of the other. Moab occupied the country about the south end of the Dead sea and a comparatively weak force could keep out an invader, however strong.

Verse 4—Nevertheless the Moabites implored the Midianites—who were their distant relatives, both tribes being descended from Keturah, the second wife of Abraham—to come and help them repel the advancing host. Balak sent especially for Balaam, who had won reputation as a "holy man" and as one having a better understanding of magic than others.

Verse 5—Balak exaggerated the number of his enemy, who had themselves offered to pass through the country, if permitted to do so, peaceably. So we have here two nations, each of which was in mortal terror of the other, and both brought to fight although neither desired to do so.

Verse 6—Balak's prayer was that Balaam, better posted than he in the rites of the God worshiped by Israel, should come and throw a spell over the Israelites—bewitch them, our fathers would have said. The old superstition dies hard, if indeed it ever dies. Balak believed that Balaam, knowing so much about all religions, could "conjure" the Israelites and then he, Balak, would sweep down upon them and exterminate them.

He Who Dallies with Temptation Is Already Lost

Chapter 24:10 — Balaam, type of many a money-loving priest, had yielded to the importunities of Balak; but as often as Balaam attempted to repeat some "curse" to the hurt of the Israelites his conscience would overwhelm him and he would, in spite of his own interest, pronounce them under the protection of the great Jehovah and so safe from all his machinations (ch. 23:8-10).

In all ages since, Balaam has been an illustration of the man who neither dares to carry out his wicked purpose nor is willing to abandon it. A story is told of a poor scholar, greatly pressed for money, who is left to administer a powerful remedy to a man sinking in stupor, a man upon whose death he will largely benefit. When the patient falls asleep the watcher tries to persuade himself that it will be better to omit the remedy than to disturb the sleeper. He finally resolves to waken the sleeper and hastens to administer the remedy, only to find him breathing his last.

So Balaam lets "I dare not" wait upon "I would." He cannot break loose and go home, neither will he venture to peril his soul by committing the wickedness for which he is to be paid. He finally accomplishes more than the king sought by suggesting to him a temptation to which he knows the soldiers will yield, through which the Israelites will, as it were, commit suicide. He will set the trap, but let the victim spring it himself (Num. 25).

Knowledge of the Truth by No Means Assures Fidelity to It

Verses 12-13—It is a curious but pathetic psychological fact that some of the brightest intellects are possessed by men of an abnormal spiritual twist. Perhaps the finest tribute ever paid to the person of our Lord was that written by Jean Jacques Rousseau in his "Nouvelle Heloise," but the man himself was rotten to the core. A man may speak with the tongue of men and of angels, said St. Paul, and yet lack the root of all true religion (I. Cor. 13:1).

Verses 14-19—This man, so strangely perverted in his conscience, so corrupt that he would, if he dared, curse the people of God, sees with absolute certainty the triumph of Jehovah's cause. By habits and by passion he is bound hand and foot. But he recognizes that the man who fights against God fights a losing battle all the time. The men who today fill the saloons, waste their patrimony and gamble away the substance of their families, know just as well as their Christian friends that they are fools and doomed. They know more about sin and its sure penalty than any minister can tell them, but they go on and, like Balaam, reap the wages of their own unrighteousness (II. Pet. 2:12-16).

BY EDWARD ARTHUR WICHER

Week Beginning October 26, 1913

TOPIC — The unmerciful servant. Matthew 18:23-34.

Christ had no greater joy than in bestowing forgiveness. And herein he revealed the heart of God. For forgiveness involves the establishment of a right relationship between God and man. It is a full forgiveness without limitation or reversal.

Peter was quick to catch the drift of this discourse of Jesus. If God so forgave his children they ought also to forgive one another. But he also saw clearly the danger of forgiveness, namely, that his brother would take advantage of the fact that he had to do with a forgiving man, and repeat his offense. So he asked his Master: "How oft shall my brother sin against me, and I forgive him? Until seven times?" Peter knew well the old Jewish law of forgiveness: "Upon a first offense thou shalt forgive; upon a second offense thou shalt forgive; upon a third offense thou shalt forgive; upon a fourth offense thou shalt retaliate." In being thus willing to extend this law of forgiveness to more than double its original application he doubtless felt that he was exceedingly generous. So liberal had his intercourse with Jesus made him.

But he still had an unforgiving spirit. He set a limit to his willingness to pardon. There was none to that of Jesus. The "seventy times seven" is simply a vivid answer to the question of Peter.

It is to enforce the obligation of forgiveness and to show the contemptibleness of the unforgiving spirit that this parable is spoken. Let us consider these three points: The forgiveness of the great debtor, the refusal of the great debtor to forgive the little debtor, and the final punishment of the great debtor.

The great debtor was forgiven an enormous debt. The 10,000 talents was approximately $10,000,000. From the Jewish viewpoint 10,000 was regarded as the largest numerical unit. We have therefore to think of one of those high officers of state by which the absolute monarchs of Oriental empires were accustomed to surround themselves. This man was the grand vizier of the court and held in complete control the vast estates and revenues of his sovereign. Perhaps he thought that he would never be called upon to face a reckoning. He must have stood in the most intimate place of his lord's confidence in order to have had opportunity to accumulate so large a debt.

Peter and the others of the twelve were close to Christ. There was committed to them an infinite treasure, that they might employ it for the advantage of their Lord in the work of his kingdom. In their ever-recurring disputes as to which of them should be greatest in the kingdom of God there was grave danger lest they should appropriate this treasure to their own uses and squander it, making it profitless for both the world and themselves. The greatness of the privileges of those who are near to Jesus is indicated by the vastness of the sum.

But this sum must be accounted for some time. When this debtor had nothing wherewith to pay his debts, his lord gave command that he should be sold with his wife and children and all that he had, that thus payment might be made. That the insolvent debtor should be sold for the liquidation of his debt was an ancient law in Israel (Ex. 22:3; Lev. 25:39), and that his wife and children should go under the hammer, too, was also a well worn custom (II. Kings 4:1; Neh. 5:5), resting upon the doctrine of the solidarity of the family; yet in Israel this law had been mitigated by the year of jubilee (Isa. 58:6; Lev. 25:39), and had been brought into something of disrepute by the prophets (Amos 2:6). In Rome and Athens, as well as in Jerusalem, such a discharge of debt was a matter of daily occurrence. The parable does not raise the question whether this mode of payment would completely satisfy the debt. It simply discloses a situation in which the lord is absolute master of the person of his subject, and the payment of a debt is sought in a legal manner.

The unhappy man in his appeal for forbearance promised to pay all. There is a profound psychology underlying the representation, for men are commonly disposed to think that they can pay their whole debt to God, if only they be given sufficient time in which to work it off. It is a childish promise the debtor offers, but it is abjectly made. He first falls upon his knees and then he bows his face to the ground. Then his lord freely forgives him all. No injury is too great for this king to forgive, because of his infinite strength and tenderness. His was a truly kingly forgiveness.

The generous mercy of his lord and the hateful refusal of the great debtor to show mercy to his fellow servant are set in sharpest contrast. The great debtor discovers an utter absence of fellow feeling for the little debtor, doubtless for the very reason that he was a great debtor. The amount due to him was small, only about $17, and typifies the relatively small debts that can exist between man and man as compared with the great debt that a man owes to God. But the first servant, acting in accordance with a provision of the Roman law made only for extreme cases, caught this fellow servant by the collar of his cloak and under compulsion of a goad drove him away to prison. He insisted upon the utmost of his legal rights in dealing with his fellow man and thus made himself hateful to God. It is not infrequently the man who demands most mercy for himself that is most merciless with his fellows. The prayer that cries for mercy should teach us also to render the deeds of mercy.

It has been said with insight that there is enough sorrow in the secret life of every enemy to disarm all our hostility if we could but know it. But some men are apparently never moved by compassion. They can pursue their own gain and profit to the end. And in our reconciliation to God we need far more than the mere cancellation of our past transgressions—we need also the mind that is in Christ.

But the guilt of the old sins is revived, as it were, by the refusal to forgive our brother. An unforgiving spirit on our part is certain to provoke the indignation of God's wrath. There is no law in the universe more sure of operation than that it shall be measured to us again with whatsoever measure we use. Whoever is unmerciful in his treatment of his brother is certain to have to face at no distant date the stern exactions of an impartial justice in his own shortcomings.

THE GREAT PARTNERSHIP

TOPIC—The ideal Christian. XI. His heavenly Helper. Heb. 13:5-15.

Fluttering-mindedness marks our days. Folk are uncertain of everything, themselves included. The generality of mankind seem to be without any deep faith. Even from politics the intense conviction of an older day appears to have departed. The familiar lines on which this topic is based: "The Lord is my helper; I will not fear: What shall man do unto me?" represent an older ideal of thought. Yet we make bold to say that they set forth the need of our own time. The sense of God seems to have faded out of many lives. More than we need the fulfillment of any article of the day's social program we need this underlying, all-sustaining sense of being in alliance with the great God.

Henry Drummond says, "Every character has an inner spring; let Christ be that spring."

Wherever a traveler goes in foreign lands he is sure to see the advertisements of a certain sewing machine company. The local agent can say to his neighbors, be they Arabs or Chinese or Hindus or Russians, "I am a small part of a great whole. This business is worldwide. My firm is so great that it may be counted on to do everything it promises." So the worker in the local church may say, "This church does not by any means display all the wares of our house. We do a worldwide business. Our praise is on the lips of men all over the earth. You cannot understand the church local until you understand the church universal, and all the members of the corporation, in this world and beyond the skies." It is heartening to the average Christian to remember the greatness of the work of which he is a part and the omnipotence of the Head of the house.

A Christian started out in a driving storm to a rescue mission. "The weather and I are on the business of the same Master," he said. "We shall not interfere with each other."

Wherever in all this wide world a man drives a nail or writes a book or preaches a sermon or teaches a child or drives a horse for the welfare of man and the glory of God, that man may count on the support and cooperation of all the limitless forces of God.

Some responsibilities belong solely to the Supreme Authority; and his subordinates are accountable only for fidelity. The captain of a ship, not the stokers nor the stewards, is running that ship. The United States navy recently disciplined an officer because his ship ran aground when he was not on the bridge at all, but asleep in his cabin. There is peace in the assurance that many things about our life and our work are not our affair at all, but God's. We have only to carry out orders. If we are faithful in following the orders clearly given, the rest is with him.

Many firms fail, say the great commercial agencies, because of insufficient capital. A partner with resources would have saved the business from wreck. So with life. Many of us are going to smash simply because we need a Partner with greater resources than ourselves to be our helper. That Partner stands ready to go into business with all who are willing to be "laborers together with him."

A great confidence is born of great experience. It is the man who has made many horseshoes who offers, with no note of uncertainty in his voice, to shoe the traveler's horse satisfactorily. The youth entering active life is uncertain of himself because he has never been actually tried. They count most confidently on the help of God who have depended on him in the past. "They who trust him greatly, find him greatly true."

The really great things of life, the things that last and that reach out into other lives, are all spiritual. They partake of some quality that is beyond mere human capability. So it is he who knows how the power of Christ flows through his own abilities and then goes far beyond them, who says with Paul, "I can do all things in him that strengtheneth me."

Once when I was sojourning in a native Japanese inn in Nikko, a boy came to my room with curios. Because he could speak a little English, it was worth while to have him. In the course of the visit I asked him where he had learned his English. "From my master," was the reply. That keynote resounded through the evening conversation. It was "my master" this and "my master" that. The excellencies of the master were ever on the servant's lips, so that in spirit the boy said, "For to me, to live is my master." That lad was to me a preacher. His joyful pride in his master, his constant pointing to his master as an example and a source, his desire that his master should have all praise, carried home the question, "Does my life so speak for the Christ? In all I do or say are men made to think, not of me, but of my divine Helper? Is my life ever saying, like the Baptist, "He must increase, but I must decrease"?

MISSIONARY WORK

Hopes and Fears in China

The day before President Yuan Shih Kai was inaugurated as the regular constitutional president of the republic of China (in contrast with his previous status as provisional president), he gave recognition to the Young Men's Christian Association by opening the new Peking building through the medium of an electric wire leading from the palace, over which the president gave the signal for the admission of the public to the new structure.

The Peking Christian association building is a five-story edifice which introduces the aspect of the American skyscraper into the ancient Oriental capital, where practically all the Chinese buildings are still of one story only. The association's new home cost about $65,000, which was the gift of John Wanamaker, Philadelphia's famous merchant. This is outside of the cost of the lot, which was provided by subscriptions from Chinese citizens of the capital. The Peking association is manned exclusively in its salaried positions by Princeton graduates who are supported by annual contributions of the university's alumni and students. The working force is under the direction of General Secretary Robert R. Gailey, who in his student days made for Princeton such a football record as has scarcely been equaled by any of the college heroes since.

The United States "charge" at Peking, Edward T. Williams, who is carrying on the business of the legation pending the arrival of Professor Reinsch, the newly appointed minister, has sent to the state department in Washington a specially interesting report on the attempt to revive Confucianism as the national religion of China. Mr. Williams says nothing to confirm the information recently reported in this country that President Yuan himself had taken measures to restore the worship of Confucius to the schools of China. But he does tell very definitely of the activities of Dr. Chen Huang Chang, a young doctor of philosophy from Columbia University, who has at an exceptionally early age attained the dignity of membership in the Chinese Academy of Letters.

Dr. Chen has just presided at a convention held at Chufu, the birthplace of Confucius, to celebrate the natal day of the great Chinese philosopher. And at this gathering ambitious plans were laid to disseminate over the whole republic a Confucian propaganda, which naturally will be urged in the name of patriotism even more than in the name of religion. It can easily be foreseen that in this movement every effort will be made to encourage the feeling which already influences a host of Chinamen—that Christianity is after all a product of Western civilization, and therefore essentially unsuited to Oriental life.

The missionaries of all churches in China ever since the revolution came to success have been urgently appealing to their supporters at home to recognize an opportunity which could not long continue. Following the transformation of the Chinese empire into a republic, the prevailing enthusiasm for Occidental progress made the ablest Chinamen willing to give Christianity unprejudiced attention. But those who know the Chinese well have regarded a reaction from this disposition inevitable, and the present Confucian movement may fairly be regarded as the beginning of the fulfillment of their fears. If so, the strategic opening for Christianity's advance in China threatens to be narrower and shorter than the missionaries had anticipated.

Missionary Conferees to The Hague

The annual session of the Continuation Committee of the Edinburgh Conference—which now through thirty-five international representatives brings into close touch all the evangelical mission forces of the world—will be held this fall in The Hague, Holland, beginning Nov. 14. The chairman, John R. Mott, has already sailed for The Hague in company with his friend the Episcopalian member, Dr. Silas McBee, editor of The Constructive Quarterly. Dr. Goucher of Baltimore, the Methodist representative, has been traveling in Europe and remains abroad for this occasion. The remaining American members expect to sail in company at the first of November, including Dr. Arthur J. Brown of the Presbyterian Board, Dr. Charles R. Watson of the United Presbyterian Board, Dr. J. L. Barton of the American Board, Bishop Lloyd of the Episcopalian Board, and Dr. R. P. Mackay of the Presbyterian Board of Canada.

The principal interest of this fall's meeting will be the report of Dr. Mott concerning the conferences which he held with the missionaries of all denominations on the principal Asiatic mission fields. Dr. Mott has made no public statement of the results of these conferences in any place as yet, having felt it obligatory on him to reserve an account of his stewardship until he could present it to the body which commissioned him. It was at the meeting of the Continuation Committee a year ago at Lake Mohonk, N. Y., that Dr. Mott was requested to undertake this great missionary tour and his conclusions and recommendations he esteems, therefore, the peculiar property of the committee. But it is known that Dr. Mott feels that a great gain has been made in the united and cooperative purpose of the various denominational forces in non-Christian lands, and it is expected that he will have strong recommendations for a further development of such cooperation.

American Indian Mission Progress

A notable event in the work for the red men is the recent selection of Rev. Jesse P. Williamson of South Dakota as superintendent for the new Bible training department at Santee, Neb. The Presbyterian Board of Home Missions and the American Missionary Association of the Congregational Church have happily effected a joint arrangement for the conduct of this new enterprise, and H. C. Olin, treasurer, and D. E. Waid, architect of the board in New York, have in hand plans for a modern building on the grounds of the Santee College, long conducted under the auspices of the Congregational Church.

In the selection of Mr. Williamson by the committee of the two denominations, a representative of the third generation of this consecrated missionary family enters the work for the Indians of the plains. A grandson of Rev. Stephen S. Riggs, M. D., and son of John P. Williamson, D. D., the new superintendent is admirably fitted by his mastery of the Dakota language and by his thorough education for this difficult task.

The annual convention of the Christian Indians of these two denominations held last month expressed pleasure in the choice of this young educational leader. Mr. Williamson has asked the church which he has been serving as pastor to release him and has indicated to the board his acceptance of the position. The training of ministers, Indian helpers and leaders in Christian activity among this largest tribe of Indians of the United States seems happily assured.

Foreign Fields Call for Preachers

In the matter of recruiting the mission forces which represent the church on the foreign field, there is a pendulum swing from one extreme to another very like that which is observable in most other human affairs. There are times when there are more candidates volunteering for the work than there is money in the treasury to provide for sending them abroad. Again the money on hand is abundant, but the number of men and women willing to go falls off below the demand. The latter is the present condition with the Presbyterian Board in New York.

Moreover, there is a similar alternation between the superabundant and insufficient supply in the different lines of activity which the board prosecutes in foreign fields. Some years ago there were plenty of men desiring to go out to mission service as ordained ministers, and the board at that time had to emphasize the call for teachers, physicians and industrial workers. Now the case is reversed. The board has applications from a fair proportion of candidates for these lay positions, but is suffering a very serious dearth of volunteers among young ministers. Ministerial candidates are now wanted, and the board is quite exercised over its inability to fill the urgent requests for preachers which are reaching it from a large number of its fields, but particularly from China and India. In these cases there is money on hand to send out ministerial candidates and any young minister who finds himself moved by the statement of this need to make application to the board in New York will receive an enthusiastic welcome.

Men who have been four or five years in the American pastorate already will be particularly acceptable, since their American experience will attest their adaptations and they are not yet old enough to make it difficult for them to learn foreign languages. Dr. Stanley White is the candidate secretary of the board, and to him correspondence may be addressed by those who are looking for an opportunity which Dr. White himself declares it is impossible to exaggerate.

Missionary in Chile Assassinated

Word has been received from Santiago, Chile, of the death by an assassin's bullet of Karl Hansen, a faithful worker of the Methodist Episcopal mission and general agent of the American Bible Society in Chile. Mr. Hansen has for the past year and a half had charge of the printing establishment of the mission, besides attending to other duties of an evangelistic character. The following account of his death is from a personal letter by Rev. J. H. McLean of the Presbyterian mission:

"We were all saddened beyond expression over the tragic death of Karl Hansen on Aug. 23. You remember that old Peruvian Rivas, who occupied one of the composing cases near the window. He was a worthless compositor, and Mr. Hansen had to dispense with his services some months ago, but he returned and begged for something to do, because he would not be tolerated by any other shop. Hansen took him on on Thursday, paid him on Saturday night, and because Rivas thought his pay trifling he went out and bought a revolver, stepped into the office where Mr. Hansen was checking over his accounts and fired twice with a deadly effect. Satisfied with his fiendish work, the perpetrator turned his weapon against his own temple and blew his brains out on the spot. I know of nothing that has affected me quite so strongly as this tragedy. The funeral was conducted this morning. There was a full representation from all the evangelical agencies and I have never attended services in Chile that were more impressive."

Board Notes and Announcements

—The first Friday morning in October was made memorable by the presence of three guests, Mrs. J. S. Oliver of Los Angeles, for many years an active member of the Board of the Northwest; Mrs. G. W. Rhoades, since 1898 president of Mattoon presbyterial society; and Mrs. H. R. Turner, mission study secretary of North Dakota synodical society, who said that when, thirty-three years ago, she helped to organize the first auxiliary in North Dakota, at Lisbon, she "turned to The Interior [now The Continent] to see what they were doing at Room 48," In response to her plea for counsel about mission study, Mrs. Rhoades told some practical stories and gave the advice to "be content with a small class." Having heard with interest their account of difficulties met, Mrs. Oliver gave the cheering word, after her many years of meeting like difficulties, "It's like turning a grindstone—the meeting of obstacles sharpens the edge. Just keep on turning and you'll sharpen up somebody to take the work when you are gone." The meeting was led by Mrs. D. W. Graham. Her belief that present methods of Bible teaching and mission study have given the church of today a truer understanding of missionary life was well illustrated by letters read from Mrs. Worley of Japan, Mrs. Underwood of Korea and Mrs. Hope of Africa.

The Open Hearth

Parents Also Responsible

The college senior was right—of whom mention was made in The Continent of August 7—who wished that "ministers would put more doctrine into their sermons." A young woman of my church who was employed in a large millinery house spoke to me of the fact that "the Roman girls of the house argue with the Protestant girls on the doctrines of Romanism and we Protestants cannot answer them, for we do not know about such matters."

Some years ago Dr. MacCracken, chancellor of New York University, lamented that the young men who came as students to the university "did not know the creed and had not learned a catechism." Yes, the ministers should preach the doctrine of the Presbyterian church as set forth in our confession of faith and catechism.

But our "college senior" should have gone a step back to that wise teacher Moses, who, inspired of God, said to each parent of Israel, "Thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children." Parental teaching is far superior to Sabbath schools, Boys' Brigades, Junior Endeavors, Men and Religion movements and all other devices which this "falling away" age has adopted in the place of God's plan.

The Scotch Covenanters of our land do not commit to a Miss Flora McFlimsey the religious training of their children, but parents at the baptism of their children covenant to do this themselves as Moses commanded.

Why Go to Church? Reasons

1. It makes a man stronger and better in every way.
2. It breaks up the monotony of life like an oasis in the desert.
3. It gives a man a chance to be generous by helping on a good cause.
4. It brings sunshine into the home.
5. It cheers the heart of the pastor.
6. It encourages somebody else to go.
7. It elevates the morals of the community.
8. It is a patriotic duty and makes a man a better citizen.
9. It is the best cure for blue Monday.
10. It fits a man for the week's work.
11. It is good preparation for the hereafter.
12. It leaves a pleasant memory behind.

Give it a trial next Sunday and see how it acts.

More Emphasis on the Pulpit

Concerning the article appearing in The Continent of Sept. 25, entitled "The Pastor as an Educational Engineer," you say, "Certainly not the most prejudiced of critics will be able to contend after reading this vigorous article from his pen that his ideas lack either in definiteness or practicality." This article is written from the standpoint of one whose sole work is that of the Sunday school. He places the Sunday school above everything else. It is a locomotive that is going to pull the whole Christian church to the desired destination, and without designating who the fireman is to be on that locomotive or who is to conduct the train, he places the pastor at the throttle, and when he isn't at the throttle he is to be an engine wiper, porter, conductor and, in fact, everything.

The very heart out of which come "the issues of life" in the Christian church is the pulpit. It is the fountain-head from whence flow all the streams that make glad the kingdom of God in this world, and whenever the pulpit is neglected or something else is substituted for it the church of Jesus Christ declines. It is all right to be "all things to all men," but it is impossible for a pastor to be everything to everybody. The modern minister is expected to be little more than a machine, and that not a machine to do one kind of work but forty. The writer has seen an Italian on the street corner giving a complete band selection himself—horn, clarinet, bass drum, snare drum, cymbals, triangle and what not. Here you have the figure of the modern minister if he is to be what is expected of him by these different agencies of the church.

We hear much about the decline in church attendance and the question is asked, "Why is the church losing its power?" The answer is close at hand: The engineer has just taken his hand off the throttle and hurried into the pulpit where he is expected to break the words of eternal life to a waiting congregation and he is unfitted for the occasion and unprepared to grasp the opportunity before him. Throughout the week as well as on Sunday he has multiplied himself by about twenty and when he goes into the pulpit on Sunday morning he carries only about one-twentieth part of himself into its sacred presence; hence the decline of the modern pulpit and the consequent loss of power in the church.

Ian Maclaren in his Yale lectures thus refers to this sublime calling: "It lies upon the minister to care for the souls of his people from house to house; to spare no pains that divine service be beautiful and reverent; to afford to the young every means of religious culture; to move his congregation unto such good works as lie to their hand; but it is well for him to remember that the most critical and influential event in the religious week is his sermon. . . . It is the prophet who has aroused the race from ignoble sleep, has fired the imagination with lofty ideals, has nerved it for costly sacrifices, has led it to victory."

To be a great prophet one must be free from distraction at least a part of the time, and who can be but distracted with a score or more of interests pressing him all the time and forty problems calling for solution every week? We complain about the falling off in church attendance. Dr. Jowett doesn't complain of this; Dr. Matthews of Seattle doesn't complain about this; neither does Dr. Gunsaulus. Why? Because these men maintain great pulpits, and therefore standing room is at a premium in their churches. "Back to the pulpit," not the locomotive, if the church of Jesus Christ is to assert her power in the world.

JOHN T. SULLIVAN.

Making Bible Classes Go

The writer is firmly convinced that the average Sunday school is not sufficient to completely furnish the religious education of boys and girls in the church. As a matter of fact he believes there is no more fruitful work the minister can engage in than to undertake a great part of that education himself. Consequently as a student doing summer work he has always organized Bible classes for boys and girls. When called to the church of Harbor Springs it was one of his first efforts to start them there. The result was most gratifying. In four classes he gathered 110 children with an average attendance of eighty. These classes took in the ages from seniors in high school down to 4-year-olds. At a public examination in the early spring the scholars recited various parts of Scripture and gave a review of the things learned during the winter.

The method used is to have the students use a text book which is catechetical in form, the scholars learning the answer, the minster asking the question. Then the lesson covered by the questions is studied in the class. Three different text books were used.

Do the children like it? The answer may be found in the fact that the high school class kept up a 90 per cent attendance during the winter months, that many have asked when the classes are going to begin again, and that it will be necessary to form another class.

All this in obedience to Proverbs 22:6.

"Perennial Themes" in a Will

The editorial on "Perennial Themes" is of especial interest to me. For ten years, on the first Sunday of June, according to a custom which was started in 1807, I have preached a sermon on one of four "perennial themes." It seems that one Thomas White of the town of Deerpark (now Port Jervis, N. Y.) in his last will and testament, proved before the surrogate on the 12th day of October, 1807, left this legacy: "Forty dollars of interest money shall be appropriated to and for the following purposes, yearly and every year forever: First—For a sermon to be preached in the Presbyterian house in Goshen, county aforesaid, on the first Sunday of June in every year forever, $10."

Similar bequests follow on behalf of the Episcopal church in Goshen, the "Congregational meeting house at Middletown in the town of Wallkill," and "the Dutch church at Magaahamak, where the people of Peenpack and vicinity assemble."

Then follows this statement: "And that the true intent may be made of those sermons forever in this day of declention, the ministers who preach those lectures shall wholly lecture on one of the four following subjects of divinity, to-wit:

"First—To establish the Christian faith and to confute heresies from the reasonableness of the Christian religion above all others, proven by the writings, faith and practice of the suffering primitive Christians.

"Second—Upon the Divinity of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

"Third—Upon the Divinity of the Holy Ghost.

"Fourth—Upon the Divinity of the Holy Scriptures."

These instructions have been obeyed by the pastors of the Goshen Presbyterian church for 106 years; the special financial inducement may be in some degree the reason for this. I believe that the three other churches long since left off the custom. The Magaahamak church in the town of Peenpack has been succeeded by the Reformed Dutch church of Port Jervis, once known as the town of Deerpark.

My own experience in preaching once a year upon one of the above subjects has convinced me of the value of treating such themes. I have always devoted nearly twice as much time to these "White sermons" (as they are here called), and I am glad to say that the more intelligent people of our congregation seem to appreciate them very much. I heartily agree with your most excellent editorial.

Ways of Working

Following Up Rally Day

Very few churches or Sunday schools in these days of efficiency are satisfied to allow the good impulses of Rally Day to die without an effort to crystallize them into a habit which will bring people to church and Sunday school for the rest of the year. First church, Evanston, Ill., began this "follow up" in the program for Rally Day services, which was printed in the form of an attractive booklet. Some facts about the Sunday school, where its contributions went, the names of the various departments and other information, were given to interest visitors in the regular work of the school. In the same way other schools are capitalizing enthusiasm of the special day by a house-to-house canvass of their vicinity. Others are sending postcards or similar invitations to pupils of other years who have not appeared for enrollment this fall. In some churches committees of the Sunday school are canvassing the church roll very carefully to see if all of the children of the church are connected with the school.

Publicity Hints for Churches

In the weekly calendar of First church, Minneapolis, Minn., some of the striking phrases from the pastor's sermon the week before are printed. Some churches which have a monthly publication in the same manner print the most epigrammatic sayings of the sermons of the previous month.

A men's Bible class in a suburban church recently started with an attendance of thirty-five. The initial meeting was announced by the pastor on two successive Sundays, postcards were sent to each man in the congregation, the weekly bulletin had an announcement of the prospective class and the local daily paper carried news of the class and its leader.

An excursion through Yellowstone National Park by the young people of the Church of the Covenant, Cincinnati, Ohio, was advertised by the announcement that a single ticket cost one smile and a round-trip ticket one smille and a hand shake.

Suggest Definite Things to Do

A little booklet recently issued by the committee on brotherhood of Philadelphia North Presbytery contains some of the most suggestive ways of work for men which have recently appeared in the literature of the brotherhood. "Cultivated Oats for Men to Sow" is its title, and it is designed along the lines of showing men very definitely how their business ability can be made to serve the church. Information is given under the various occupations and professions. It is set forth, for example, that a painter may use his ability in freshening the signboard of the church. A butcher can make it his business to carve meat at the church social. A salesman can use his art of persuading men in getting new members for various organizations. A physician may teach boys the harm of cigarettes and explain the necessity for care of the body.

One Way of Interesting Children

The Arundel Avenue church, Emporia, Kan., conducts a combination Sunday school and morning preaching service which has been very attractive to the young people of the congregation. The morning worship is spoken of as the children's service. It begins at 10:15 o'clock with a song and prayer, and the graded lessons are used in classes for thirty-five minutes. The pastor takes charge of the service at 11 o'clock, when the classes have returned to their places. The secretary of the school makes his report in connection with any announcements the pastor may have and after the use of the hymnal for responsive Scripture the sermon is begun at 11:15. The service closes in half an hour. The church has eighty-three members and this combination service has enabled the pastor to obtain the hearty support for all phases of church work by both adults and children.

The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty

It is eminently proper for society to protect dumb animals and helpless children against abuse. Is it not equally just for the church to protect its disabled veterans and the dependent widows and orphans of the veterans who have been released from all earthly care, against the cruelty of an old age unprovided for?

You are invited to join the Presbyterian Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Disabled Ministers, their Desolate Widows and Dependent Orphans.

News from the Field of Christian Effort

BEST BENEVOLENCE RECORD IN 10 YEARS

Indiana Shows Encouraging Relation Between Evangelistic Effort and Contributions to Boards—Yandes Fund Will Aid Work.

The church formerly served by Henry Ward Beecher leads all churches of Indiana Synod in benevolent gifts. Its present pastor, Owen D. Odell, D. D., was chosen moderator at the Peru meeting.

It sounds good to hear the statement based on the statistical narrative, "Indiana has in net gains and benevolence the best record in ten years." Why? We cannot give an adequate answer. The report a year ago was discouraging. Dr. Leon P. Marshall, stated clerk, wrote the chairman, "Since the General Assembly has magnified the work of the committee on spiritual life and work, the synod has found it profitable to conjoin its report with that on evangelistic work, and so the synod has been aroused." This may account in part for our gains. All the presbyteries share in this gain.

The Presbytery of Logansport leads the synod with 611 additions on examination and 402 by certificate, making 1,000 additions in this presbytery alone. When the chairman said to the synod, "We will let the Presbytery of Logansport tell why this is the case," some one shouted "Billy Sunday," and immediately several pastors answered, "The additions from the Sunday meetings will not be counted until next spring's reports come in." So we may look again for Logansport Presbytery to lead the entire synod in additions, unless evangelistic fire is greatly in evidence in other presbyteries. However, two great evangelistic campaigns by Evangelist Milford Lyon in Muncie and in Marion (Presbytery of Muncie) may take the lead from Logansport next year. The test should be not only in additions, but also in benevolences and all departments of church work.

Conversions	2,261	2,972
Certificates	1,761	1,943
Restored roll	366	396
Total	4,388	5,311
Increase		923

This 21 per cent gain in members does not show the net gain in synod until we have differences in dismissal, deaths, etc., but it is very nearly the same.

Indianapolis Presbytery leads in largest gifts to home missions with a total of $13,003. The Presbytery of Fort Wayne leads with foreign mission gifts amounting to $15,258. Indianapolis Presbytery exceeded this in 1910. Last year Fort Wayne Presbytery was a close second to Indianapolis Prestery, when comparing its home mission offerings of $9,651 to Indianapolis's foreign gifts of $9,865, but Indianapolis Presbytery exceeded this in 1910, 1911 and 1912.

It is probably the first time in the history of synod that any presbytery has had the distinction of exceeding the Presbytery of Indianapolis in the sum total of gifts to home and foreign missions. Fort Wayne gave nearly $25,000 and Indianapolis Presbytery gave $23,000 to all boards. Fort Wayne Presbytery gave $2,000 in excess of any presbytery in the synod; but in 1912 Indianapolis Presbytery gave over $13,000 in excess of Fort Wayne, and Crawfordsville Presbytery was a very close second to Fort Wayne Presbytery.

Total gifts in the synod for the year were $51,575 to home missions; $43,670 to foreign missions; and the total to all the boards was $126,452—19 per cent increase over the year before and not equaled in ten years. The total in 1903 was $127,016, but Second church, Indianapolis, gave $70,303—over half the amount of the supposed banner year.

This figuring shows decided advance in the synod as a whole. It probably exceeds any year in its entire history, as the increase is largely distributed over the state.

With Rev. W. A. Sunday marshaling the forces in Indianapolis for eight weeks and Evangelists Lyon and Biederwolf in other centers, and with cooperation in every place, the income of Yandes half million fund building evangelistic fires in every home mission field, Indiana ought to lead the entire church in reports of gain to next General Assembly.

Edgar L. Williams.

EVANGELISTS AND THEIR MEETINGS

Crowds Meet Gipsy Preacher — Gipsy Smith, who is now holding meetings in Birmingham, Ala., was met at the railway station on his arrival by a large delegation. He shook hands with the crowd, beginning with the two policemen stationed at the door of the depot.

Three Iowa Meetings—Evangelist C. E. Hillis, of Kahoka, Mo., is in the midst of a tabernacle revival campaign in Yarmouth, Iowa. A specially constructed building has been put up for the meetings.—Special services were recently conducted by Rev. W. G. Oglevee, a former pastor, at Mediapolis, Iowa.—Tabernacle meetings will be held in Albia, Iowa, Nov. 9 to Dec. 14. Union prayer meetings preparatory to these meetings are being held.

Minnesota and Missouri—Evangelistic services at Atkinson, Minn., were recently held under the leadership of Rev. S. A. Blair and the pastor, Rev. W. K. Sherwin.—The Presbyterian and Disciples churches of Rosendale, Mo., will begin a union evangelistic meeting about Nov. 20.

UNIVERSITY HAS TEMPERANCE COURSE

"Social Aspect of Liquor Problem" Title of First Series of Lectures—Installed After Much Opposition by Students.

A recent official bulletin of the University of California announces that a new one-unit credit lecture course on the "Social Aspect of the Liquor Problem" is to be given by the department of education this semester. At this university formerly "beer busts" openly ran their course, and few student functions were complete without an accompaniment of wines and liquors.

A great tribute is paid to the nerve and courage of a small group of college men by this announcement. For years the Temperance Research Club, the local branch of the Intercollegiate Prohibition Association, has worked and struggled to free the university from the impediment of custom. Persistent agitation and education through constant publicity, fight for expression of public sentiment, volunteer study classes and public programs have been the methods of action that have wrought the results.

Social ostracism, faculty disapproval, open ridicule, all these have been fought and overcome until the changed sentiment of the student body has at last been officially recognized by the university in the installation of a "dry" course.

The first lecture was attended by 152 and the second by 255 persons, most of whom were students, the average for the first five being close to the 200 mark. The future influence of the course can hardly be estimated, for, aside from its probable continuance in the University of California, the initiation of such study there means much in the efforts of the Intercollegiate Prohibition Association to secure similar study in all the colleges and universities of the United States.

LAYMEN'S SECRETARY FOR IOWA

The Laymen's Missionary Movement for Iowa has been organized. Wilbur L. Clapp has been chosen executive secretary and headquarters have been established at Waterloo. Mr. Clapp has had experience in this work, having successfully organized several of the larger laymen's missionary conventions of the Middle West. During this year Mr. Clapp will be virtually acting as a servant of the various denominational boards represented in Iowa. The plan of the united missionary campaign culminating in an every-member canvass for benevolences in March, 1914, has been indorsed by most of the leading denominations and the Laymen's Missionary Movement has been asked to assist in carrying out the plan. Mr. Clapp is giving himself to this work and will be glad to respond to calls from committees or churches where he can be of assistance.

Soap, like books, should be chosen with discretion. Both are capable of infinite harm.

Women Assail Mormon Church

The Illinois W. C. T. U. in session recently at Galesburg adopted a resolution approving the investigation by the national government into the commercial monopoly of the Mormon hierarchy and pledging themselves as individuals to rid their communities of the literature of the Mormon Church. It is reported that a speech by Miss Helen E. Hood, state president, denouncing the polygamous practices of the Mormon Church aroused considerable discussion and opposition among the business men of Salt Lake City.

Barbers Ask for Day of Rest

The annual convention of the Illinois journeymen barbers recently in session at Decatur adopted a resolution asking the assistance of the Illinois Federation of Labor to bring about the enactment of a law compelling barber shops to close on Sundays. It is said that in Chicago most barbers work every Sunday until 6:30 p. m. A Sunday closing law was declared unconstitutional by the state supreme court in 1895.

UNITED CHURCHES ROUT VICE DISTRICT

Mass Meetings Hear Evils of Legalized System in Dallas and Public Officials Are Stirred to Action—Census Fruitful.

DALLAS—For thirty days the Council of Churches has had a busy time with the fight on the "reservation." Three months ago it invited before it the police commissioner and discussed with him the abolition of the district set aside by the city commission for vice. He refused to abolish it. The council gave him and the city notice that the first work of the churches this autumn would be a battle royal on legalized vice. That battle has stirred the city. It began with the announcement of three great mass meetings. At the first, strong speakers assailed the "reservation" as immoral. At the second others struck hard at the failure of protected vice to solve the difficulties. At the third the illegality of segregation was pounded into the minds of the multitude. Each afternoon's meeting grew in interest. They were not attacks on men but measures. They were mighty classes in a study of an ancient evil and the best way of dealing with it. Policemen, sheriffs, city commissioners, judges of the courts, and foremost citizens were present. The papers opened their columns. Individual churches and clubs debated the question. In the past thirty days the "reservation" idea has been beaten. The county attorney has begun to act. A new grand jury has been sworn in to to take the place of one that defended the vice district. The two criminal judges united in a charge to the jury to put the "reservation" away. And now comes the news that on Nov. 3 the institution that has existed by city enactment must go. The police commissioner has not yet fully surrendered. He takes the defeat of his ideas with poor grace, but will support the improved order. The Dallas News came out with a ringing editorial in favor of the enforcement of the law.

Plan Home to Aid Women—The same discovery has been made here as elsewhere, that there is a close connection between all vices. Rent usury, the liquor business, white slavery, and sodden indifference to property, virtue, life, are aligned for their self-protection. The other discovery is the power of truth to hunt out and shame men into doing their duty when every selfish interest pulls in the direction of the let-well-enough-alone policy. The united Christian forces of the city are planning a "Friendly Hand House for Women" as a monument to this fight, and as as a solvent of many difficulties in the future. Should the matter be an accomplished fact it will be offered the city as a home for its police matron, under possibly another name, as a sort of a way station to better things for women who are friendless.

Has Live Brotherhood—Exposition Park church under the leadership of its new pastor, Rev. George Fulcher, has one of the livest brotherhoods in the synod.

New Mission Building—Presbyterians of both assemblies are united still in the City Mission. The new superintendent, Rev. George W. Sheffer, is on the field. The contract has been let for a $5,000 building that will house the kindergarten and night classes. It will be ready before the first of the year.

Get Many Names in Census—A religious census of Dallas participated in by Jews, Catholics and Protestants has put over 114,000 names in the possession of the committee having the matter in charge. These, with their religious preference, were obtained by 4,000 workers, representing all churches, who gave two hours to the movement Oct. 8. There will be no idlers among the pastors if they husband the results. J. Frank Smith.

CHURCHES BUILT AND BURNED

Fire from Lightning — Lightning struck the church at Highland, Kan., recently and caused fire which destroyed the building, causing a loss of $7,000. There was insurance amounting to $5,500.

New Pipe Organs—A new pipe organ was recently dedicated in Fulton, Ill., church. Among other recent improvements to the field has been a new parsonage. Rev. Kenneth J. McAulay is pastor.—Green Ridge church, Scranton, Pa., has just completed the installation of a new pipe organ.

Growth Requires Chapel—A chaped will soon be built to accommodate the growing work at Modena, near Mortonville, Pa. As a result of recent special services many were received into Doe Run church. An Endeavor society of forty members has been organized. Cottage prayer meetings are largely attended.

Celebrate Completion of New Rooms—First church, Iowa City, Iowa, celebrated the completion of an addition with a house warming Sept. 25 under the auspices of the brotherhood. The pastor, Dr. D. W. Wylie, conducted the simple dedicatory service. The total improvements cost $8,000 and include an office for the pastor, the university pastor, and various classrooms.

Recent Dedications — The pastor, Dr. C. E. Kircher, preached the dedicatory sermon at the opening of the new church at Ellsworth, Kan. At the meeting in the afternoon addresses were made by pastors: J. R. Tercy, A. T. Aller and A. N. Smith.—The Tunkhannock, Pa., church, Rev. Fred B. Newman, pastor, was reopened Oct. 12 after having been closed some time for repairs and improvements. Neighboring congregations joined in the evening service.

SUNDAY CLOSING MEANS GAIN

As an example of the gain there has been to churches and individuals through the closing of postoffices on Sunday Rev. James P. Hutchinson, general secretary of the Middle West district of the Lord's Day Alliance, reports that a man stopped him in Pueblo, Colo., and told him that following the closing of postoffice he was enabled to go to church and that he was made teacher of a Sunday school class of thirteen. Personal effort among business men in cities of the West where the Sabbath has not before been observed has resulted in many cases in an agreement to close stores on Sunday. In one small town where the farmers had been in the habit of driving in with produce on the Sabbath all of the stores agreed to receive nothing on that day. In the same manner the campaign against Sunday sports has been prosecuted by quiet personal work.

EXTEND AID TO FOUR MISSIONS

TACOMA—The Presbyterian Union reports a good year's work. Elder Fred Beebe of First church was elected president and L. J. Muschek of Sprague Memorial church was elected trustee and treasurer. The work of the union is to aid in financing missions in the city. At present there are four.—A movement is on foot for enlarging Calvary church.—Whitworth College opened with a large attendance. Many of the old students returned. The convocation address was given by W. A. Major, D. D., of Seattle. O. T. M.

WILL HELP BUILD TWO NEW CHURCHES

Presbytery to Assist St. Louis Congregations—Observe Birthday Anniversary of Founder of Markham Memorial Church.

ST. LOUIS—Two new Presbyterian churches are to be completed as soon as possible. North church, which has worshiped in a handsome chapel for some years, will be assisted by presbytery to complete its auditorium. McCausland Avenue church, R. S. Foreman, D. D., pastor, will also be assisted in the construction of an entire building. Presbytery appointed as a building committee Dr. J. L. Roemer, Dr. F. W. Russell, Rev. Frank H. Magill.

Presbyterial Action—At the October meeting of presbytery Rev. Frank H. Magill was appointed official representative of presbytery on the committee on location of religious enterprises, to act with the Church Federation.—D. V. Blayney, who has been assistant to Dr. F. W. Russell of West church, has been taken under the care of presbytery.

Observe Founder's Birthday—Oct. 12 marked the eighty-seventh anniversary of the birth of William H. Markham, who died in 1901. Mr. Markham founded and for a number of years conducted the Soulard Market mission. This mission became Markham Memorial church soon after the cyclone of 1896. For the past seven years anniversary services have been held in Markham church in memory of the founder. At the evening service there were thirty-three persons present who remembered Mr. Markham and a number gave testimonies. The principal address was given by A. H. Frederick, the only surviving member of the committee which erected the present building. Letters were also read from former members of the old mission.

New Head for Boyle Center—Rev. Edward W. McClusky, Anna, Ill., has been appointed head of Boyle Memorial Center to succeed Rev. W. Clyde Smith. Boyle Center is a presbyterial institution in the heart of the downtown district. Mr. McClusky was pastor of Curby Memorial church in this city for about seven years before going to Anna. For the past three years he has been instructor in Union Academy and pastor at Anna.

Dr. Reherd May Go to Salt Lake City

The presidency of Westminster College, Salt Lake City, has been offered to Dr. H. W. Reherd, pastor of First church, Waterloo, Iowa, well known on account of his missionary addresses. Dr. Reherd recently visited Salt Lake City but has not announced his decision as to the offer.

John R. Mott and Silas McBee sailed Oct. 15 to attend the annual session of the Edinburgh Continuation Committee, which meets this fall in Holland. Dr. Arthur J. Brown and others will sail for the same meeting later.

Stomach, Nerves and Thinker Restored by Grape-Nuts Food

The number of persons whose ailments were such that no other food could be retained at all, is large and reports are on the increase.

"For twelve years I suffered from dyspepsia, finding no food that did not distress me," writes a Wisconsin lady. "I was reduced from 145 to ninety pounds, gradually growing weaker until I could leave my bed only a short while at a time, and became unable to speak aloud.

"Three years ago I was attracted by an article on Grape-Nuts and decided to try it.

"My stomach was so weak I could not take cream, but I used Grape-Nuts with milk and lime water. It helped me from the first, building up my system in a manner most astonishing to the friends who had thought my recovery impossible.

"Soon I was able to take Grape-Nuts and cream for breakfast and lunch at night, with an egg and Grape-Nuts for dinner.

"I am now able to eat fruit, meat and nearly all vegetables for dinner, but fondly continue Grape-Nuts for breakfast and supper.

"At the time of beginning Grape-Nuts I could scarcely speak a sentence without changing words around or 'talking crooked' in some way, but I have become so strengthened that I no longer have that trouble." Name given by Postum Company, Battle Creek, Mich.

"There's a reason," and it is explained in the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in packages.

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true and full of human interest.

SAYS TEACHER IS MORE IMPORTANT

Preacher Not Above the Instructor, Declares Dr. Thompson—W. H. Ridgway Heads Laymen's Evangelistic Association.

PHILADELPHIA—The Presbyterian Ministers' Social Union held its first fall meeting and luncheon in the Belvue-Stratford. Professor Loetscher of Princeton Seminary presided and presented Dr. Robert Ellis Thompson, president of the boys' central high school. Dr. Thompson, although a well known and popular Presbyterian preacher, has for forty-five years been a teacher in the university and high school. In his address he magnified the function of the teacher and claimed for him preeminence in apostolic days and in ages since over the preacher. More abundant fruit he felt followed teaching than preaching and he pleaded for more of it today, believing that the church must depend for its growth and stability upon the instruction given its young men and women. He strongly recommended the formation of classes for the study of the doctrines of the church instead of Scripture passages, insisting that the youth of the church should be able to defend the truth for which their church stands. The shorter catechism he took exception to as being too wholly impersonal. Finally he scored Philadelphia churches for sponging on the rest of the country for their ministers. They supply but few of them themselves, he declared.

Laymen Plan Evangelism—The Laymen's Evangelistic Association of Chester Presbytery held its annual luncheon recently at the Union League and talked of the work of the past and the future and how much was owed to their late leaders, John H. Converse and John H. Dinger. Among those who spoke were W. H. Ridgway and Charles L. Huston of Coatesville, Alba B. Johnson of Rosemont, Philip E. Howard of Swarthmore, John P. McClellan of Parkesburg, Presbyterial Evangelist Henry N. Faulconer and Rev. W. R. Laird of West Chester and Dr. Francis S. Downs of Baltimore. William H. Ridgway was elected president, George F. Craig vice president, J. L. Twaddell secretary, and J. H. Jefferis treasurer.

How Churches Are Growing—The rally to all services, including prayer meeting and Bible school, of Woodland church was never quite so quick and enthusiastic as this fall. The letter of the pastor, Rev. James R. Swain, to the members brought out the largest attendance to the communion services ever had. The Bible school has had a substantial increase.—The membership of Wissahickon church is now the largest in its history. The attendance at the last communion was the largest in five years of Rev. Elliot Field's pastorate.—The Narbeth church is prospering under the pastorate of Rev. John Van Ness. The Rally Day exercises of the Sunday school brought the largest attendance in its history.

Personal Notes—Dr. J. Beveridge Lee of St. Paul has been chosen by Philadelphia Presbytery as its representative on the synodical committee of home missions.—Dr. Mervin W. Eckels, pastor emeritus of Arch Street church, who has for some months been recuperating at a sanitarium, officiated at the recent communion, it being the twentieth anniversary of his first communion.—To a late elder of the church, Charles P. Turner, M. D., a splendid organ was recently dedicated in the state College church of Pennsylvania.—Dr. J. B. Reeve has recently been honored with a reception by members of the Lombard Street Central church, of which he was the pastor for nearly fifty years.—Dr. and Mrs. E. M. Wherry stopped a few days in the city on their way to New York, whence they sailed on their return voyage to India. Forty-six years ago they first went out as missionaries of the Presbyterian Foreign Board. Three others went out with them and all are still living.

Coming Meetings—Dan Crawford, the African missionary, is filling a number of engagements hereabouts. He will address the Presbyterian Social Union Oct. 27, will give an illustrated lecture in Woodland church Oct. 30 and will speak in Calvary church at 11 a. m. Tuesday, Oct. 28, also on the morning of Nov. 2 in Bryn Mawr church and in the evening at Bryn Mawr College.—Dr. G. A. Johnston Ross will address the Philadelphia Alumni Club of Union Theological Seminary at Hotel Walton Oct. 27 on "The Religious Situation of the Present Day."

Honor Dr. Hunter—At the thirtieth anniversary celebration of the pastorate of Dr. Robert Hunter over Union Tabernacle the Philadelphia Presbytery, of which he is stated clerk, presented him with a fitting testimonial of appreciation. Addresses were made by Doctors Davies, Scott, Bolton, Allen and Hyndman.

Mr. Wanamaker Speaks—John Wanamaker, who was a member of Chambers church when he started Bethany Sunday school, spoke at the recent rally of the Chambers-Wylie Sunday school.

An Addition to History — Thirteenth church, whose identity along with the Fourteenth seemed to have become entirely unknown to the church, has been discovered to have been in existence only from 1836 to 1843 and to have been disbanded over sixty years ago. It had but one pastor, Rev. Charles Williamson, and was located in the southwestern section of the city on Lombard street. The Fourteenth was identical with the Second African and disbanded about 1861 or 1862.

BEST NEWS OF THE WEEK

Holds Sunday School Record?—Miss Elizabeth Farrand, who recently resigned from the superintendency of the Sunday school in Fourth church, Trenton, holds the record for length of service, as far as known, as it is said she has served continuously since 1870.

Father Has His Turn—The fathers of Freeport, Ill., Second church had a day all to themselves Oct. 12, when appropriate services were conducted under the auspices of the Men's Bible class of the church. The pastor, Rev. Marion Humphreys, made an address and the church was decorated for the occasion. Each person attending was presented with a red rose as a symbol of fathers' day.

Studies Conditions on Iron Range — Charts showing the religious affiliations and nationality of the foreign population in the great mining district of Northern Minnesota were recently shown at a meeting of Duluth Presbytery at Hibbing. Rev. W. J. Bell, working under the Home Board, has been making an investigation of the opportunity there may be among the iron miners for religious meetings.

Discovered After Fifteen Years—A church with a good building and a membership of thirty-four was recently discovered in Menominee county, Michigan, six miles from a railway station, which for the past fifteen years had been awaiting to be organized into a Presbyterian church. It is composed of Belgians who speak French and the lay leaders who have been providing services have not come in contact with other churches until recently.

Connecticut Building Remodeled—Services incident to the reopening of First church, Hartford, Conn., Dr. J. F. Johnstone pastor, were held recently. Mrs. J. S. Kennedy contributed $6,000 to the work of remodeling the church property and cancellation of debt. The offer was made conditional upon the raising by the congregation of an equal amount. As plans progressed it became evident that the money available would not cover improvements planned and Mr. and Mrs. J. T. Manson of New Haven assisted in the work of redecoration. New carpets and electric fixtures were installed and the interior of the building rearranged at a total cost of $22,000. A year ago the brotherhood of the church remodeled the basement and furnished it as a reading room for the community.

MAKE QUARTERS FOUR TIMES AS LARGE

Christian Industrial League Enlarges South Side Branch—Olivet Plans Interesting Program—Men to Confer on Work.

CHICAGO—The rapid growth of the Chicago Industrial League has demanded larger quarters at nearly all of its centers of operations. The first of what is hoped to be a number of moves toward better accommodations has been the recent engagement to purchase a house and lot at 6737 Wentworth avenue for the work of the South side. Barns and sheds will be erected for the wagons and sorting of material. This will increase by four the space available in that part of the city for work for men who are homeless. The employment feature of the league's activities is growing, a number of large employers offering to cooperate by giving work to men recommended by Rev. G. A. Kilbey, the manager.

Study Plans to Reach Men—A conference of the men of Chicago Presbytery will be held next Monday under presbyterial auspices. The morning session at Assembly hall will consist of a pastors' conference with symposium on difficulties of reaching city men. In the afternoon at the Church of the Covenant men will recount definite work done in various local churches and how it was accomplished. Supper will be served to those who notify Dr. Bryan by Friday. There will be several talks at the table by workers of other denominations on their work with men. The evening session will include short talks by Rev. William Evans, Charles S. Holt, Rev. Henry Hepburn, Dr. E. P. Hill and Moderator Stone. This is said to be the most comprehensive program ever outlined for work among men of this city.

Only Clinic of Its Sort—There has been established at Jefferson Park church a free osteopathic clinic on Monday and Friday afternoons which gives promise to be one of the most interesting and helpful features of the important work being done there by the pastor, Rev. F. J. Martin. This is said to be the only clinic of the kind in connection with a church in the United States.

Fathers Dine with Sons—There were over eighty men and boys at a recent dinner at River Forest church when the fathers entertained the sons of the congregation. A brotherhood was organized. This is a part of the work being done in local churches by Dr. F. M. Fox.

Teach Women to Make Own Hats—One of the interesting developments of the institutional work being done under Rev. F. T. Barry at Emerson Street church, Evanston, is the recent organization of a class in millinery. Thirty women of the neighborhood are given regular instruction by a trained teacher in the art of hatmaking.

Y. W. C. A. Workers Meet—Women interested in the Y. W. C. A. from Illinois, Indiana, Michigan and Wisconsin met in Chicago last week to discuss phases of work in local communities. The conference was under the direction of the central field committee of the national board and was attended by Miss Grace Dodge of New York and other national leaders.

Buena Memorial to Build—Committees have been appointed looking to the erection of a $125,000 plant for Buena Memorial church, Rev. Henry Hepburn pastor. It is hoped that work can begin in the spring. The Bible school and church are both overcrowded. The new building will be on the site of the present one, which may be used as part of the new plant.

Use Many Talking Machines—Extensive use of talking machines is being made by the Y. M. C. A. this fall in connection with shop meetings. Songs by prominent evangelists are being used as a special attraction and music is provided for singing by the men.

Plan for Home Mission Week—Requests for eighteen programs for home mission week have been received from as many churches by Rev. W. Clyde Smith of the Church Extension Board. The prospects are that the work among foreigners in this city will be widely presented to the churches Nov. 16-23.

From One to Eleven Buildings—The twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the mission which has grown into Olivet Institute will be celebrated Oct. 30 to Nov. 2. During the quarter century the institution has spread over eleven buildings and enlists in nine departments 7,500 persons. Among the features of the program will be the return of Dr. W. H. Hormal of Wichita, Kan., one of the first ministers of Olivet and one of the originators of the institutional work. Women connected with Olivet will have a special service Thursday, Oct. 30. In the evening representatives of presbytery are expected. Friday representatives of other settlements of the city will participate in services, Saturday will be community night and on Sunday all former members of Olivet's many departments will be expected at the anniversary services of the various organizations.

Will Advertise Churches—Action was taken at the annual meeting of the Church Federation recently looking to advertising in daily papers of the service which churches of this city offer citizens. The plan doubtless will be that suggested by the publicity commission of the Men and Religion Movement, which has been in effect several years in Philadelphia, Baltimore and other cities. Officers elected are: President, T. E. D. Bradley; first vice president, Myron R. McKinnon; second vice president, Marquis Eaton; recording secretary, Rev. M. P. Boynton; treasurer, Henry S. Henschen; executive secretary, Dr. W. B. Millard.

Will Organize Boy Scouts—Men of Normal Park church are enlarging their interest in the boys of the congregation and will organize a Boy Scout troop.

"The Pastor of Today;" Dr. Wood—Dr. Charles Wood, pastor of the Church of the Covenant, Washington, D. C., is to deliver a course of lectures on "The Pastor of Today" in the chapel of McCormick Theological Seminary at 7 p. m. Monday, Oct. 27, Wednesday, Oct. 29, and Thursday, Oct. 30. Dr. Wood has had a remarkably serviceable ministry in Buffalo, Albany, Philadelphia and Washington. These lectures are open to all who desire to attend them.

Will Make Survey of Parish—South Park church, in cooperation with the students at the Presbyterian Training School, has made arrangements to make a complete canvass of its parish in order to plan more intelligently for future work.

STUDENTS ORGANIZE SUNDAY SCHOOLS

Collegians Run Race Gathering Pupils in Summer—Prizes for Hardest Workers—Get 1,231 People to Study Bible.

Jamestown is the youngest college of the Presbyterian Church, but is giving evidence of being a live wire in effective Christian service. Every student at the close of the college year last June had professed Christianity, and under the inspiration of a resident lawyer, John Knauf, many of them determined to put their faith into practical service in their local communities. The chief service was along the line of Sunday school work. They formed themselves into a Sunday school mission band, and when college opened in September they reported results of the summer campaign.

Through their efforts 1,231 pupils were gathered into various Sunday schools in North Dakota. Scores of new schools were organized. One was formed in a little town where there was only a Lutheran church. The student was a Presbyterian, but he asked the Lutheran minister, living in an adjoining town, if he might use the church for a Sunday school. He argued that scores of children and older people were entirely bereft of such privileges. The minister consented upon condition that study helps were used of his denomination. This was readily agreed upon. In three weeks he had a school organized with nearly 100 pupils. Another was organized in a Norwegian Lutheran church, a number in country districts and some interdenominational schools.

To have gathered such a splendid number into Sunday schools does not begin to represent the service rendered. It caused people everywhere to wonder and ask what it meant that students should come home and use their vacations in inspiring youths and others to get together for the study of God's word.

The following students secured the largest number of Sunday school pupils and received prizes: William Landis, Wolford, N. D., secured 176, cash prize of $100; Phebe Warne, Jamestown, 167, prize $75; Eleanor Riggin, Minnewaukon, 134, prize $50; Neva Duncan, Sharon, 102, prize $25. Miss Clara Wiermuller received honorable mention. She organized two schools, but felt that others needed the prizes more than she did, so refused to obtain full certification for all the scholars she obtained. One student touched the heart of a young man who was studying law at the state university and caused him to decide to study for the gospel ministry. It is proposed to make this Sunday school mission band a permanent feature for vacation work among the students of the college. It is hoped that someone will endow the movement, so that annually hereafter students may spend the vacation in this work and be rewarded for their services by annual prizes.

The college has opened a chair of Bible and Sunday school methods under the direction of William E. Roe, D. D.

LOOK OUT FOR THIS MAN

I have been informed that a man calling himself Rev. Irvine Belle has been traveling in portions of the North representing himself to be a member of Knoxville Presbytery of the Southern Presbyterian Church, engaged in mountain mission work, and is receiving money for this cause. I desire to state that there is no such minister connected with the Presbytery of Knoxville nor with the Southern Presbyterian Church.

JOHN H. HERNDON, Stated Clerk.
Knoxville Presbytery, Cleveland, Tenn.

Dr. John Balcom Shaw has just been elected a trustee of Occidental College.

Dr. Thomas F. Day, formerly professor in San Francisco Seminary, has accepted the chair of Bible study in Olivet College, Mich.

This is a new church built at Thurston, Neb., recently, following the stimulus of two summers' work by a theological student of

Dubuque German College and Seminary

There are in the Middle West a large number of Protestant Bohemian churches. From many of the families of these congregations have come young men to study for the ministry at our institution. They receive a college education and are taught to preach in their own tongue, in English and in German, and are thus able to reach a large class of people anxious for spiritual leadership.

The enrollment at Dubuque this fall brings increased demands upon the institution and proves again the enlarged place which the college and seminary is taking in its endeavor to help solve on a Christian basis the American immigration problem.

The officers of the school will be glad to furnish you with additional information. Address Dubuque German College and Seminary, C. M. Steffens, D.D., President, Dubuque, Iowa.

Temperance Hosts Invade Brooklyn—Emphasis on Religion Brings Greatest Response at Labor Temple, Where Crowd Grows.

NEW YORK—Beginning Oct. 23 delegates from all over the world will assemble in Brooklyn for the triennial convention of the World's Women's Christian Temperance Union. The conference will last until Oct. 28. The general sessions are to be held at the Academy of Music, and the executive meetings at Hotel Bossert. This evening a reception to the officers and delegates will take place at Hotel Astor, Manhattan. On Friday reports from the different secretaries will be received. Sunday morning and evening many of the delegates will speak from Brooklyn pulpits. In the afternoon a mass meeting will be held at the Academy of Music, where Congressman Hobson will be the principal speaker. Monday afternoon a symposium on woman suffrage will be the feature. In the evening 100 one-minute speeches will be made by members of the convention representing thirty nations. After the adjournment of the world's convention, the National Women's Christian Temperance Union convention will open at Asbury Park, N. J., Oct. 29 to Nov. 6.

Audiences Double at Labor Temple—A year ago the average attendance at Sunday night service at Labor Temple was 300. This fall the Sunday night audiences average 600. A similar proportion of increase is observed in practically all of the weekly program of the church. The so-called religious forum which was addressed on Friday nights last year by different speakers on a wide variety of topics has this year been turned into a devotional meeting where Dr. Day, the pastor, is conducting a series of Bible studies. The attendance is running about 250, a hundred per cent increase over a year ago. On Saturday evenings Dr. Day is delivering a course of "citizenship studies," instructing the immigrants of the Labor Temple neighborhood in American ideals. After eighteen months' experience Dr. Day's verdict concerning the work of the Labor Temple is: "The more religious emphasis we put on our effort the better it takes hold of the people."

Board Spends $47,000 in City—The annual report of the home mission committee of New York Presbytery will show that the Home Board disburses within the bounds of presbytery $47,000. This is spent on fourteen congregations; $17,000 goes to Labor Temple, $14,000 to the six congregations incorporated in the American parish. Except at Labor Temple, practically all of this money is spent for immigrant work, and even Labor Temple's activities touch a much larger proportion of immigrants than of native born. Of course New York churches give to the board many thousand dollars in excess of what the board spends in New York. The whole cost of Labor Temple is now carried by private gifts contributed for that particular purpose. This is aside from the work of the church extension committee in aiding English-speaking congregations.

Personal Mention—The Presbyterian hospital loses this month the services of Frederick B. Marlock, who for nine years has been chief clerk and assistant treasurer. He becomes superintendent of the Fowler hospital.—Oct. 27 Dr. David G. Wylie of Scotch church will address the Ministers' Association.—Caleb H. Hodges, assistant secretary of the city's evangelistic committee, is to devote three months this winter to extension work for the Brotherhood of Andrew and Philip in the city.—Dr. Wilbur F. Crafts, secretary of the International Reform Bureau, speaking before the Presbyterian ministers Oct. 12, emphasized the gains which temperance is making in Germany and Great Britain.

Worship in New Auditorium—Last Sunday West End congregation worshiped in its new auditorium for the first time. The building is not yet finished, but the auditorium is completed. The new structure has been built around the old auditorium and is far larger and more commodious in every way than the original building. The cost will be about $100,000. During the past months Dr. Keigwin and his people have been holding services in Hope Baptist church near by.

New Rochelle Church Celebrates—North Avenue church, New Rochelle, suburban to New York, is celebrating its twenty-third anniversary this week. Special anniversary announcements have been sent out to members and friends of the congregation. The pastor is Rev. Robert Gordon McGregor.

Brooklyn News Notes—The first of four rallies during the winter for the Protestant Sunday schools of Long Island city was held last Sunday at the Astoria church, Dr. David Wills, Jr., pastor. The workers in charge of the rallies are endeavoring to arouse enthusiasm for a local Sunday school parade to be held next June.—The Brooklyn committee on Christian fundamentals held its first conference Oct. 12 in the Spenser Memorial church. The speaker was William Phillips Hall, president of the American Tract Society.—Central church, Huntington, last week had the pleasure of hearing its one-time pastor, Rev. Theodore L. Wynkoop, speak on missions in India.

Y. M. C. A. Will Hold Dinner—Nov. 6 the international committee of the Y. M. C. A. will hold its annual dinner at the Waldorf-Astoria. Reports will be received from the secretaries, and several addresses will be made. It is expected that nearly a thousand men will be present.

Priest Gets Excited Over a Speech—At the patriotic celebration with which Franklin Avenue Italian church celebrated "Citizens' Day" last week, one of the speakers was a former police inspector, Miles O'Reilly. Mr. O'Reilly is a civil war veteran and for many years has been giving talks to schools and churches on reverence for the flag. But Mr. O'Reilly is a Catholic and when Mgr. Thomas Taaffe of St. Patrick's church, Brooklyn, heard of the ex-policeman's speech in a Protestant church he accused Mr. O'Reilly of lending his aid to a church for proselytizing. The Roman priest said in his accusatory sermon that Mr. O'Reilly was invited by Franklin church because the members "wanted their work sanctioned by having a Catholic speak from their platform. His presence was desired only to sanction the soul-stealing that goes on in that place." This charge is indignantly denied by Mr. O'Reilly, who says that as a matter of fact he was put upon the program by Mrs. Margaret Keiller, who is a member of the Woman's Relief Corps and who was principally instrumental in arranging for the celebration.

Germans Celebrate Jubilee—First German Presbyterian church of East Williamsburg celebrated its jubilee last week with special services every night. Sunday afternoon addresses were made by Dr. John H. Kerr, pastor of Arlington Avenue church and moderator of Brooklyn Presbytery, and by Dr. J. D. Burrell, pastor of Classon Avenue church. Dr. Arnold W. Fismer of Bloomfield Seminary preached a German sermon also. At the Sunday afternoon service the pastor, Rev. John Dietz, announced that with the accessions that day the membership of the church had reached the 500 mark.

There are 211 Presbyterian churches and missions among European and Asiatic immigrants in which their national tongues are used.

SEMINARY WANTS TO RAISE $300,000

Six-Day Campaign by Laymen to Start—Pittsburg Presbytery Conducts Much Important Business at Its Meeting.

PITTSBURG—Friends of Western Theological Seminary will launch a campaign to raise $300,000 to provide a new administration building and needed endowment Friday, Oct. 24. Already a committee of the strongest laymen in the city has been organized and an office opened in the People's National Bank building. The campaign will last only six days and will consist of a personal canvass by this committee of laymen. At a dinner Oct. 13 Dr. James A. Kelso, president of the seminary, made an appeal to the alumni to support the movement by furnishing names of men and women to be interviewed. The seminary reports the largest number of students enrolled in fifteen years.

Many New Pastors—The October meeting of presbytery was held in South Side church Oct. 14. Five pastoral relations were dissolved: Rev. C. W. Wykoff, Bethel church; Rev. C. G. Jordan, Second Wilkinsburg; Rev. John E. Fulton, Donora church; Rev. M. H. Sewell, Arlington Heights church; Rev. D. C. Schnebley, Central church. Four calls were ratified and arrangements made for the installation of Dr. Hugh T. Kerr, Shady Side church, Oct. 16, Rev. P. J. Slonaker, McKinley Park church, Oct. 27, Rev. R. L. Biddle, Mount Pisgah church, Nov. 11, and Rev. H. C. Curry, West Elizabeth, Elrama and Olivet churches. The united mission committee, composed of the chairmen of all the standing committees of presbytery, which was disbanded last spring, was reorganized to act in conjunction with the executive commission in carrying out the every-member canvass in March, 1914.

Rearrange Work for Men — Presbytery has adopted the recommendation of the Assembly with regard to work among men, disbanded the brotherhood council and turned the work over to presbytery's committee on work for men. The committee on education reported thirty-four students preparing for the ministry under care of presbytery. Fifteen of these were added during the past year. Presbytery continued in session until evening and installed Rev. Matthew B. Holderby pastor of South Side church.

Plan Conferences—Blairsville Presbytery under the leadership of Rev. J. H. Jolly, presbyterial missionary, has planned a series of conferences for devotion and prayer in different sections of the presbytery, beginning Oct. 14, and effort will be made to reach all of the churches. Rev. R. R. Hall and R. H. Lewis have begun an evangelistic campaign in McKees Rocks. All of the Protestant churches in the community have united in the movement. P. W. Snyder.

SAYS IT'S TOO SOON FOR PROHIBITION

California Anti-Saloon Leaders Oppose Constitutional Amendment Now—Los Angeles Endeavorers Name Dr. Shaw President.

LOS ANGELES—In an open letter to all ministers and church people, Rev. Ervin S. Chapman, superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of Southern California, urges active opposition to an initiative campaign for the adoption of constitutional prohibition in 1914. The league is contemplating local campaigns at Redondo Beach and at Anaheim. Ventura has recently voted "dry" and many other campaigns under the initiative provisions of city charters and state laws are being passed. Temperance sentiment is growing very rapidly, but leaders of the Anti-Saloon League believe that a campaign for constitutional amendment at this time would not only fail, but would result in injury to the cause.

Elect Dr. Shaw President—The annual convention of the Los Angeles City Christian Endeavor Union in First Christian church closed its session with the installation of officers for the year: President, Dr. John Balcom Shaw, pastor of Immanuel church; first vice president, H. Francis Mexfield; second vice president, Charles Culver; secretary, Miss Mary St. Clair; treasurer, Arthur Watts; pastoral counselor, Rev. Edward Campbell, pastor of First church. The senior society of Calvary church was awarded a silk banner for having the largest percentage of its membership at the convention.

County Endeavorers Meet—The twenty-fourth annual convention of the Orange County Christian Endeavor Union met in a three-day session in Anaheim church recently. An interesting feature of the convention was the presentation of the floating work, in which thrilling tales of work among sailors were told. Hospital work also had a prominent place on the program. The Endeavorers of Southern California are supporting a chaplain at Los Angeles county hospital and have a chapel on the grounds of this institution dedicated to this work.

Give Mission Pageant—An elaborate missionary pageant, entitled "The Torch Bearers," was presented by 100 young people in connection with the annual meeting of the Pacific branch of the Women's Foreign Missionary Society at First M. E. church recently. Seven different churches were represented in the cast and the native costumes of the various mission fields were seen. A special feature of the pageant was the singing of the song, "He Healeth All," in five languages by a chorus choir.

KANSAS SYNOD AT EMPORIA COLLEGE

Four Hundred Men Gather at Banquet Addressed by Assembly's Moderator and Other Visitors—Degree of LL. D. for Dr. Stone.

Sodden skies and a cool breeze following a period of charming days put no damper upon the enthusiasm of fully 400 men, members of synod, visitors and residents of Emporia, Kan., who gathered for a midday meal at the College of Emporia Oct. 16. The bountiful dinner was prepared by the ladies of First church and served by students of the college. President Henry Coe Culbertson presided and addresses were made by William Allen White, Moderator John Timothy Stone and Dr. William Hiram Foulkes. Dr. William Foulkes of Kansas City, as chairman of the board of trustees, conferred the degree of LL. D. upon Dr. Stone in behalf of the college.

In connection with the proceedings, subscriptions of $13,000 and two farms of 320 acres were received by the college, which needs $150,000 for its forward work. Synod in its current meeting decided to concentrate its support upon Emporia. Highland College was made independent of church relationship, with a self-perpetuating board of trustees. Oswego College is to be under care of Neosho Presbytery, whose congregational offerings will, however, go to the synodical college.

R. A. Kirk, vice president of the board of trustees of the Macalester College, St. Paul, Minn., died Oct. 5 in the seventy-sixth year of his age. He was a prominent member of House of Hope church.

CHINA CAMPAIGN BRINGS INFORMATION

Series of National Conventions Attracts Interest—Many Special Speakers Recently at Indianapolis—Church Federation at Work.

INDIANAPOLIS—The city is passing through a series of national conventions which have a certain relation to the problems of the church. Among them is the Prison Reform Association, which was attended by eight governors and whose delegates occupied many of the city pulpits on Sabbath. The emphasis placed upon more humane methods of management showed the penetration of the spirit of the Christ into a formerly neglected stratum of society. The China emergency campaign this week is bringing new light to many friends of that work. Next week the gathering of 3,000 Methodist men will be the important feature.

Recent Special Speakers — Endeavorers of the city recently heard Daniel A. Poling, national superintendent of good citizenship, of Columbus, Ohio. The prominent speaker at the Marion county Sunday school convention, which always has statewide significance, was John I. Alexander of New York, a specialist on several phases of pedagogics. Hector Fuller, for several years a newspaper correspondent in China, addressed Boy Scouts of the city at Hotel Severin upon his "impressions."

Sunday Schools Organize Orchestras—Several of the Sabbath schools have started their work with orchestras, talent for which is found within the parish; among them Tabernacle and Seventh. At the former on Rally Day, Mrs. Mary Woods made a report on the late world's Sunday school convention. Rev. E. W. Clippinger of this church has been confined to his home because of illness.—Elder A. J. Diddle of Memorial church and H. S. McMichael of Central Avenue M. E. church, both teachers of large men's Bible classes, "exchanged pulpits" on a recent Sabbath morning.—At the Irvington church on a late Sabbath the former pastor, J. C. Day, D. D., of Labor Temple, New York, occupied the pulpit.—S. S. Aikman, D. D., of Philadelphia, formerly of Sixth church, addressed that congregation several times in September.—Elder George W. Brown spoke at the West Washington church on "Tithing" on a late Sunday evening, and Rev. W. S. Hartsook, African missionary, was at Grace church.

Plan Location of Churches—At the call of Rev. Morton Pearson, secretary of the lately organized Church Federation, representatives of the different denominations met in conference to discuss matters relating to the location of new churches in the growing portions of the city, the idea being to apply the new spirit of comity in such a way that both rivalry and overlapping of territory will be avoided and to plan for giving every locality some Protestant religious privileges. C. R. S.

ANNIVERSARIES RECENTLY OBSERVED

At Work for Seventy Years—Oct. 19 and 21, the seventieth anniversary of VanBuren, Ohio, church was observed. Dr. William McKibben, president of Lane Theological Seminary, preached morning and evening. Services were held all day Tuesday with a basket dinner at the church. Greetings were received from Lima Presbytery and neighboring churches and addresses were made by Dr. E. E. Rodgers, Bowling Green; Rev. F. L. Webb, Wapakoneta; Dr. W. F. Dickens-Lewis, Findlay, and Rev. D. H. Johnson, Toledo.

Old Church Celebrates—The 128th anniversary of Mahoning church, Danville, Pa., was observed Oct. 12-14 in connection with services celebrating the completion of repairs to the structure. The rededicatory address was made by Rev. R. B. Jack, Hazleton. Rev. C. S. Dickson, Bloomsburg, preached on Monday evening and a reception by the women and young people's societies was held Tuesday. This church has sent thirteen of its sons into the ministry and has five representatives on the home and foreign mission fields. During its 128 years of history it has had but eleven pastors, including the present minister, Dr. James W. Kirk.

Various Celebrations—Rev. A. E. Vanorden of Salina, Kan., church in speaking at the anniversary of his entrance into the ministry, called attention to the fact that Salina has sent four men, including Dr. William H. Foulkes, into the ministry.—The fortieth anniversary of Calvary church, St. Joseph, Mo., was recently observed by a banquet, followed by a number of addresses. The present pastor, Rev. E. J. Nickerson, presided.—Olivet church, Reading, Pa., celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary during the week beginning Oct. 18. Among those who took part in the various exercises were: Dr. W. Y. Chapman, Newark, N. J.; Rev. Robert H. Kirk, McKeesport; Rev. H. N. McCrone, Germantown, and Rev. James Robinson, Bethlehem.

Financial Situation

People Pinched by High Cost of Living May Well Look with Suspicion on Offers of Stock Bearing High Dividends.

The experts in Washington who announce that the cost of living will probably increase rather than decrease this winter have done little to cheer the consumer. The individual whose income depends upon interest rates which are fixed will have to look around for an additional source of income or seek in some manner to decrease his expenses. There are evidences abroad that officers of minor industrial companies are seeking to add to the cash available for operations by the sale of stock to individuals whose eyes are fixed upon promises of long profits rather than upon the safety of investment and possibility of obtaining the capital again when desired. Any such temptations should be very carefully investigated. Investors in farm mortgages have no desire to change their holdings, for the high prices for farm products have given reassurance of safety.

What Mortgage Men Say—In order to inform investors concerning farm mortgage conditions in the various parts of the country, The Continent has canvassed the entire field and reports so far received indicate that conditions are as good as they have ever been. Says George R. Fish, Oklahoma: "Farmers will receive more money for their crops this year than last and are getting 80 to 85 cents a bushel for corn now. During thirteen years' experience in the loan business in Oklahoma, only twice have I had to extend the time of payments on interest notes. Collections this year are better than for many years past." C. F. Pettyjohn, Kansas: "Eastern Kansas farm mortgages are just as safe this year as last, and we have up to date experienced no unusual amount of delinquent customers. Interest is being met as promptly as heretofore." R. C. Kittel, North Dakota: "Conditions are very satisfactory. Farmers are prosperous and there have been no defaults in farm loans. During the fifteen years I have been here farmers have been prompt in the payment of interest coupons. It has never been necessary to foreclose a mortgage." G. F. Carson, Illinois: "Retired farmers and salaried men seem to be making plans for laying away savings just as usual." Moultrie M. Sessions, Georgia: "It is probable that the cotton crop in Georgia will reach the enormous sum of $200,000,000."

Interest Sons in Business—The American Lumberman has recently made a suggestion to the lumber dealers of the country that could well be adopted by the men engaged in every line of business. It is proposed that at the frequent conventions of dealers, a day be set apart as "junior day," when the fathers shall see that their sons are in attendance and are told some details of lumber and its handling and are provided with other instructions along the line of the business in which perhaps they themselves will some day be engaged. The suggestion has met with enthusiastic indorsement on the part of the lumber dealers generally.

Asks How to Invest $500—"I have saved $500 from my earnings and have been urged by a friend to invest this amount in preferred stock of the ——— Company of Chicago. I would be grateful for any information as to the advisability of investing in this company's stock.—Mrs. C."

Can the Stock Be Sold Again?—No investment should be made without carefully considering how the money could be obtained again if one wanted to sell. We do not know what rate of interest the preferred stock of this company bears, but whatever are the earnings the amount depends in great measure upon the present management of the company. If the officers should change, or if the business should be affected by crops or other unmanageable factors, the earnings might decrease. This would affect the return upon your investment irrespective of whether or not it would be possible for you to withdraw the money at any time. Women usually have not the time to devote to a careful watch of the affairs of companies in which they invest their money. It is therefore usually advisable to put their earnings into some form which will bring a fair return with absolute security of principal with assurance of being able to recover the money invested at any time. There are a large number of issues of bonds of municipalities and public service corporations which can be bought for $500 and bear from 4½ to 6 per cent interest. The same amount might be invested in a farm mortgage which will bring 6 per cent and the highest possible degree of safety.

Promoter Fails to Get Life Insurance—An illustration of the value of upright living is provided by the recent action of a life insurance company in refusing the application of a man who wished to take out a policy for $25,000. Investigation by the company showed that the man has in the past been connected with the promotion of a number of more or less questionable stock transactions. The moral hazard was deemed too great for the company to insure the applicant and in spite of the fact that he had already paid over $2,000 as the first premium for his insurance the money was returned to him and he was denied the protection that he sought.

School and College Notes

Been Long in Service—Professor A. B. Milford, who has had the chair of English language and literature in Wabash College for twenty-nine years, has resigned on account of ill health.

Gifts Total $42,000,000—It was announced by President H. P. Judson that the University of Chicago has received more than $42,000,000 in donations since its founding. The institution now has forty buildings and a faculty of 400.

Fire Routs Science Work—One of the buildings of William Jewell College, Liberty, Mo., burned in August. The science department is now housed in a provisional building, although it is hoped to get into the new science hall by the first of the year.

Memorial for Beloit Professor—A memorial service was held at the usual vesper hour Oct. 5 at Beloit College chapel for Professor Robert Coit Chapin, late head of the department of economics and sociology. He was a member of the faculty of Beloit College from 1892; his father was Beloit's first president.

Would Raise $400,000—Lake Forest College has the largest registration of men in its history. The women's dormitory is full to overflowing. The institution is in the midst of a campaign for $400,000 endowment, toward which the General Education Board has contributed $50,000.

More Students than Room—The dormitories of Tusculum College are overflowing with the largest attendance ever recorded. President Gray is perplexed to know how to accommodate other pupils who expect to come in a few weeks. Four additions have been made recently to the faculty.

Gives Two Years' Normal Work—The domestic science department of Frances Shimer school of the University of Chicago, Mount Carroll, Ill., which now has its home in the new science hall, gives two years of normal college training. The enrollment of the school is larger than last year.

Puts In Swimming Pool — Beechwood, Jenkintown, Pa., opened with every possible space occupied. The faculty has been greatly strengthened and a number of marked improvements have been made, including the provision of a large new dining room, a pipe organ in the chapel, a swimming pool and a large gymnasium.

Winona College; Mary Baldwin Seminary—An elementary course in journalism is an innovation in Winona College. Work in domestic science will continue throughout the year.—A large number of prospective students have been turned away this fall from Mary Baldwin Seminary on account of lack of room.

Interest in Rowing Grows—The enrollment at Milwaukee-Downer College is over 300, while that at Milwaukee-Downer Seminary is more than 200. The recent gift to the college of a boathouse site and boathouse and the possession of two new, six-oared boats equipped with sliding seats have caused renewed interest in rowing. A coach has been engaged and the students are being developed for class crews.

Modeled After West Point—New Mexico Military Institute, Roswell, N. M., was recently designated by the war department as one of the ten "distinguished" military schools of the United States. This is the fourth year this institute has been so designated. It is modeled after the United States Military Academy at West Point. A third large brick barracks was completed before the opening of this session.

Has New Armory—Shattuck has opened with a full enrollment after having declined quite a number because of age and lack of room. Rev. T. E. Mathison, late rector of Grace church, Oak Park, Ill., has been added to the faculty as associate rector to secure to the rector needed relief after a service of nearly forty-seven years. The school has recently added some noteworthy buildings for the gymnasium and indoor athletic work, with a magnificent armory and reading room and library.

Hanover to Increase Endowment—Hanover College, which is credited with the distinction of preparing more men for the ministry than any other Presbyterian college west of the Alleghenies, plans to secure an additional endowment of $250,000. Added facilities are needed for the growing number of students, besides a more adequate provision for faculty maintenance. Rev. H. T. Graham of Knightstown, Ind., has been prevailed upon to give up his pastoral work and direct the endowment movement, which has been indorsed by the College Board, the Board of Education and by Indiana Synod at its Peru meeting Oct. 7-8.

Set Standard for Honors—An interesting innovation in the marking system of Whitman College has been made whereby both quality as well as quantity of work count for graduation. A student who is graded between 90 and 100 in a three hour subject will receive three quality credits for each hour represented by the course, or nine quality credits for the semester. A student whose average is between 80 and 90 will receive two such credits for every hour of work. In order to graduate a student must have at least 124 quality credits in addition to 124 hours of college work and in order to graduate summa cum laude he must have 372 quality credits. Absences except those caused by protracted illness or by representation of the college out of town are penalized by subtraction from the quality credits.

Presbyterians Most Numerous — Presbyterian girls predominate at Lenox Hall, St. Louis. The accommodations both in boarding and day departments are fully taken.

Many Seminary Students—The enrollment of the Seminary of Kentucky exceeds that of last year, which was the largest the seminary had ever had. The opening address was delivered by Dr. J. Gray McAllister, professor of English Bible.

Been Running a Century—James R. Hughes, headmaster of Bellefonte, Pa., Academy, is now the sole owner of that institution, which since its erection in 1806 had belonged to the borough of Bellefonte. Improvements have been made to the equipment and the academy opened with the largest faculty and student body in its history.

Two More Nationalities Represented—Dubuque German College and Seminary opened its academic and collegiate departments on Sept. 10; the seminary work began on Oct. 8. There is a gratifying increase in enrollment in all departments and two more nationalities have been added to the large number already represented.

Status of College Settled—Missouri Valley College, Marshall, Mo., was given into the control of the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A., by the recent decision in the case involving the rights of the Cumberland church in Missouri. The college belongs not to any synod, but to the church at large, according to the court. It is expected that a girls' dormitory will be built this year.

Dr. Warfield Acting President—Princeton Seminary has several changes in faculty. The senior professor, Dr. B. B. Warfield, has been made acting president until a successor for Dr. Patton shall be found. Dr. F. W. Loetscher, who was for a number of years instructor in church history and then pastor of Oxford church, Philadelphia, from which pastorate he was called several years ago to the professorship of homiletics in the seminary, has been transferred to the professorship of church history. His place in the homiletic chair has been taken temporarily by Samuel A. Martin, D. D., formerly president of Wilson College, Pennsylvania. The entering class numbers fifty-one.

SYNODS PLAN AGGRESSIVE ACTION

Big Increase in Gifts—An increase of 14 per cent in gifts over last year was reported at the meeting of the Nebraska synodical society at Kearney Oct. 8 and 9. The presbyteries are asked to show an increase of 5 per cent for 1914.

Many There—With the largest attendance for years, Kansas Synod met at Emporia Oct. 14. The earlier sessions were held in First church, but on Thursday synod assembled at the College of Emporia, where it was entertained at a midday banquet. Business was well expedited under the moderatorship of Dr. D. H. Stewart of Wellington and a spirit of optimism was evident. As elsewhere noted, action was taken on college relationship within the state and home mission interests were given much attention.

Continue Missionary Superintendence—Michigan Synod met at Adrian Oct. 14-16. J. Ambrose Dunkel, D. D., of Saginaw, was unanimously elected moderator. The home mission committee recommended the continuation of the present status of working under three general missionaries, superintending all of the work except in Detroit Presbytery. Rev. A. R. Atwood, the new superintendent of educational Sunday school work, made an excellent impression at the synod, as did Rev. Walter Russell, the new synodical evangelist. The popular meetings were of more than usual interest, being addressed by Dr. Arthur J. Brown on "The Opportunity in China," by Dr. Francis M. Fox on brotherhood work, by Dr. J. A. Marquis, president of Coe College, Iowa, on "A Christian College"; by Miss Marie C. Brehm and Superintendent J. F. Burke on temperance; by Dr. Robert Mackenzie on colleges; by Dr. J. W. Cochran on Christian education, and by Dr. Jesse C. Bruce on church erection. There was an interesting symposium on "The Eldership." Preceding the meeting of synod there was a Sunday school conference, but the attendance was very small. Dr. John A. Seibert, pastor of the church, had made every arrangement for synod's comfort, including a most tasteful decoration of the auditorium. The next meeting is to be at Battle Creek.

William Bryant.

OBSERVE CENTENNIAL AT PATERSON

Church Has Oldest Sunday School in State—Still at Work in Downtown Section—New Head for Missions.

NEW JERSEY—Beginning Oct. 26 and continuing through Nov. 2, First church, Paterson, will celebrate the 100th anniversary of its birth. The Sabbath school, which was founded in 1794, was one of the first four established in the United States, and is the oldest in New Jersey. Its founder was Miss Sarah Colt, a member of the family which invented the Colt revolver. The church itself is the mother of all Presbyterian churches in Paterson and still maintains a strong work on its original site in the heart of the business section. Oct. 26 the pastor, Rev. Clarence E. Macartney, will deliver an historical address in the morning and in the afternoon a tablet will be unveiled to the memory of Miss Colt. William B. Hornblower of New York, a son of the fifth pastor of the church, will make the address.

Celebrates Seventy-Fifth Anniversary—Greystone church, Rev. Joseph B. Ferguson pastor, has just completed the seventy-fifth anniversary exercises of the beginning of the church. Among the most important speakers who have addressed the congregation were Rev. Stanley White of the Foreign Board, Rev. J. Ernest McAfee of the Home Board, Rev. Charles Stelzle, formerly of the Home Board, and John T. Sproull, president of the New Jersey State Endeavor Society. William Force Whitaker, D. D., pastor of First church, Elizabeth, which celebrates its 250th anniversary next year, came with greetings. Greystone church, though in a changing community, was able the present year to report its largest membership and its largest contributions to benevolences, with excellent attendance.

New Missionary Superintendent—New Jersey Synod's committee on church extension has elected to the vacant position of missionary superintendent Rev. Samuel J. McClenaghan of Jamesburg. When Dr. Samuel McLanahan died unexpectedly it seemed almost impossible to fill the place with a man of his many adaptations. The committee soon, however, fixed upon Dr. Davis W. Lusk of Newark. When Dr. Lusk finally refused all efforts to beguile him away from Newark, a second survey of men available brought the committee to Mr. McClenaghan, whose acceptance is understood to be assured.

Church Growing—First church, Mount Holly, Frank Willcock minister, is in the midst of a strong and helpful rally period which began with splendid Rally Day exercises.

PRESBYTERIES AND THEIR WORK

Stated Clerk Resigns—Oakes Presbytery met at McLeod, N. D. One afternoon was given over to an evangelistic meeting. Rev. R. C. Crouch of Sheldon was chosen moderator. J. C. Engel because of ill health resigned as stated clerk and Axel Rasmussen was elected.

Approve Union — Birmingham Presbytery met with Acton Memorial church. Rev. John A. Foster was chosen moderator. Presbytery voted affirmatively on the question of church union. Rev. John A. Foster was installed as pastor of Acton Memorial church and was to be installed at Edgewood.

Work in Minnesota — Red River Presbytery elected Rev. W. J. Lowrie of Brainerd moderator. Rev. E. L. Latchaw of the Baker field was released. He will go to Ohio, his old home, for a year. He has been pastor for over three years and in that time has worked it up to self-support and also doubled its membership. Presbytery has adopted the every-member plan.

Adopt Minimum Salary Schedule—Carlisle Presbytery met in Silver Spring, Pa., church and affirmed union with the Reformed Church. A conference was held on religious education and an address made by Dr. J. M. Hubbert. The plan was adopted of bringing all churches of presbytery up to the miniimum standard for ministers' salaries; for country churches and small towns, $1,000 and manse; for city churches, $1,200 and manse.

Open Remodeled Church—Detroit Presbytery in session at Northville began with a service which marked the reopening of the Presbyterian church, which has just completed extensive improvements at a cost of $6,500. It is a neat and commodious structure and with the manse adjoining forms a complete church equipment rarely found in smaller cities. Rev. J. E. Webber is pastor. Rev. A. R. Atwood, new educational superintendent of Sunday school work for the synod, made a brief address and outlined his plan of work.

Establish Many Sunday Schools—According to the reports made to Adams Presbytery by the Sunday school missionary, Rev. R. C. Pryor, thirty-three new Sunday schools have been established recently, many of which were in fields which previously had no religious services. Union with Reformed Church was approved. The every-member canvass plan was enthusiastically adopted and put in charge of the executive commission. The Home Board was asked to commission men known as iissionary pastors to aid in the development of ie work. Presbytery now is seeking to enter nd hold a vast stretch of new country that is unhurched.

Lumber Company to Endow School—Iron Mounin Presbytery elected Rev. E. W. Behner modertor; answered in the affirmative the overture conerning union with the Reformed Church; held an lucational conference and heard an address on hristian education by W. J. McKittrick, D. D., f St. Louis. An overture was received from the 'resbytery of Potosi, U. S., proposing joint conol of Elmwood Seminary at Farmington. A comiittee was appointed to investigate and report. A imber company owning great portions of Carer, Oregon and Shannon counties has offered to ooperate with the church in the proper endowment f an academic school at Grandin. Presbytery was eartily in favor of such a practical application of ie theories of the educational conference.

Moseley—The following obituary taken from a Madison, Wis., paper, of James E. Moseley, an elder in the Presbyterian church of that city, is perfectly deserved and will interest many readers, especially those who attended the meeting of the General Assembly held in Madison in 1880:

"James E. Moseley, whose death is recorded with genuine sadness, was a fine type of the excellent citizen. He was the soul of integrity, of industry, of consideration for his fellows. No mind was more fair or just. He was a model in every relation — at home, in business, in church. Distinctly he was a safe, patriotic Christian gentleman. He filled honorably and conscientiously every niche in which duty placed him. Of him no ill can be spoken. What more may be said of any man? He goes to eternal rest blessed with the sweetest memory of all who knew him."

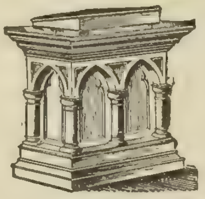
Church and Sunday-School Furniture



We have had years of successful experience in manufacturing and furnishing Church and Sunday-school furniture. Pastors and building committees have complimented us on the work that we have done. In order that the equipment may harmonize with the architectural treatment of the building, we will welcome the opportunity to work out special plans for designs for pulpit furniture, seating and other fittings. If your building committee will give us opportunity to confer with them about their needs in this way, we are confident we can please by the suggestion made, and that the equipment, when completed, will be pleasing to all. We guarantee to execute work in plain yet artistic fashion at the minimum cost for the modest chapel, as well as more elaborate work for the larger city church. We are confident that you will find our prices reasonable, where quality and service are considered.

Sunday-School Chairs and Tables for all Departments

The top is built up of three plies of wood. The top ply is oak and the lower ply is soft wood. A top made like this is practically unbreakable. It is 36 inches in diameter, and from 18 to 28 inches in height. It is hinged and opens at right angles with the table. The soft wood on the under side affords an excellent place to tack up class records, and displaying them before class.

No. 400. Price, $8.50 each; 5 or more, less 5 per cent; 10 or more, less 10 per cent. Delivery prepaid anywhere east of the Mississippi.

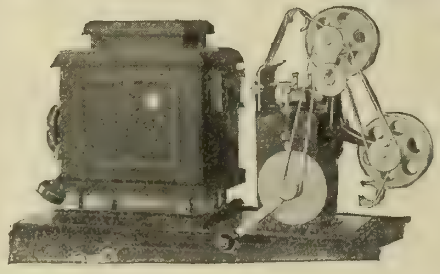
The Edison Home Kinetoscope

is neither a toy nor a delicate and complicated mechanism, but a machine that combines simplicity, safety and effectiveness. It is simple, because Mr. Edison realized when designing the instrument, that it would be operated by people who are not scientifically or mechanically trained; safe, because the scource of light is carefully protected and the films are non inflammable. It is effective, because it throws a clear, distinct picture.



It is compact and weighs about twenty pounds.

POSTAL LIFE BUILDING
35 NASSAU STREET
POSTAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY
POSTAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

The Open Door in Life-Insurance

INSURANCE PROTECTION
POSTAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY
HEALTH CONSERVATION

The Postal Life is the only company that opens its doors to the public so that those desiring sound insurance-protection at low cost can deal directly for it, either personally or by correspondence.

Whether you call or write, you make a guaranteed saving corresponding to the agent's first-year commission, less the moderate advertising charge. This first-year commission ranges up to 40% of the premium on whole-life policies

In subsequent years, you save the Renewal Commission other companies pay their agents, namely, 7½%, and you also receive an Office-Expense Saving of 2%, making up the

Annual Dividend of 9½% Guaranteed in the Policy

If you were to call at the office of any other company, or write to it, you might secure insurance, of course, but not direct; the policy would go to you through some agent or agency that would get the commission. You wouldn't get it.

In fact, the other company wouldn't be permitted to give it to you, unless everyone else got it: it would be illegal discrimination.

The Postal Life, however, dispenses entirely with agents. Its policyholders—all of them alike—get the benefit of the saving thus effected by direct insurance.

STRONG POSTAL POINTS

First: Standard policy reserves, now $10,000,000. Insurance in force nearly $50,000,000.

Second: Old-line legal-reserve insurance—not fraternal or assessment.

Third: Standard policy provisions, approved by the State Insurance Department.

Fourth: Operates under strict State requirements and subject to the United States postal authorities.

Fifth: High medical standards in the selection of risks.

Sixth: Policyholders' Health Bureau provides one free medical examination each year, if desired.

Such is the POSTAL way: the door is open to you. Call at the company's offices, if convenient, or write now and find out the exact sum it will pay you at your age—the first year and every other.

See How Easy It Is

In writing simply say: "Mail me insurance particulars for my age as per CONTINENT of October 30.

In your letter be sure to give
1. Your Full Name.
2. Your Occupation.
3. The Exact Date of your Birth.

No agent will be sent to visit you: the Postal Life employs no agents.

Around the Shop

Here's a voice from Canada—where, by the way, our Continent continent family is growing: "The Around-the-Shop Man of The Continent—Dear Sir: My wife said I had better—so I'm doing it. Last Monday morning just after breakfast she was at her work and I was reading the latest issue of The Continent. It was not long before I came across something which was so interesting that I had to read it aloud. Then in a few minutes there was something more to share—and so it went until my wife laughed and said:

"'You ought to write to The Continent and tell how you sat on a Monday morning and found so much that you had to read aloud.'

"And that is not all. I'm making a sermon out of the articles in that one number. The little missionary, Sara Curry; the Bohemian girl in Chicago who wanted to be a lily growing out of the mud; the Swiss girl who endured suffering for the sake of Christ; the Jews who offered their synagogue for Christian worship; the newsboys who tried to boost a competitor—these grouped as they were in a single paper seem to me to be sufficient for a sermon on the text, 'He thanked God and took courage.'

"Now, having done what I was told to do, I remain yours sincerely, J. R. H."

"My wife said I had better—so I'm doing it." Our women are the embodied conscience of the church. Not that the Around-the-Shop Man wavers in loyalty to his own sex; but, honest now, men, are there not a thousand and one good things you do and take credit for that you might not have done without the gentle urgency of one who instantly senses the right where you would falter and "argify"? More than one man refused to believe that a religious paper could be made interesting until The Continent was put before him by the wife who had seen at once its value. Our women are wideawake to the usefulness of such a paper—and they're not afraid to speak out.

What 15c Will Do

The little matter of 15c in stamps will bring you the Pathfinder for 13 weeks on trial. The Pathfinder is an illustrated weekly, published at the Nation's Capital, for the Nation; now in its 21st year of increasing success. The paper fills the bill without emptying the purse; it costs but $1 a year. If you want to keep posted on what is going on in the world, at the least expense of time or money, this is your means. If you want a paper in your home which is sincere, reliable, entertaining, wholesome, the Pathfinder is yours. If you would appreciate a paper which puts everything clearly, fairly, briefly—here it is at last. Send only 15c to show that you might like such a paper, and we will send the Pathfinder on probation 13 weeks. The 15c does not repay us, but we are glad to invest in New Friends. Or send $1 for full year; money back any time if not satisfied. Address Pathfinder, Bx G, Washington, D.C.

Reading This Book

It's a study of real life that will "grip" you.

It will hold your interest from the first to the last chapter.

You forget yourself when reading

Bradford Horton, Man

By RICHARD SILL HOLMES

It is a simple tale, but with a plot which holds interest throughout; and the humor and pathos, comedy and heart tragedy that enter into it make it a story that will commend itself strongly to all who enjoy wholesome fiction. Bradford Horton is not a hero plucked from the romantic ages, nor an effeminate lover whom nobody in these days expects to find in real life. You want to shake hands with him and make friends right at the start.

Table Linens
At "The Linen Store"

This department has been very much enlarged during the summer; consequently we are able to display our extensive and unequaled assortment to the very best advantage.

There are upwards of 400 designs in the collection. Some of these have been old favorites with our customers for many years; others are being shown for the first time this season.

The variety of sizes is so great that we can imagine no requirement that cannot be readily supplied at "The Linen Store."

Among the new designs this season are the Royal Ermine Celtic with Cube Center, Empire with Cube Center and a new Shower of Pearl; also Pekin Stripe with new border and Thistle and Scroll.

Plain Damask Cloths with Satin Bands and Cloths with stripes of different widths are still considered very smart. These may be had in great variety.

Marriage That Stands the Test

IS MARRIAGE ONLY A ONE-PERSON AFFAIR?

You would think so to hear people talk about it these days.

It is the common remark that this is a social age. Social and socialistic theorizing is in the air everywhere.

But by a paradox simply unfathomable, the mention of marriage converts on a sudden the most socialistic of radicals into the crudest individualists that ever broke through the crust of civilization. On the whole subject of wedlock, indeed, the age, so far from being social in its thinking, has run away headlong into a kind of individualism so sheerly absurd that it would be poor credit to a madhouse.

Men and women, otherwise rational, are found putting forth, with all axiomatic gravity, the preposterous proposition that a husband or wife who has become unhappy in the marriage relation is, by mere fact of such dissatisfaction, released from all marital obligation and justified in seeking happiness in any other comradeship that appears to promise it.

In truth, to such an astounding pass has this inversion of the moral reason extended that there are today discovered respectable persons who argue that for the unhappy partner of matrimony it is not merely privilege but duty to fling off the irksome bonds.

For—save the mark!—we are told it is "duty" to be happy.

All that these purported thinkers can see in marriage, then, is a chance for somebody to find somebody else who will make him or her individually enjoy life. One would think that social science was unheard of.

In whatever romantic aspect wedlock may offer itself to callow lovers, only one account of it is to be tolerated from men and women who would be thought to speak dispassionately of permanent principles: Marriage is first and preeminently a social institution.

Fundamentally there is only one reason for marriage—to provide a basis for homes wherein the children of the race may be reared.

A profound and nearly universal prejudice prevails, however, against emphasizing this elemental racial purpose of marriage among young men and young women of what is commonly called the marriageable age. So practical a view of the married state is deemed an affront to the bliss of romantic love.

Yet that prejudice is precisely what accounts for the startling proportion of unhappy marriages.

Young people whose best considered reason for marrying is that they are extravagantly fond of one another, are indeed "entering lightly and unadvisedly" into responsibilities the most solemn that humanity is summoned to undertake. No wonder, when they feel on their shoulders later the stress of unthought-of tasks, that their dreams of joy fade before the bitter realization of how ill they are fitted for the prosaic duty of making a home together.

None of the mushy reasons that sentimentalists write down in novels and essays for the failure of marriage have anything to do with the case. Talk about discovering lack of affinity or developing incompatibility of temperament is figment, fiction or folly.

The trouble always is that at no time in advance of marriage did either bridegroom or bride ever take the slightest thought whether the other was a person to make a home with, capable of carrying domestic obligations and fit for the upbringing of children.

Instead of such serious reflections as these, lovers commonly spend their courtship days in a fantasy of reciprocal flattery, too mutually delicious to be analyzed, but dissolving cruelly when living together wakes them both from imaginations to realities.

The cure of such domestic calamities resides in rational training by sensible parents for intelligent sons and daughters.

The base of that training must be the constant emphasis with both sons and daughters, from adolescence up to maturity, of this one great rule of physical, social and spiritual sense:

Reasonable people assume wedlock not with a selfish view to individual happiness but in a solemn sense of duty to increase the number of responsible homes willing to train for God and humanity worthy members of the human generation to follow.

There will be no hasty and reckless marriages—no marriages of impulse, passion or self-coddling conceit—where this conception of marriage has been ingrained into conscientious young people.

Nor will there be any surrender to the fictitious supremacy of an emotional love. Sane judgment will insist on governing even love, and will recall it from wherever common sense forbids.

Love is not excluded by any such practical contemplations. On the contrary, love—real love—is the greatest of those solid reasons for domestic hope. It is indeed only by such sober study of the prospects of home-making that love of the lasting sort can disengage itself from passing fancy.

The man or woman who stops to think is seldom or never betrayed into a marriage destined to be dissolved by some later affinity.

But about the marriages that do come to the shattering of love—how shall husband or wife meet that wrench and shame?

Well, for the sake of all that's strong and brave, let neither of them whine. There's been a sad mistake made—the mistake of both. Let them behave with the courage of those who, whatever their other faults, are not cowards in the face of consequences.

Then let them appreciate that, having sworn to both God and the state that they will make and keep a home, they are not quit of that oath, no matter how personally unhappy and uncomfortable they are.

Can the home be continued? If by any means it can, it must be.

The first parties in interest are neither the husband nor the wife, but the children. The children have a natural and inalienable right to a home. Shall they be robbed of it?

Willingness to face such questions is itself an antidote to pettish individualism, craving the selfish repair of its own comforts. The home claim and the duty claim make a moral stimulus which shakes off so childish a weakness.

And maintaining duty often restores love. No doubt there are cases of family wreck beyond the hope of any such remedying. But any remnant of honor sufficient to respect a wedlock vow is capable of working marvels of restoration. If that much of the square and fair remains in both husband and wife, home maintenance is nearly always possible.

At all events, if divorce must come, let it be attended with the shame of a disgraceful social failure—not with a brazen boast of exercising a fatuous personal "right to happiness."

The World

No President Elected in Mexico; Huerta to Rule

Victoriano Huerta, provisional president and dictator of Mexico, permitted the Mexican people to go through the form of holding an election last Sunday, and it was reported that Federico Gamboa, the Catholic party's candidate, received a majority of the ballots cast. Just how many ballots were cast and by whom is not known, but it was asserted that the number was insufficient to make the election legal under the Mexican constitution. Therefore Huerta can ignore the election on constitutional grounds and continue as acting president, pending a new election in the indefinite future. Furthermore, he can do so with the assent of his political opponents, with the exception of Felix Diaz. Huerta called a conference of all the candidates in Mexico City Saturday, and they agreed in advance to abide by the result of the election, with the proviso that if the election were void then all concerned were to aid Huerta in pacifying the country. Diaz was not present. Thus the president "ad interim" remains in the saddle.

General Diaz landed at Vera Cruz last week in spite of official hints to return to Europe. He was at once put under espionage, and later received a polite and urgent invitation to proceed to the capital, but he discreetly declined, even though his former friend and accomplice, Huerta, had sent a special train for him. He had learned that Huerta had just arrested an army officer and three more members of the Madero family for "sedition."

It is practically impossible to forecast next steps in Mexico, but there were evidences that Huerta was busily working for a foreign alliance or understanding unfriendly to the United States. In this he was aided by circumstances—the American embassy is without an official head, and the new British ambassador, Sir Lionel Carden, has long taken an anti-American attitude, as shown by his previous record in Latin America. Ambassador Carden was quoted in interviews as criticising the United States, though these interviews were followed by denials from London. It is asserted that he is an intimate friend and protege of Lord Cowdray, the head of the influential Pearson syndicate, which is America's chief business rival in Mexico.

Plans for the Indians and Filipinos

Friends of the Indians and Other Dependent Peoples held the organization's thirty-first annual conference at Lake Mohonk, New York, last week. Indian, Philippine and Porto Rican affairs were discussed. While the conference was in session Warren K. Moorehead of the board of Indian commissioners received a telegram from the federal department of the interior stating that the department had refused to publish his criticism of conditions in Oklahoma, and with it a telegram of censure from the acting secretary of the interior. The refusal of the department to give publicity to the report had little effect, as Commissioner Moorehead printed and circulated the report at private expense. The department's objection to the report was that it criticised Congress and would cause congressional resentment. Mr. Moorehead investigated conditions in Oklahoma by the direction of the Indian board and he asserted that the Indian, unless he belongs to the favored class, "can no more keep his property than can a lamb escape from the jaws of the wolf." As a remedy he recommended that the President be empowered to name a commission of nine men, with adequate salaries and absolute authority, to hold office for ten years, to replace the present unsalaried advisory board.

A. S. Lanier of Richmond, Virginia, who is a federal attorney and was for several years in the Philippine official service, proposed as an ideal plan that the Philippines be controlled by an international council composed of members from America, England, France, Germany, Russia and Japan. Dr. John R. McDill, late a professor of surgery in the University of Manila, advocated immediate independence, but the dominant opinion of the delegates appeared to be in favor of making the Filipinos independent after a generation or so had been devoted to their education.

All Found Guilty of Atrocities in the Balkan Wars

The Carnegie International Commission, which has been investigating the Balkan wars and charges and counter charges of atrocities made by the various combatants, presented a summary of its report last Friday. It was found that the soldiers of all warring states were guilty of gross crimes against civilization, although it is stated that the Bulgarians committed the greatest misdeeds. The investigating commissioners are of the opinion that the other belligerents would have acted much the same had they been aroused to such a pitch of fury as were the Bulgarians by the desertion of their former allies. However, the Bulgarians gave the inquirers the fullest opportunity to bring the facts to light, whereas Servia did its utmost to hamper the investigation and would permit no inquiries except in the presence of a Servian military attache.

The commission examined a packet of letters from Greek soldiers captured by Bulgarians, containing hideous descriptions of how Greek troopers avenged themselves on Bulgarians who fell into their hands, and the commissioners believe that these letters are authentic.

Baron d'Estournelles de Constant of the commission is quoted to the effect that the report when finally completed and issued will be not so much an indictment of the Balkan belligerents as of war itself.

The Austro-Hungarian government a few days ago served notice on Servia to evacuate Albania and Servia promised to do so. The Servian minister at Paris later presented to the French foreign ministry a note from his government proposing to leave it to an international commission to decide whether the points occupied by Servians in Albania are properly Albanian or Servian territory.

Anglo-German Naval Holiday Proposal Renewed

Winston Churchill, speaking at Manchester, recently made a more explicit renewal of his former proposal that Great Britain and Germany should take a year's "holiday" from warship building. The idea has met with a cool reception in European circles, though future generations may marvel at the inconsistency of this age which strongly declaims against war while at the same time it expends more and more millions upon armaments and all the mechanism of warfare. To Admiral von Koster, president of the German Navy League, the idea is "incomprehensible," which seems to coincide with prevailing German sentiment, although one well known naval expert in Berlin, Captain Persius, conceded that the Churchill proposal was not only debatable but capable of being carried out.

It was Great Britain which set the pace in warship construction, resolving to build two ships for every one constructed by any other nation and to keep her navy stronger than the combined navies of any other two European powers; therefore it is to the credit of the first lord of the admiralty that he is willing to recognize the criminal folly of the expenditure of the nation's wealth upon naval programs that only incite other nations to further efforts for heavier and yet heavier armaments. The Toronto Globe points out that it is only eight years since the British admiralty launched the first dreadnaught, at a cost slightly below $9,000,000, whereas today there are 150 dreadnaughts built or building by the various powers, at an estimated cost of $1,850,000,000. Eight years ago England was the only builder of dreadnaughts, while now even the smaller nations think they must be equipped with warships. Great Britain is now haunted by the monster to which she gave birth. By a return to a saner policy, Mr. Churchill declared, a vast treasure would be rescued for the progress of mankind, not to mention the productive and helpful use of brains and capital and effort now diverted to this unproductive channel. Says the same newspaper: "What the admiralty lord whispers today in diplomatic language may be voiced tomorrow in louder and more menacing tones by the overtaxed peoples from whom the war lords have derived their power."

Meat Supplies from Outside the United States

With the shortage of the beef supply in the United States attention is being directed to Argentina and other parts of South America from whence shipments are now being made with the expectation that the consignments will become much greater with the opening of the Panama canal to greater traffic a few months hence. Three of the big Chicago packing houses long ago took time by the forelock and made contracts for all the available refrigeration space on ships plying between New York and Argentina. The point has been raised at Washington that, there being only one steamship line regularly plying on this route, an exclusive control of its facilities amounts to a violation of the Sherman antitrust law and is a monopoly in restraint of trade. Additional refrigerator ships are said to be in prospect, but not until next year.

The more northerly part of South Africa is also attracting considerable attention because of its availability for cattle ranching. Canadian newspapers are urging their constituents to utilize the vast areas in parts of Ontario which are unfitted for ordinary farming but apparently well adapted for cattle raising. A million pounds of fresh dressed meat from Canada arrived in Chicago last Friday, the first large importation of fresh meat since the new tariff law placed the commodity on the free list. Thirty-six carloads of fish, also on the free list, were received.

Great Britain and Her Moslem Subjects

The attitude of Great Britain toward Moslems in general was recently defined by the viceroy of India, Lord Hardinge, in an official address before the legislative council at Simla. The question is an important one in view of the fact that the British empire contains more Mohammedan subjects than are ruled by any other power, and these subjects have been deeply concerned with the Turko-Balkan wars because the sultan of Turkey is the recognized head of the Mohammedan sect. Lord Hardinge expressed British sympathy for both Turkey and Persia, but he denied a prevalent idea that England could not afford to affront Moslem sentiment. Regardless of Islamic solidarity, he warned Indian Moslems not to forget that they were "members of a great empire." Nationality rather than religion must determine common interest.

It will be remembered that a few months ago an attempt was made to assassinate Lord Hardinge. That a political volcano still smolders in India was indicated only a few days ago when the head constable of Calcutta was shot dead by three Bengali youths, who made their escape through a dense crowd.

To Inventory National Assets and Liabilities

An industrial and social survey of the nation is to be made by the National Civic Federation, through its industrial economics department, according to announcement just made, with a view to ascertaining whether recent decades have brought progress or retrogression. Among the features to be included will be examination of principles involved in the movement for the abolition of private ownership in the means of production and distribution of wealth, and the study of the differences in the fundamental aims and methods of the labor movement as conducted by the trade unions, the Socialists and the Industrial Workers of the World. President Seth Low of the federation believes that there could be no better time than the present to make this national inventory of social assets and liabilities. How far, he asks, has the general movement of our republic been toward progress, and what steps can be taken to establish it firmly on the way to further progress? With regard to good or imperfect performance doubtless much will be found on both sides of the ledger, and with a satisfactory knowledge of its assets, America may be encouraged to meet its remaining liabilities to the cause of human advancement.

An advisory council of nearly 400 men and women of all parts of the country is to aid in carrying out this ambitious undertaking. The committee on plan and scope is headed by Professor Talcott Williams of the Columbia School of Journalism. Rev. Charles Stelzle is one of the members. The report of this committee argues that the twentieth century is to be devoted to the settlement of economic issues, just as the close of the eighteenth and the beginning of the nineteenth century were devoted to the solution of political issues. The committee says further:

"A new period in the industrial development of our nation began with the formation of the trusts. Early landmarks of this period were the organization of the sugar trust in 1885. The creation of great corporations in this period, the changes in the development and management of industries, the large immigration drawn from Southern and Southeastern Europe instead of from Northern and Northwestern Europe, the massing of the population at centers of industry, the arrest in the increase of our agricultural population, and the fact that in the last decade for the first time in our history the population has grown twice as fast as the food supply—all this has brought profound shiftings in the distribution of wealth, the relations between employer and employed and the circumstances in which people with large and small incomes live. The expenditure of the rich is more visible, and the standards of desires among people of moderate income and in the wage-earning class have risen, emphasizing a disparity in the enjoyment of life and its opportunities. The addition of large populations who have suffered from oppression and wrong in their old homes has multiplied the ranks of those prompt to put the worst construction on the motives of the more fortunate."

Therefore, concludes the committee, "let us find out just where we stand. Have we gone forward, gone backward, or are we merely marking time?"

Congregationalists in Council

BY J. A. ADAMS

Dr. Charles R. Brown

FOR YEARS Congregationalists have felt that a hard and fast view in independence was somewhat of a hindrance to efficiency. The conviction prevailed that religious freedom ought to mean the liberty to adopt such methods of doing religious work as times and circumstances demand. This feeling resulted in the appointment of a Commission of Nineteen to plan a reorganization of the denomination through the adoption of a new constitution. After three years of constant communication and consultation with the churches, this commission presented a constitution to the National Council of the churches at Kansas City last week which was adopted with one dissenting vote. A more impressive scene than that witnessed when the great body took its final vote on the instrument has never been known in the denomination.

Important Features of the Reorganization—The most important feature of the reorganization and of the new constitution is connected with the relation of the National Council to the various missionary societies, of which there are seven. All the members of the council, except honorary members, are to be members of each of these societies. In addition to these members, the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions is to elect 150 members and the various home missionary societies from ninety to nine members each. This combined membership is to constitute each of the societies; that is, the members of each society will consist of its own elected members and the members of the National Council.

But in order to readjust the affairs and work of the society the new constitution provides for a commission of missions. This commission, the majority of whose twenty-one members are chosen by the National Council, is "to consider the work of the home and foreign societies, to prevent duplication, to effect all possible economies in administration, and to secure the maximum of efficiency with a minimum of expense. The commission also is to endeavor to bring about a unification of the societies and, if possible, some combinations which will reduce the number of home missionary societies." It is hoped by many that ultimately there will be only three home missionary societies where now there are six.

A "Big" Secretary—Another important article of the new constitution provides for a secretary of the National Council with greatly enlarged duties. In fact, this secretary is given so much in the way of function that many think he will be almost a bishop, but the constitution is careful to say that his authority shall be only advisory. The moderator also is made a representative of the denomination with other bodies, but "it is understood that all his acts and utterances shall be devoid of authority, and shall have only so much weight and force as there is reason in them."

The nominating committee of the council is given much power; the members are to serve four years and they practically will control the selection of the committees and commissions of the council. The council hereafter will meet every two years instead of triennially, and the members are to be elected for two terms instead of one term, the terms of one-half the members expiring with each regular session of the council.

To sum up the whole purpose of the changes, it is organization for efficiency. But whether this setting up of new ecclesiastical machinery will make Congregationalism work better and grow faster than it has in the past remains to be seen.

Dr. Charles R. Brown, dean of the Yale Divinity School, was elected moderator of the council, which will adjourn October 31.

Religious World

Mighty Issue of Religious Liberty in China

Christian missionaries of all names in China are deeply exercised over the sudden and surprising development of a deep laid plan to force into the constitution of the new Chinese republic a clause reading: "Confucianism shall be the state religion of China, but religious liberty shall be accorded to all the people." The missionaries have been quite taken off their feet by this outbreak of Confucian sentiment, because from the moment that the republican movement became an assured success, every one had taken it for granted that the national government, constructed on American models, would be wholly impartial among the varying religions professed in China.

But Dr. Chen, who is widely known in China as the author of a book entitled "The Economic Principles of Confucius and His School," had all the while been organizing under ground a conspiracy in behalf of Confucianism almost as wily and as complete as Dr. Sun in former years organized for the republican revolution. When the parliament in Peking decided to draft now only those sections of the national constitution necessary to provide for the inauguration of President Yuan, leaving all other matters to be discussed later, Dr. Chen saw his opportunity, and all unexpectedly sprang upon the parliament a concerted appeal from many influential quarters for the adoption of the clause above quoted.

Dr. Chen disclaims any intention of excluding Christians from public service, yet insists nevertheless that Confucianism is the only cult on which Chinese sentiment at large can be unified. But he has by no means unhorsed the advocates of a state religiously impartial. Though dazed at first, the friends of the American ideal of religious freedom have rallied and appointed a strong committee of seven, with headquarters in Peking, who are already setting afoot a great national agitation to protest against Chen's shrewd propaganda.

Temperance Women from All the Earth

The great audience which attended the opening of the ninth triennial world convention of the Women's Christian Temperance Union in the Brooklyn Academy of Music was estimated to comprise no less than 3,000 women. The president, the Countess of Carlisle, was absent and the vice president, Mrs. Lillian M. N. Stevens of Maine, who is president of the American organization, occupied the chair. The countess was represented, however, by her daughter, Lady Aurea Howard, who bore a gift of $5,000 from her mother and also a silver loving cup, which was presented to Mrs. Stevens.

Mayor Kline, the chief executive of the city of New York, very cordially welcomed the visitors, but offended them no little by pointedly declaring his opposition to prohibition. But he wished the ladies success in efforts to promulgate the ideal of total abstinence. The foreign delegation was not large, but represented practically every country in the world.

American Students Invited to Kansas City

No religious conventions in the United States have been maintained on a higher level of distinction and enthusiasm than the national conventions of the Student Volunteer Movement. For more than a quarter of a century these great gatherings of college students and their professors have assembled every four years. The four year interval was determined upon because that is the span of a college generation and every American student is afforded the opportunity to attend, if he will, one such occasion within the term of his college life.

The latest two gatherings of this great series, at Nashville in 1906 and Rochester in 1910, were unmistakably more powerful than any of their predecessors, and now the formal call is being sent forth to the colleges at the beginning of the academic year for what is expected to be a convocation of Christian youth greater than even Nashville and Rochester saw. The place of conference this year is fixed in Kansas City. The time of meeting is to be transferred, however, from February to the 1st of January and thus brought within the midwinter vacation of the schools.

The convention will meet in the late afternoon of the last day of 1913 and will continue without interruption to the fourth day of the new year, closing with consecration meetings on Sunday night. The executive committee's chairman is John R. Mott. The general secretary is F. P. Turner, at 600 Lexington avenue, New York City.

The Consecration of a Sorrow

THE MOST PUZZLING question which comes to Christian people at a time of great sorrow is, Why? There is little use in telling us that we ought not to ask it. It is true we may not be able to find a full answer, yet there is more answer than we find, for most of us look for it in the wrong place. We look back to find what precedes our experience to learn the reason which God had in letting us have it. The best reasons for God's greatest deeds, so far as we know them, lie after the deeds themselves. Most of us will find the best answer to our question by looking forward.

It is not so much what has preceded the sorrow as what shall follow it; not what the sorrow follows, but what follows the sorrow. In the case of the greatest sorrow the world has ever known the reason for it followed it. There is no adequate explanation for the death of Christ in any of the events which preceded it. The redemption of the world which is so steadily following it is the only adequate explanation.

In Trevelyan's "Life of John Bright" he tells an illuminating incident. When Bright was young and greatly dependent on his wife, she was unexpectedly taken from him. Richard Cobden consoled him as well as he could and then said to him: "There are thousands of houses in England at this moment where wives, mothers and children are dying of hunger. Now when the first paroxysm of your grief is past, I would advise you to come with me and we will never rest until the corn laws are repealed."

It was a challenge to John Bright to consecrate his sorrow, to use the added knowledge and power it gave him in behalf of the needy folk of England. The history of the campaign which Cobden and Bright carried on is familiar. Together they went to villages and cities. The broken heart of Bright poured out its warm blood in behalf of the hungry multitudes. There was no explanation of his sorrow in what preceded it, but there was abundant explanation of it in what followed.

The greatest experiences must have the greatest reasons. When we find ourselves maimed and broken, we get no comfort in looking back and seeing that it was our fault and that it might have been different if we had done this or that. Constant brooding on the irrevocable is useless. Here is the experience, whatever was the cause of it. No matter if we see a thousand things that might have changed this, it cannot now be changed. Very well, then, what shall we do with it in the days that are coming? Since we cannot see God's reasons behind us, let us work his reasons out in the days that are before us. Let us learn the secret of the consecration of our sorrow. Whatever it was that made the sorrow, nothing can be half so important as what the sorrow can make of us.

You have lost your little child, and you are completely staggered by it. Friends suggest to you banal or even wicked reasons why God allowed this sorrow to come on you. The reason may not lie behind you at all but altogether before you. It may lie in the future of your child. It may lie in the future of your own heart. It is absolutely sure that God means the sorrow to do a great thing for you. You are to be more efficient in life than you would have been without that sorrow. You will be more efficient if you will consecrate it. If you let it shut you in from the world so that you grow indifferent to the world's great sorrow, you have done the loving Father an injustice. That sorrow opened a path straight from your feet out to the needy world. You cannot turn from that path without losing the best reason for its being opened.

You can consecrate this sorrow. You know better now what loads are, and what disappointments are, and what failure is. For one reason and another the world is full of all these things. You are one of God's marked men hereafter, for you have passed through an experience that has in it the making of might. Keep your eyes forward; never mind what preceded the trouble. Be very sure that God's richest reason lies in what he and we together can make of the experience he gives us.

The Principle in the New Budget System

"Very mechanical," says the public concerning the committees and bureaus and agencies and other devices set up to accomplish the church's purposes. But to a close view from the inside of them, how human and necessary these very mechanisms appear. No wonder workers on the inside are anxious to make the public outside understand just what makes their labor so compelling.

Such is the endeavor for mutual understanding that can be read in a new statement just issued to Presbyterians by the "joint executive committee." How many Presbyterians can tell what the joint executive committee is? Comparatively few, we fear. Yet this joint executive committee is wrestling with a problem so important as to deserve the intelligent attention and aid of every member of the denomination.

Consequently the committee is trying to get into touch with the intelligence of every member with an explanatory account of itself. The committee consists of the moderator of the Assembly, two colleagues that the Assembly has appointed with him on the Assembly's Executive Commission (which is an entirely different thing from the joint executive committee), one Foreign Board secretary, one Home Board secretary, and one secretary chosen from the remaining church boards. At present its roll call stands thus: Stone, Carson, Fulton, Halsey, McAfee and Cochran.

Now what are these eminent and trusted leaders trying to do? They are trying to persuade every church under the "U. S. A." Assembly to adopt this year the budget system of church finance. But is just that alone worth all this trouble and stress? Can a mere system of gathering money be of consequence enough for all these busy men to spend their time endeavoring to standardize it throughout the denomination? Yes, it surely is. For the system involves the principle of giving every week to the Lord's work regularly on definite pledge.

There is strong reason in Scripture for calling that the Bible way of supporting Christian enterprises—as one discovers before he has read very far in the sixteenth chapter of I. Corinthians—and beyond this, the practical results of the plan, when tried out, vindicate it beyond doubting. Not only are there more abundant funds for missionary undertakings as well as local church work when the giving is thus frequent and steady, but the regularity and certainty of the income provide a vastly more substantial base for projecting great endeavors in the kingdom's behalf. To establish this new method throughout the denomination would, therefore, constitute a tremendous practical multiplication of Presbyterianism's effective power.

Do not think it strange, then, that big men consider this thing worth working for with all their might. And men with the modern zeal for progress and efficiency ought in every part of the denomination to turn in and help. Especially should the field agents of the undertaking—Messrs. McConaughy, McGarrah, Breeze and Hill—be welcomed and listened to and aided wherever they come to the local churches.

Moreover, there is another special reason for falling in line just now. This is all included in the Presbyterian share of a compact which has been made among all the churches for pushing this same idea last winter. The name given to this compact is the "united missionary campaign" of which every denomination will hear a lot before spring. In these interdenominational movements Presbyterians have always "kept up their end" and they must not lag this winter. Anybody ready to pledge two strong hands of help will be a welcome correspondent if he addresses the joint executive committee in the Presbyterian building, New York City. It's a great effort; don't miss getting in on it.

Endowments Often Enemies to Generosity

Any endowed philanthropic agency is sure to feel a disadvantage from its endowment in the spread of a popular idea that it is rich in its own right and therefore doesn't need current gifts. Especially in the period immediately succeeding a successful endowment campaign, does this too hasty deduction cause hardship. It seems never to occur to the man in the street that the directors of a philanthropy may justly take their increased resources as a warrant for branching out into greater work, and may therefore stand as much in need as ever of year-by-year donations.

The American Bible Society, which a year or two ago completed a large endowment fund, is just now a special victim of this difficulty. The society is very generally supposed to have been put beyond reach of any want, and so last year all the churches of the country gave it only $66,000. The churches certainly would have done better if they had had any adequate idea of the extent and expense of work which the Bible Society is doing in this country and especially in foreign lands. On its foreign agencies alone—agencies in missionary countries where there is no commercial production of Bibles at all—the society spends $317,000. The cost of printing and binding its Bibles in its New York publication house is $250,000. Then the cost of translation and revision has to be carried along with many other incidentals. The total budget is in fact $825,000 annually.

To supply this the fixed items of income are $125,000 from that supposedly omnipotent endowment and something like $275,000 from sale of Bibles. The margin of unfilled need which live generosity must cover with fresh gifts continually is therefore apparent. And the society, besides all this, is anxious to extend work in several directions where just now there is new opportunity—as in all the country beyond the Panama canal, in the Balkans and in China. For the society's experience justifies it in believing that wherever there is special unrest or other stir in the world, there is the place to send Bibles in increased quantities.

—Here is a new and a most excellent way for a Presbyterian child to earn a Bible. And a Bible earned is unquestionably more precious than a Bible received by gift. The offer is officially made by the Board of Publication at Philadelphia, and is open to any Presbyterian child under 16 years of age. The price for the Bible is the complete memorizing of the new intermediate catechism approved by the last General Assembly. Within a year after beginning the effort the boy or girl seeking the prize must be able to recite, without error, without prompting and at one sitting, all the answers in which this admirable little booklet sums up Christian duty and doctrine. Then the pastor or Sunday school superintendent who has heard the recitation must certify officially to the board the success of the feat, and the Bible—a handsome edition, five by eight inches in size and elegantly bound in limp seal leather—will be forthcoming at once with the board's compliments to the young learner. It is an eminently wise educational scheme. The board could not spend money better.

—The Board of Education is getting out literature for "Vocation Day" this season. As The Continent has said before, Vocation Day is a "movable feast"—so exceptionally movable that the pastor and Sunday school superintendent in any congregation can move it wherever they happen to please. Or if they have no special preference, they can follow the preference of the board and use the first Sunday in February. But with all this freedom of choice, certainly every congregation ought to find a place somewhere in the year's calendar for Vocation Day—not because it is a "day" specially appointed, but because no church and no Sunday school can possibly do full duty by their young folks if at least once a year those young folks are not asked seriously to consider the principles on which in the fear of God they ought to choose their lifework.

—An autumn letter sent out to his people by Dr. Clokey of Dubuque strikes a note which might echo stimulatingly through all the churches: "Let us make this year a year of proving. Let us respond to the challenge of God, 'Prove me now herewith.' Let us make the proving along these lines: Is there power in prayer? Let us try it and see. Is there still a power in the gospel to change men's lives? Let us put it to the proof and see. Will God bless personal work and use us to win others for Christ? Let us make the experiment and find out. Is there still a comfort and power in the gathering of God's people together? We can find out only by putting it to the test."

—In the voting by conferences on the question of consolidating the United Brethren and the Methodist Protestant Churches, all the fourteen conferences in the latter body which have thus far considered the question have supported the proposal by votes virtually unanimous—seven of them absolutely without a voice in dissent. The United Brethren, however, have not been so markedly of one mind, and three of their conferences, including the strongest of them all—East Pennsylvania—have rejected the union idea outright.

—Marion M. Jackson of Atlanta, who has written such marvelously effective advertising for the Atlanta daily papers during the antivice crusade in that city and the penal reform crusade in the state, is now writing home mission advertising for the Home Board of the Southern Presbyterian Church. His work is being published by the board in the denominational papers. Mr. Jackson has made a splendid consecration of an altogether unusual talent.

—The United Temperance Societies of Sweden, which have for their national president Prince Oscar, brother of the reigning king, and which definitely propose the enactment of laws forbidding the liquor traffic throughout the realm, are said to be today the strongest single political group in the nation. The prophecy of competent observers is that national prohibition will be attained in Sweden within a comparatively brief period.

—Now it is Boston which holds the doubtless temporary honor of the finest Young Men's Christian Association building. The great new structure in that city, which hospitably received 20,000 guests the first day it was opened, is accepted for the present as the last word in Christian Association architecture.

Is Christian Unity a Dream?

BY CLELAND B. McAFEE

IT WAS UNDERSTOOD by the leaders of the Presbyterian hosts that the matter of organic union should not be openly debated when three General Assemblies were in session at Atlanta. But it was not their wish nor within their power to prevent, either in those separate gatherings or in the joint sessions of the three, discussion of church unity. That Atlanta occasion was a notable event, and there is danger that it may be taken as a matter of course before it has done its work with us.

Nearly thirty years ago Dr. A. B. Bruce observed with some distrust "the phenomenon of Pan-Presbyterianism" which had just then made its appearance, declaring frankly that he feared the movement would work in a purely antiquarian direction and would not serve the cause of catholicity. He hoped for a true "amphictyonic council" like that in which "men were not known as Athenians or Spartans, but as Greeks"—a council of churches where men would not be known as Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Methodists, but as Christians. Yet he was not sure that the era of such reconstruction had arrived. "Or is it ever to arrive? Is the day for catholic Christianity past?"

What has been the actual movement of the several decades since Dr. Bruce asked that question? Are we nearer the time when we can say, "I believe in the holy catholic church, the communion of saints"? Is it anything more than a dream, unsubstantial and impossible, that the churches of Christ shall become the Church of Christ here in the earth? Is there any sense in which we may hope for a truly catholic Christianity? In other words, what is such a meeting as that at Atlanta intended to accomplish, so far as we can read God's plan? Is it a step toward anything, and, if so, toward what?

There is danger that it may be used as evidence that church unity already exists and so it may check instead of advancing the main cause. I wish it were worth while to discuss whether the union of all the Presbyterian churches shall result next year, but it is far too early for that. The question is, What faith have we regarding it as an ultimate fact? Is that union to occur in its time? Is a wider union ever to be possible? Is the day for catholic Christianity past?

No Rigid Legalism Can Comprehend Christianity

Some things seem fairly certain. First, the day for catholic unity by mere organization is past. It was a dreary day in history when it existed and no enemy of the church could wish a worse calamity than that it might come again. There are two conceptions of the church: One, that it is an outward manifestation of an inward life; the other, that it is an organization into which life must be fitted. Protestantism insists upon the former—which is certainly the earlier conception of the church. Christianity is a live thing and makes its own organization in the nature of the case. It expresses itself in that form which it needs, to which it is led by the ever-present and living Spirit of God. There is no reason why we should hope for such a unity of organization as shall refuse the Christian faith its opportunity to express itself in various ways.

It is, however, this very principle which condemns such divisions as appeared at Atlanta. Here are churches expressing the one common Christian life, expressing that life in perfectly familiar ways, in ways so nearly identical that it is difficult to think of them apart, and yet remaining apart! Loyalty to history is beautiful, until it becomes forgetful of the present, pulsing life of the faith to which we all owe our chief loyalty.

Many of us, loyal sons of loyal fathers, look to the time—and it surely cannot be far distant—when the differences which now operate in the Presbyterian family will seem as unsubstantial for purposes of division as the difference between Old School and New School looks to us now. It seemed vastly important to our fathers, but there are not five men in a hundred in the Presbyterian ministry today, who have entered it since 1880, who could possibly tell what that difference was without looking it up. We should be glad to feel that thirty years from now our ministers would be as hard put to tell what were the differences that are today keeping Presbyterians of various names apart.

Creed Lines Must Not Be Counted Barrier Lines

Further, the time for catholic unity by mere creedal declaration is past. That also was a bad day for the church when there was one declaration of the Christian faith, and every man must stand to that or be set outside. The day is past not because creeds are unimportant, but exactly because they are so important. A layman has recently published a tract on church unity in which he says this strong word: "If I dare to maintain that I fully understand the infinite revelation by God of himself to man, I am driven to declare that you who differ from me are hopelessly wrong. But if I could only so far forget myself as to see that my conception of infinite truth can only be inadequate, I shall be able to see that your different conception may be the supplement to mine."

One of the most interesting results of the comparative study of the prevailing church creeds is the light which each throws on the others. There is far less difference than most people suppose. Moreover, we do not get on rapidly when our plan is to whittle down our creed till there is nothing in it, and therefore no ground for difference about it. From some points of view it is wise to say that we do not need simplifying creeds nearly so much as we need extending them. That is, we are not working toward church unity when we bring our creeds down to the last shreds of Christian faith, impoverishing all our thought and robbing our faith of its vitality. We work toward unity far better when we broaden and enrich our faith so that we take in the faith of other men and give their accent place within our creed.

Here, also, the churches represented at Atlanta find no excuse for continued division. Talk about vital differences in their creeds is forced. It would take no serious rewriting to make the creed of any one of them such that it would include all the others. The union would be in their affirmations; it is already there. In the truly united church, the creed will take in all of these branches with perfect ease. No revision downward is needed, but only revision outward, where already we gladly recognize each other as fellow believers.

Ceremonials Cannot Be Forced on Free Worshipers

Again, the day for catholic unity by ritual or ceremony is past. It is impossible that acceptance of this or that detail of ceremony or of sacrament can be the final way to unity in a living church. We are not quite so cheap as that, let us hope. Our differences are not of that sort. It has been necessary all through history to protest against magnifying a ritual or a ceremony into undue importance, but there has never been any necessity to refuse a ceremony or a ritual where it could serve the purposes of the Spirit.

There have been natural reactions. The early believers broke the heads off of figures built in temples in protest against making any image an object of worship. That was natural enough. But we have long ago found that our protest does not need to be against the ceremony or ritual, but against the compulsion of it, against any confusion between it and the spirit of the believer. Most of us can see the folly of pretending that God has hinged any of his blessings on the doing of this or that minute thing, no matter how big our talk is about it. We shall never come together on the basis of ritual or ceremony.

Fortunately Presbyterians are not much given to pettiness in this regard. We may prefer psalms or hymns or even spiritual songs, but it is incredible that we can long make such a matter cause for division.

Neither mere organization, nor mere creedal declaration, nor mere ritual and ceremony opens the way to catholic Christianity. Yet the day for that good result seems nearer than ever. The day for true unity by service of a common purpose is here already. It is the presence of the common task that shames our divisions. Imagine trying to make Chicago a Christian city by having all the Presbyterians fight for the things that they want and the Methodists for the things they want, as though they differed in what they want for Chicago! Imagine making New York city a Christian city by making it wholly Baptist or wholly Episcopalian! The man who can face the cities of America and pretend that his church alone is adequate to the task is not facing them at all, but only pretending to do it.

Then there is the world task. The Presbyterian Church contra mundum? Not if we see the world—proud and sure as we are of the Presbyterian Church! Rather, we must use our differences, when we attack the common problem, as instruments of efficiency. We are so many mobilized forces available for use in a common warfare.

So is the day for catholic unity by one common spirit upon us now. It is our own fault and our shame that we hold back from entering into that day. No church's spirit is bound to its organization or to its distinctively creedal expression or to its ceremony and ritual. It would be folly to pretend that there are not men of equal spiritual power in churches which differ widely in all these matters. The thing that makes them powerful is that they have yielded in their own spirits to the one mighty Spirit of God. With the empowering of that Spirit they can live under any organization and work under any creed that voices God's truth and worship through any ritual or ceremony that gives their hearts full swing.

The Spirit of Love Alone Can Produce a Real Unity

At this point, of devotion to one common cause and dependence on one Holy Spirit, we are not divided. We need only to be true to that unity, refusing to clutter it with factitious differences, scorning to challenge the faith of men who worship at the same cross and bow before the same Redeemer. The first step before us is surely to bring together in an actual, visible, organic union all those churches which belong together by reason of their trifling differences. The years ought not to be many until we shall think it strange that the beautiful fellowship at Atlanta was the most beautiful thing of which we were then capable—when we shall not need to point out how united we are, because we shall be actually, openly, decisively united. The next steps we can take along with that one, developing the wider fellowships and being so conspicuously brotherly with all who bear the name of our Master that if they fail of brotherliness the shame will be on their own heads. It is love that wins.

Against Foreign Dress for Chinese

Very good reasons can be adduced for the return to the use of national costume by those Chinese who had discarded it in favor of foreign dress, says a writer in The North China Herald.

The Chinese are an ordinary common-sense race of people (notwithstanding what clever writers have to say about the country being "a complex problem" and its inhabitants "an enigma") and they are not slow to see the reason of things and learn the lesson of experience.

When, about three years ago, the movement first started to promote the adoption of the European style of dress and foreign ways and manners, there was very great enthusiasm among a certain section of reformers, and it must be admitted there was also very little sense and much absurdity.

For a time the vogue found many followers, especially among the young "bloods" of the coast towns. But when it came to be reckoned up that the cost of foreign apparel for a single season could purchase Chinese clothes to suffice for twelve months' wear, there was a very decided falling off in the fashion. And as this copying was most conspicuously practiced by those persons who were least acquainted with foreign customs and manners the results were generally ludicrous in the extreme and, far from being objects of admiration and respect to their fellow countrymen, these ardent "reformers" were more often the victims of their ridicule. More recent cases of a return to the national costume indicate a stronger confidence in the prestige of the nation.

The cutting of the cue synchronized with the adoption of the foreign dress, but its widespread permanence as a reform, if it could be so named in contrast to its vis-a-vis, is traceable to the revolution of 1911, when the bulk of the people were given no choice in the matter. If there was any choice, it was a choice between losing their cues and losing their heads, and of course they preferred the former. The discarding of the cue was in its first days a decided affront to the æsthetic sense; but consideration of hygiene and cleanliness soon reconciled lovers of the picturesque to its practical extinction.

A Prayer of Those Who Wait

For vision of the truth we praise thee, Lord,
And, in the battle thus enjoined, we cry for strength.
Give us, whose victory is to wait serenely
Thy appointed time,
The power to fill the common task brimful of love and cheery faith.
Or, if our hands lie folded to thy bidding, when all within us cries to serve,
Keep thou the vision clear, our heart unshaken.
'Stablish our will and, for thy name's sake and the comfort of our conscience,
Grant us through patient hope, the gift of peace.

MABEL ADDIS BEACH.

Wider Vision Through the Religious Paper

BY CORNELIUS M. STEFFENS

A FEW WEEKS AGO I heard a prominent minister of Iowa preach an excellent sermon on the enlarged vision for the Christian church. He said that we were too apt to become local in our conception of the kingdom of God; that the kingdom is not only a tremendous local fact, but it takes in the state, the United States of America and the whole world. It is true that Christ commanded us to begin at Jerusalem, but our work is also "in Judea, Samaria and the uttermost parts of the world." The sermon was comprehensive and forceful. The three lessons emphasized were these: First, that the church is a part of God's kingdom; second, that we must keep informed as to what the kingdom is accomplishing in the state, nation and the world, through discriminating reading of current events and learning what the church is doing through the religious press; third, that our prayers should not be exclusively local, but that they should contain an earnest petition that God's kingdom may come throughout the world.

It was encouraging to hear a minister plead for the religious press. This pastor was not an agent who was sent out to obtain subscribers, but a man who, with all the conviction of his heart, felt the need of keeping in close touch with what the church is accomplishing. If every minister in the Presbyterian Church would devote one Sunday to an address on Christian literature, the religious weekly would have a more important place in the life of the church.

During the months not long passed I have attended meetings of presbyteries, synod and General Assembly, but I have not heard a paper or a discussion on the value of the religious press. As far as I have learned, there was only one gathering during the year where this topic was discussed. I have the pleasure of stating that it took place during the German convention held in Dubuque. It seems to me that this is a subject worthy to be discussed by ministers and laymen at their ecclesiastical meetings.

The religious weekly has a molding power in the life of the church. Able and thoroughly educated religious thinkers are devoting their lives to editorial writing. Many men and women are employed in writing stories and educational papers, and are giving their best thought to the proper presentation of Christian truth. This army, which is rarely heralded throughout the church, has much to do with molding the thought of the church and accomplishing transcendent good to mankind. The circulation of these publications aggregates thousands and constitutes an important item in the spiritual life of the nation. No one can measure their educational value.

A church that is deeply interested in these religious forces should demand a high standard of its religious press. I think it worth while for the church to consider more carefully what kind of religious paper should be circulated among its people.

These papers have for their object the dissemination of religious news and the giving of instruction in important questions that are before the church. It is instructive to follow the editorials as they appear. This page is probably read with more eagerness by ministers and elders. The contributed articles have their interest for those who want general information on Biblical, historical, devotional and missionary subjects. Articles with illustrations of China, India, the progress of the Orient, are also extremely interesting and profitable. Active business men have told me of the value of descriptive articles of world-wide interest which have appeared in one paper of the best type. The carefully prepared perspective of current events is exceedingly helpful to the busy man who does not find much time for reading or who is bewildered by the unorganized facts presented in the daily papers. Mothers, too, must appreciate the fascinating stories of child life and nature study which appear regularly in these publications; so every department has its educational value. The news department of the kingdom of God is surely necessary if we are to keep in touch with the life of the church. The stories of real life and experiences of the courageous Christian men and women are inspiring. They awaken a deeper human interest in the development of the kingdom.

A greater interest in the religious paper that really fulfills its functions is an obligation which ministers and laymen owe to the men and women who are devoting their lives to this branch of church work. Every minister owes it to his own responsibilities to seek to interest his community to have at least one religious weekly in every home. In this way the gospel may be preached to multitudes who are not now under a definite religious influence in that most important phase of their interests—the literature they read from day to day.

Religion Not Barred at Girard

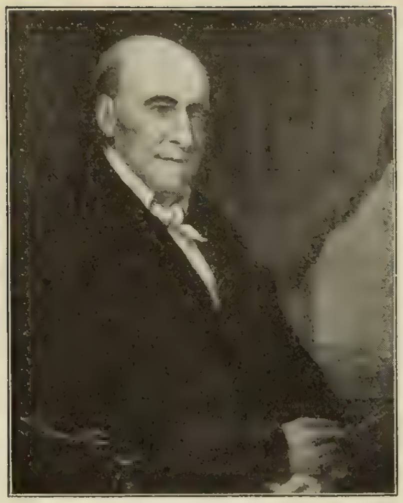
BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS, Editor Afield of The Continent



Stephen Girard
After portrait by Otis

THE LARGEST orphanage in the world never lacks for money. It makes no public appeal for anything, and to be one of its graduates carries none of the stigma which sometimes attaches to an asylum. The average American family cannot give its sons the comforts and luxuries and the training which the boys in Girard College receive. This is not only the largest orphanage in the world, but it is also certainly the most distinctive in many particulars. Devised in the famous will of the eccentric philanthropist, Stephen Girard, who for a long period was America's richest man and foremost banker, the institution has for various reasons won a unique place in public interest, and there are many curious misapprehensions concerning it. The college was actively opened in 1848 with 10 students. Since that time something more than 8,500 students have gone out into life from within that celebrated ten-foot wall, and today there are over 1,500 boys in residence. All must enter between the ages of 6 and 10, and must leave at the age of 18. There is a waiting list of from 600 to 800 boys.

Conditions of entrance are prescribed by the will, which states that the institution is for the care of "poor, white, orphan boys." It took the ablest legal minds of the country to determine the meaning of the word "orphan," which was settled to be a boy without a father. Thus most of the boys in the college have mothers living. First claim upon the college is given to boys born within the old city of Philadelphia, the territory lying between Vine street and South street and between the Delaware and Schuylkill rivers. Next in order of precedence come boys born elsewhere in Pennsylvania, and after these boys born in New York and New Orleans. But the latter are practically never reached because of the Pennsylvania claimants.

Girard College partakes of the character of a boarding school rather than of an orphanage. It has a staff of 428 persons to care for the boys; and that they are not without personal woman-touch is indicated by the fact that there are twenty-two governesses.

The wealth of Girard College has been the envy of charitable workers the world round. Mr. Girard bequeathed it $6,000,000, but the endowment is about $29,000,000, owing to the increase of values, for Stephen Girard left not only valuable Pennsylvania lands containing coal, but also a large section of property in the center of Philadelphia; more than one skyscraper now ministers to the orphans. This $29,000,000 is exclusive of the plant itself, which is valued at somewhat above $5,000,000. It is estimated that it costs something more than $2,500 to care for the average boy during his term in the college. The annual expenditure is nearly $700,000. This gigantic trust is in the care of the Board of Directors of City Trusts, who manage it without remuneration, and there never has been a scandal in connection with its vast responsibility. It is the pride of some of Philadelphia's foremost men that they are members of the board of which the distinguished Presbyterian layman, General Louis Wagner, is president. Tourists always want to visit Girard. It is a wonderful world in itself. A codicil in the will placed it on the Peel Hill farm of forty acres, then far outside of the city, but now surrounded entirely by solidly built up Philadelphia. The great gray wall has only one entrance, and the boys are thoroughly isolated. The passer-by, peering through the gate, sees first the famous main building, the best model of a Greek temple to be seen in America. Within this building is now the Girard Museum, replete with relics of the founder. Twenty buildings are inside of the wall. Heat, light and power all come from the college plant.

This miniature world has many of the problems of every community, such as consideration of health. In 1911 there was not a single death among the 1,500 boys, which is truly amazing when it is recalled that a considerable percentage of them must have inherited the father's frailty which orphaned them so early in life. At present the death rate, which has been steadily decreasing throughout the history of the institution, is 1.3 per thousand. The freedom of the institution from the epidemics which usually afflict childhood is really remarkable. Of course there is a resident physician, in addition to the supervising physician from outside of the house, and a beautiful infirmary, which would almost tempt a lazy boy to malingering. Three dentists are continuously employed.

Playgrounds are as extensive as one would expect from such a wealthy institution. The play is organized and supervised, with yet liberty for the expression of personality. The boys in Girard College differ as greatly as boys in any town. In athletics they have all the games that the seasons call for, and the Girard College Cadets, in their striking gray uniforms, have often been compared favorably with the boys of West Point. The college band is one of the prides of the city.

As in every home, the problem of shelter and food is succeeded by that of education. The first aim of Stephen Girard was to fit these boys to bear worthily their part in life. The educational system within the walls approximates as closely as possible to the best educational usages outside. There are three schools—a primary, grammar and high. Instruction is given in bookkeeping, office practice, commercial law, shorthand and typewriting. The mechanical boys have opportunity for courses in mechanical drawing, carpentry and woodworking, machine shop practice, electrical construction, foundry work and smithing. Here again the equipment is so lavish and elaborate that the millionaire could buy nothing better for his own son.

To the average educator it must seem like a tale from fairyland to hear of an institution where the teachers have all the equipment they want. Thus, the professor of physics has not only the usual apparatus, but also a stereopticon, an X-ray apparatus, a moving picture machine and equipment for displaying the wonders of liquid air. The president has lately suggested to the board the advisability of an agricultural annex to the college, with perchance a school ship also, to carry out the ideals of the great mariner merchant whose foresight made Girard College possible.

It is easier to talk about a remarkable enterprise like this as an institution rather than in the terms of life. How human it all is appears as one looks upon the boys on the playground and in the dining room. These boys are not the cowed, conventionalized product of an orphanage, such as Dickens portrayed. Health and wholesomeness are written on their faces. Their attention at chapel is really almost perfect, and it is an experience in public speaking for a man to address this unparalleled company.

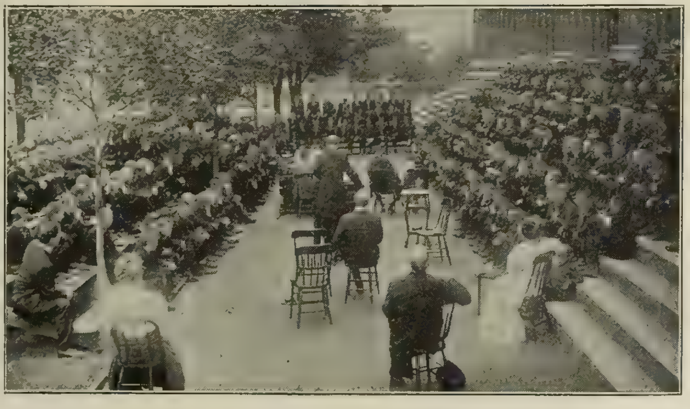
The Main Building

To the man visitor the great dining room, with its long table of snowy linen and its napkin by each plate, is the most interesting sight in the college, but a woman is more interested in the wonders of that huge, scientific kitchen, rivaling the most spotless domain of a New England housewife in its immaculateness. Imagine the problem of satisfying those vigorous appetites three times a day! When it comes to mealtime nine-tenths of the people of Philadelphia could profitably change seats with the Girard College boys. Looking over the steward's report for this year, one gets an idea of what the provisioning of such an institution means. The fact that there are 110 separate kinds of food on the list is revealing. There are few households that boast any such varied menus as this. As to quantities, it is worth remarking that last year the boys in Girard College ate 244,294 pounds of beef, including everything from sirloin steak to corned beef and chucks. Space forbids any analysis of the menu except for a mention of 1,400 pounds of scrapple, a Philadelphia delicacy whose very name is unknown to all-wise Boston and the rest of the country.

Christian Gentlemen on the Teaching Staff

But we have the best authority for it that life is more than meat. It takes more than food and clothes and school and creature comforts to make a boy a man. Unless he have personal oversight and solicitude and vigor, all the rest will count for naught. Here I want to make the most remarkable statement of all concerning this immense home for boys. Many or most of the adults in charge, if not all, really do care for the boys. I have gone through the infirmary with the president and his interest in the little fellows was never perfunctory or assumed; and their frank, confiding friendship spoke more eloquently the story of Girard College than books or speeches could do. It chances that among the professors in Girard are several personal friends, and I can vouch for them as Christian gentlemen, with a deep and personal interest in their boys. One of them has long been an active official in the organization called the Knights of King Arthur's Round Table.

"Why is a preacher like a trolley car?" was an original conundrum asked by Dr. William Patterson, then pastor of Bethany Presbyterian church. His answer was "Because he cannot go through Girard College." The allusion was, first, to the fact that the city has never given right of way through these forty acres to the means of public transportation; and, secondly, to the most famous fact about Girard College, namely, the prohibition against any minister of the gospel entering its walls. It is the commonest remark that one hears about the famous institution. Whatever else an American knows or does not know about it, if he has heard of it at all he is aware of that particular provision in the will which bars the gates to all ministers. This fact has developed into an amazing and widespread belief that Girard College is thoroughly atheistic, and that a copy of the Bible is never allowed within its walls.



Outdoor Sunday Service at Girard College

When I suggested to the president that Continent readers might be interested in the Girard College story he at once jumped to this point, asking that I make it clear, for it is the one subject upon which the management is most sensitive. He turned over to me a bunch of letters from graduates, including a sample inquiry from a minister up state, who is concerned lest one of his boys should lose the faith of his parents by taking advantage of the benevolence of Stephen Girard. Only a few months ago one of the most widely circulated American magazines repeated this old slander that the college is a thoroughly atheistic institution. In the days when the heirs of Stephen Girard were trying to break the will, this issue was naturally discussed. Girard, living in a day of religious controversy, stipulated that he wanted to keep the minds of the orphans free from sectarian bitterness and strife. He uttered no word against religion nor against any sect.

Now let me pile up some facts which should answer completely and forever in the minds of every reader of this article this question of the religion of Girard College. The first book taken into its walls was the Bible. There is never a meal eaten in the college without the invocation of the divine blessing. There is a daily chapel service, attended by all the boys, at which the Bible is read and Christian hymns are sung. There are two services on Sunday, as distinctly Christian as any held anywhere, the only difference from other church or college service being that the speaker is a layman. Judges, educators, bankers, publicists and business men who stand high in the councils and confidence of the Christian church are the speakers at these beautiful services.

College President a Presbyterian Elder

Moreover, the president of the Board of City Trusts, who has held this post for many years, General Wagner, is an elder in the Market Square Presbyterian church of Germantown. The president of the college, Dr. Cheeseman A. Herrick, is also a Presbyterian elder, a man of fine spirit and deep religious devotion. Furthermore, every president of the college has been an active churchman. The first, Hon. Joel Jones, was a Presbyterian elder. The second, William H. Allen, was a lay preacher of the Methodist Episcopal church. The predecessor of Dr. Herrick, President Fetterolf, was a vestryman of the Protestant Episcopal church.

Dr. Herrick has himself written upon this point interestingly in one of his reports: "The surprise of a newly elected president of Girard College may well be imagined when he was greeted by a saintly woman of his acquaintance with expressions of pleasure that he was to come to the institution. 'For,' said she, 'if the boys of Girard College are not to have the Bible, I am at least glad that they are to have one who believes in the Bible.' When a group of students from the college recently made a visit to the national capital, one widely circulated newspaper in chronicling their presence commented on the fact that the name of the Deity was never permitted to be spoken within the gates of the college. In 1912, when the president of Girard College was at Pittsburg in attendance on the council of churches holding the Presbyterian system, comment was made by the editor of a religious weekly that the regulations at Girard College must have been modified to have one who was recognized as a Christian installed there as a president. A pronounced atheist a few years ago came to the college and having secured entrance within its inclosure, he gave an expression of exultation in the statement: 'At last I have reached a place where the Bible is not permitted to come.'"

While we are making a case, we may as well go further and report that when the names of 568 of the graduates were recently scrutinized it was found that there were seventeen Christian ministers in the roll. From a theological seminary one wrote recently: "It gives me the greatest pleasure to tell you of the influence the religious training at Girard College had upon me, for it was there I received my first practical knowledge of the Bible; there I learned my first lessons in religious truths, and there I laid the foundation for whatever religious character I possess." This graduate supplements his experience, preacher-fashion, with a little homily: "As I look back upon those early days and rehearse once more those Bible lessons taught me by my governess and go through the chapel exercises and hear the instructions so lovingly given to us on Sunday mornings and Sunday afternoons, I can but wish that all children everywhere could go through the same excellent system of training, for I am sure the result would be better men and better women."

From another theological seminary the professor of systematic theology, an alumnus of Girard, writes: "It has been my joy to affirm that in no institution for boys or young men, within my knowledge and observation, is there a more uniform or persistent, a more reverent and studious effort to impart to the students a high moral ideal and genuine religious life than in Girard College. This remains clearly in my mind—that officially and personally, in public service and private counsel, there was evidenced a steady purpose to do the highest and best in morals and religion for the boys."

One of the recent issues of the college paper reports a farewell to a recent graduate who is going to India as a foreign missionary.

This unique philanthropy, so distinctively American in many of its elements, has kept alive the memory of the French boy who served with such vigor the country of his adoption and whose affection for the community with which his lot had been cast was so tenacious. Over the life of Stephen Girard grim shadows were cast: The insanity of his wife, the death in infancy of his only child, the disfigurement of his features by the loss of an eye—these are more likely to be gossiped about than the big facts to be recognized. When yellow fever afflicted Philadelphia in 1793 he was the most reckless of his own welfare in the ministry to the stricken and the dying. His fleet of merchant ships helped give America its ancient prestige on the seas. It was his immense bank account that came to the government's aid in 1814; and city, state and union have cause to remember with gratitude this old "merchant and mariner."

That the historian John Bach McMaster has in preparation an authoritative life of Stephen Girard is news of importance to all America, for the fame of this successful philanthropist has been often spotted by gossip. Fairness demands that in orderly proportion and perspective his character and career should be set forth in American literature.

A Friend for Boston's Girlhood

BY WILLIAM HORTON FOSTER

CURFEW BELLS—and, no doubt, stronger repressive measures—will be found unnecessary in communities which have "street matrons," women who need no police power to make their work effective. They need no uniforms—not even a badge of authority. For the past few months a quiet lady has frequented those streets and cafes of Boston where girls commonly gather to their danger and, aided by no authority except that of friendliness, has turned many a girl back into the safer ways.

Mrs. Tyler of Boston—a Woman Who Loves Girls

The women of the Florence Crittenden League of Compassion have become familiar with the needs of the unfortunate girl. They hoped, however, to supplement their service for the Magdalens by a more effective service for innocent girls. So these wise women rented an apartment overlooking the Fenway and furnished it like a home. Then they found Mrs. Florence E. Tyler, a woman who knew girls and loved them. They made it her business to go every night where girls go, to help any girl who seems to need a friend. Mrs. Tyler named her apartment "The Shelter," and it has proved a veritable haven to many a girl bewildered by the strange winds and currents of what had seemed to be a pleasant summer sea.

Mrs. Tyler works by no rules except those of friendship. If she thinks a girl needs her, she speaks to her; but if you should ask her what she says or how she says it, she could not tell you. In speaking of her various girl friends—she has no "cases"—and how she met them she would say, "Well, I don't remember what I said, but the girl knew I was her friend."

The girls know she is their friend. If there is a formula for the work it lies in those words. Because she is their friend she is ready to render any service a friend could render. One girl might need a job, another a boarding place; one might need a friendly escort along an unfriendly street. More trying duties concern those girls whose need lies deeper. Here she finds a girl just venturing with uncertain step into the path which is so easy to enter and so hard to leave. She must be warned, and warned in such a way that she will heed. Here is a reckless girl impatient of control who will listen to no home pleading and has no use for the old-fashioned counsels of mother. Mrs. Tyler is sent for, and can tell her how so many other girls have felt the same impatience, have felt the same call of glittering pleasure, and have eventually paid the price all must pay unless checked in time. Sometimes she is listened to, sometimes she is not. But she is ready to serve, and many a mother thanks God for Mrs. Tyler.

Sometimes a girl who has loved unwisely but deeply and who needs the strong arm of a friend is a guest at the Shelter while she catches her breath and gets back her grip on life. Mrs. Tyler stands ready at that critical time when her friend must make the readjustments and settle new relationships. Then despair is always at the elbow and a friend close at hand is a friend indeed. There are so many things to be done for girls that Mrs. Tyler has no moments of leisure and the Shelter has no closed door.

Possibly she could not do so much if she had rules and systems to live up to. She has no committee to whom she has to report "cases" and ask for instructions. She has just her individual problems—what to do to help Mary and Gertrude and Annie or how to back up Jennie's mother, or how to save Maud from herself. She does the immediate thing there is to do. Annie may need clothes; if so Annie finds the things she needs ready for her when she comes out of her bath in the Shelter. The thing Gertrude ought to have more than anything may be a visit to the Art Museum or even to the opera with a real, well-dressed lady—she needs to have her self-respect restored. They go to the opera together; when Mrs. Tyler introduces Gertrude to her friends it is always as a friend—a peer of other friends. Poor little Mary needs a friend to take the place of the father or mother, to the betrayed loving, but stern to the betrayer.

This is Mrs. Tyler's work. Her society rents the apartment, furnished it, pays her salary and supplies her a liberal expense account. She could not work without the backing of the organization, but certainly the organization could not work without Mrs. Tyler or some one of her kind. While Boston's street matron is saving Boston's girlhood in her own unofficial way, she is careful to enlist the aid of the police. They welcome and support her work. Before she goes into a precinct she visits its captain and explains her purpose. The rest is easy; it is simply the question, "What can I do to help?"

What has been done in Boston by Mrs. Tyler can be done in any community. Without waiting for the creation of a sentiment demanding the employment by the municipality of woman police officers any woman's club can support such an efficient friendliness active for the guarding of girlhood. Indeed in many respects Boston's street matron performs a function that no policewoman could do. In no way does she call attention to herself or to her mission. She carefully refrains from going often into one section. She has no desire to be known as "the woman who is looking after the girls." No two nights in succession see her in the same vicinity. She wanders from one end of the city to another—the whole city is her parish and she would be a friend to every girl in the city if she could.

Some Points for Modern Organists

It is commonly supposed by the general public that the church organist's work consists in the playing of two routine services and a rehearsal during the week, says Dr. William C. Carl, organist of First church of New York City and director of the Guilmant Organ School. How different are the conditions today! An organist should be a man of broad culture, one that can play a good service, conduct either a quartet, a mixed chorus or boy choir. Then he must be competent to conduct and accompany the standard oratorios and cantatas from the organ bench, play an acceptable organ recital, be a good disciplinarian, competent to select voices, and be constantly on the alert to arrange music that will be appropriate, not only for the festivals, but for the regular weekly work. He must be familiar with the liturgical forms of church music and should know more than one service. The machinery necessary to keep a choir in working order requires a level head and much time and care expended, making it more necessary for an all round education than ever.

THE HOME COUNCIL

A Sunday School Thanksgiving

BY ELIZABETH L. GEBHARD

THE SPIRIT of Thanksgiving, awakening us all, grown-ups, boys and girls, alike, to a realization of how infinitely much we had to be thankful for, had crept into our Sunday school, and for several weeks the school had been practicing patriotic songs at the beginning of each session. For we were preparing to celebrate in an entirely new way this year.

By the Saturday before Thanksgiving week, the practical end of the celebration was under full headway. All that afternoon the children poured in, loaded down with vegetables and fruit and clothing for the poor. The minister's little girl brought jelly for the sick, with her vegetables, and a bunch a parsley to flavor soup. A wagon drove up with three great bags of potatoes holding a barrel apiece, from the young men's Bible class. The primary children brought cereals and canned fruit, oranges and bananas, and they also added vegetables to their gifts.

An unusual sound in the vestibule brought all the children in a rush to the door. A live rooster and a handsome chicken, in separate crates, were being brought in, and the rooster was pompously announcing his own arrival. There was a steady stream of arrivals and contributions all the afternoon. As fast as the gifts of each class appeared, they were utilized for decorations. Alternate deep windows held the crates containing the chicken and rooster, flanked by cabbages and squashes, while the window frames were fringed with long sprays of bittersweet and cobs of yellow corn.

Other alternate windows held each a huge yellow pumpkin surrounded with smaller vegetables, while the end window, over the heads of a class of juniors, was banked high with bags of flour, dishes, and great piles of vegetables and canned fruit. From this window straight across the long platform to the primary exhibit a long line of brilliant colored apples, oranges, bananas, squashes, pumpkins and a variety of vegetables lay in heaps on the floor, or elevated high in baskets on stands.

Directly in front of the superintendent's desk one organized class had thrown its banner lightly on top of a generous contribution. The desk itself presented a picturesque sight, with two large pumpkins and the bunch of parsley for ornamentation. In the farthest corner of the room was a great shock of corn. Thus when the school arrived on Sunday it found the assembly room trimmed for Thanksgiving.

There is nothing to compare with the joy of a school gathered together in a mutual spirit of generous giving and loving helpfulness. The face of teacher and scholar wore a smile. Guests were made royally welcome, and the primary room had a row of toddlers, mere babies, come to rejoice with the rest. The city missionary nurse was there also, enjoying with the school the Sabbath Thanksgiving, and ready to distribute the offered largess to her poor people the next day.

OCTOBER

Bending above the spicy woods which blaze,
Arch skies so blue they flash, and hold the sun
Immeasurably far; the waters run
Too slow, so freighted are the river-ways
With gold of elms and birches from the maze
Of forests. Chestnuts, clicking one by one,
Escape from satin burs; her fringes done,
The gentian spreads them out in sunny days,
And, like late revelers at dawn, the chance
Of one sweet, mad, last hour, all things assail,
And conquering, flush and spin; while, to enhance
The spell, by sunset door, wrapped in a veil
Of red and purple mists, the summer, pale,
Steals back alone for one more song and dance.
—Helen Hunt Jackson.

A pause came in the happy babel, and the session was opened by singing van Dyke's—

"O Lord our God, thy mighty hand
Hath made our country free."

Then the school read responsively: "The earth is Jehovah's, and the fullness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein."

The prayer was offered by a missionary from China, and was full of thanksgiving for the blessings of the homeland, and that the worship of God was spreading across the seas.

It might have seemed inopportune, on any other occasion, for a pause to be occupied by the rooster's ringing crow, but the spirit of the celebration possessed the school, and no one was troubled or even amused by Chanticleer's jubilation. Indeed, one of the teachers was heard to quote afterwards: "Let everything that hath breath praise the Lord."

The recitation which followed told of the first Thanksgiving in America, called by Governor Bradford, and attended by both white and red men.

"Thy love divine hath led us in the past,
In this free land by thee our lot is cast;
Be thou our ruler, guardian, guide and stay—
Thy word our law, thy paths our chosen way," came next most appropriately. Then came an exercise: "The four foundations of our national life—the home, the school, the church, and the state."

With the young girl who told of the home stood a tiny baby brother, while three taller juniors spoke of the school and church and state.

"Faith of our fathers, living still,
In spite of dungeon, fire, and sword" stirred the hearts of all who sang it.

"Our brothers" came next—the Indian, the highlander, the negro, the alien.

With brotherly love in their hearts the school sang:

"America! America!
God shed his grace on thee,
And crown thy good with brotherhood,
From sea to shining sea."

A generous offering of money was made at this point by many in the school, and with a few earnest words from the pastor, the joyous occasion, with one more jubilant crow from the rooster, a national tribute this time, was brought to a close by the school singing "America."

In the heart of every child there had been born before the service closed a sense of all our country has to be thankful for; of what we owe in praise to God, and in love and helpfulness to our brothers on every side. For all who participated in it, this Sunday school Thanksgiving was a day to be long remembered.

She Worked the Problem

"Suppose," said the teacher to Tim, "your mamma sent you to the store to buy three pounds of lamb, two pounds of potatoes, half a pound each of carrots and turnips and one pound of tomatoes—what would you have then?"

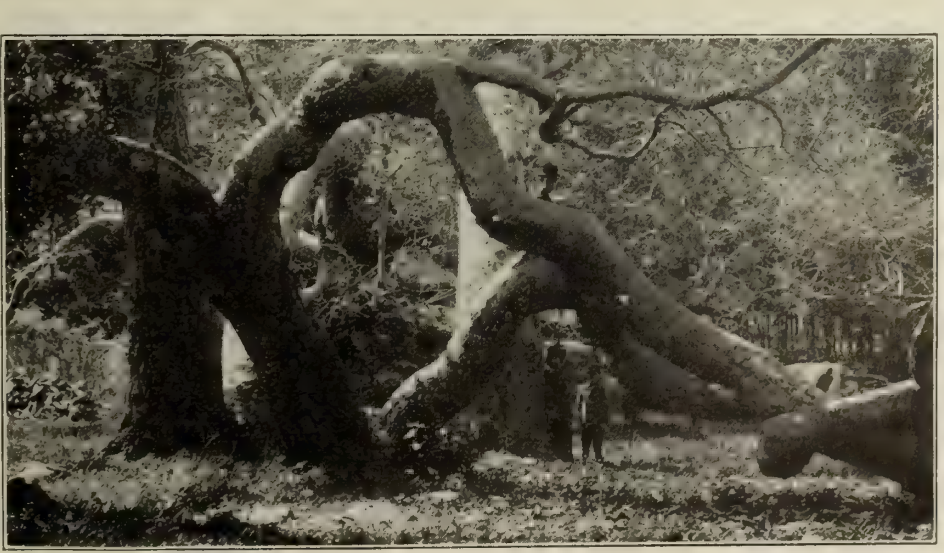
Tim shook his head, but Marybell, only a year older, raised her eager hand.

"Well, Marybell," said the teacher, with a sorrowful glance at little Tim.

"Stew!" said Marybell, sweetly.

The Discontented Sycamore

By Stanley A. Hunter



MANY TREES seem to take almost personal pride in standing erect. Created to point upward, they fulfill their mission loyally, lifting skyward, in storm and sunshine, undaunted heads. The pine tree, striking sturdy roots into the scant soil of the mountain side, still stretching bravely toward the sky above, has come to be a symbol of the storm-tossed soul which lifts the eye of faith to God.

Not so the sycamore. It is at times his pleasure to defeat the divine aim; to pursue a different method of development from his kin. Then does he become a veritable contortionist, twisting himself, in his effort to find a new way of life, out of all semblance to his kind. The sycamore pictured was one of these. He had a fair start and an equal chance with the mates beside him. In his early youth he was straight, erect, fine. But presently he grew discontented. To be just an ordinary, sky-reaching sycamore did not please him. To have a single aim was not enough. To develop along conventional lines was weariness. So this sycamore took a turn in a different direction. He ceased to grow upward and outward; instead, he began gradually to turn downward. The distortion that resulted you see.

To lack the single aim means failure. Burns lacked it, with sad results. But the life that looks steadily upward, according to divine intent, cannot fail.

YOUNG AMERICA

Uncle Abel's Sheep Thief

BY MABEL S. MERRILL

"IF I HAD anybody to depend on but a spindling city chap, I woudn't have a bear stealing my sheep. That's the fourth one missing!" Uncle Abel Stillsan spoke fretfully from his sick bed in the room off the kitchen, and his nephew Mac, the "spindling city chap," heard every word. He knew that his uncle thought he ought to go up to the sheep pasture by the old quarry and shoot the bear that several persons declared they had seen, but whose close acquaintance nobody seemed anxious to make. Mac could shoot well at a target, but hunting in the woods was new to him and he had never even been in the quarry pasture from which the missing sheep had disappeared.

"What sort of a place is it up there, uncle?" he called, after an uncomfortable pause.

"Why, it's a bushy kind of a hole at the foot of Tuckerman's mountain. It's years since I was up there"—the invalid thumped his pillows impatiently—"but it's no place to be scared of, as I remember it. There's an old granite quarry up in the side of the hill, and Dip Fowler says that at the back of the quarry there's a hole like the mouth of a cave. He expects it's where the bear lugs the sheep after he's killed 'em."

Mac sat down on the woodbox and looked at his boots.

"Anybody live up that way?" he inquired after another pause.

"Only a shiftless family of some kind of foreigners, but it's not them that's been stealing the sheep. Dip says they're harmless as rabbits and scared to death of breaking the laws. Any folks with the spunk of a mouse would 'a' had that bear 'fore this time."

The subject was dropped till after breakfast, and then Dip Fowler came in with Billy, Uncle Abel's 10-year-old son, at his heels. Billy was crying bitterly in the sleeve of his jumper, and Dip reported that another sheep was missing, a yearling lamb this time—Billy's very own Snowdrop.

"I took a stroll up through that way pretty early," Dip explained, "and I hunted up your sheep and counted 'em. Yes, sir, Snowdrop's gone, and what's more, I clapped my eyes on the chap that got her."

"The bear?" demanded Mac in some excitement.

"Certainly I did—big, dark-colored beast, hipperin' along through the bushes. I tell you he looked wicked! I'm thinkin' we'd better drum up some of the neighbors an' have a bear hunt."

Mac thought about that bear while he did the chores at the barn. By the time the last cow was fed he had made up his mind. A sheep owner couldn't be expected to wait until the neighbors organized a bear hunt. He'd go out at once, of course, to save the flock. To be sure, he wasn't the owner himself, but he was the next thing to it, and what a joke it would be if the "spindling city chap" should bag the game all by himself! That a bear hunt was a foolhardy undertaking for a boy of 15 who knew nothing about bears didn't occur to him.

He found the old quarry without much trouble. It was simply an upstanding ledge in the side of the mountain, but it had been hollowed out to a sort of shell by blasting. Vines and chokecherry bushes were growing in dense tangles against the face of the broken rock and one such tangle shaded the ragged hole at the back of the quarry.

"That's the hole Dip told about," thought Mac; "the one that goes into a cave, he thinks. No wonder he'd rather talk about it than go and find out. Wish I knew whether the bear was in there now or not."

He crept up toward the hole and tried to peer in, but the thicket hid what was beyond. He noticed as he examined the tangle that the bushes were stripped of both leaves and fruit as high up as the nibbling sheep could reach.

"That's what they were doing down here when the bear grabbed them," Mac decided. He stood looking at the hole in the rock, fascinated, but knowing it would be foolish to creep into that narrow place if there were really a bear inside. And yet it was such a good chance. Besides, he hadn't come up there to be frightened away from his game before he had even seen it.

"A 'spindling city chap' ought to be able to slip in there all right," he muttered, and with cautious foot he finally stole past the chokecherry thicket to the opening in the rock.

The bushes made it so dark that even when he came near it was hard to see what was ahead.

Suddenly he heard a noise among the pasture thickets close at hand. It seemed a fearful noise in the stillness of that solitary place. Mac had no idea what kind of noise bears make, but the sight of a large dark body lumbering vigorously through the bushes was too much for his self-control. The beast was behind him, cutting off his escape by way of the pasture. Acting on an impulse, he hid in the crevice of the rock, not pausing to reflect that this was the most absurd thing he could do in case the hole turned out to be the bear's den.

However, he soon saw that it was not. Turning an angle of the rock, he caught a gleam of light and knew that the place was not a cave, but merely an opening made through the back of the ledge by the workers in the old quarry. The noise behind him came again, much louder than before. The boy gave a sudden start forward, lost his footing, fell through the opening and slid down a short, smooth slant of rock.

By good luck he reached the bottom without discharging his gun or doing any serious damage to his clothes. He rubbed his eyes and stared around. He had dropped into a cuplike hollow behind the ledge—a curious freak in hill formation. There was short grass at the bottom of the cup, but the rocky rim was steep and bare, without a break. Around him were all the lost sheep, huddling together with wistful looks at their chance visitor. Snowdrop came and nudged him softly with her nose.

Then he discovered that he was sitting in a mass of overripe chokecherries that had come rattling down the face of the rock. Looking up, he saw the bushes, still heavy with the fruit, right over his head.

"That's how they got down," reflected the bear hunter, patting their friendly noses. "They were reaching for the best bushes and lost their balance."

At that moment another cherry picker, reaching for the bushes above, lost his balance and came sliding down into the already overfilled cup. The newcomer was big and dark and capable of making an awful noise.

Mac owned afterwards that he would have been scared out of his wits if he had not seen at the first glance that the intruder was a stalwart pig. "The foreigners" had seen no objection to letting their porker get his own living in the sheep pasture. The marauding "bear" was a harmless black pig.

"I can climb out by hanging onto the cherry roots," decided Mac, "and I guess I can haul Snowdrop up somehow. But," measuring the pig with a critical eye, "it's going to take a tackle and block to hoist Dip's 'bear.'"

Madam Puss, Fisherman

Did you ever hear of a pussy fisherman? The Berkshire Courier tells of one in Massachusetts who is so clever and skillful that she catches fish every day with her deft paws. This pussy, a tiger mother cat, goes down to the brook which flows near her home, and is not very deep at her favorite place of fishing. Here she nestles down to the stream's edge with her forepaws just in the water, and when a trout comes along, by a swift, artful and deft sweep of her clawed paw she lands her victim high and dry.

Then she takes the wiggling fish in her mouth and proceeds with it to the house, where she delivers it upon the porch or gravel walk, still alive and struggling. She seems to be very careful not to injure her prey. If she has kittens she gives them a fish or two, but they have so many that neither she nor her kittens seem to be as fond of fish as cats usually are.

After leaving the fish at the house she returns to the brook and fishes again, invariably taking her victims to the house one by one.

One season she caught 150 speckled beauties by actual count, and hardly a day passed when the family did not have choice, fresh fish caught by her, while the good weather lasted.

Although she catches large numbers at all seasons, it is during the spawning time, late in the summer, that the largest catches are made. At that season eight or ten fish a day is not an unusually large haul.

The absolute truth of the stories told concerning this wonderful cat is vouched for by many fishermen and hunters who are familiar with Madam Puss's fishing ability. The family, of course, are very proud of her.

Ever Hear These?

Why are sailors poor horsemen? They ride on the main (mane).

Why is the pith of a tree like the tip of a dog's tail? Because it's farthest from the bark.

MY CONSCIENCE SHOES—BY ELIZABETH KNOBEL

My shoes, you know, are honest—oh,
They cannot hide a thing.
On errands kind I always find
My shoes they gayly sing;
But if I go just on tiptoe
Toward the shelf of jam,
My shoes they creak, my shoes they squeak,
My shoes they loudly slam.

Now, I have read, and heard it said,
That Conscience keeps me good—
With warning quakes, it always makes Me do the things I should,
And act, as taught, just like I ought,
Not only like I choose;
But who would guess that I possess
A Conscience in my shoes!

MISSIONARY WORK

Reproducing Waldensian Life in America

There are three places in the United States where the life, thought and deep religious feeling characteristic of the consecrated Waldensian valleys of northern Italy are reproduced with wonderful fidelity in a distant land and amid far different scenes.

One of these colonies is near Gainesville, Tex., where ten families, direct from Waldensian fastnesses, settled on the broad Western prairies twenty-two years ago. The accompanying photograph of the congregation assembled beside the little church which this community, entirely without mission aid, has built for itself, is an interesting study, bespeaking an "immigrant population" in which the most anxious of exclusive Americans would be bound to rejoice. The picture was taken the past summer, when Professor Alberto Clot, the American representative of the Waldensian Church, visited the congregation and held for it a communion service according to the Waldensian liturgy. It was the first touch which the senior members of the church had had with their home land in all the years since their arrival in America.

All the services in this Waldensian church are conducted in English. The pastor of the Southern Presbyterian congregation in Gainesville, Rev. John V. McCall, preaches for the Italian colony every two weeks. The elders meanwhile keep up a weekly Sunday school without intermission. All of the expenses of the church are met from the purses of the people, for the congregation has never been in any sense a missionary enterprise. The community is remarkably prosperous. The ten original families have multiplied largely in their descendants, and it is said that none of these several clans is worth less than $10,000 in real estate, while the average wealth is much greater than this.

On Stone's Prairie, near Monett, Mo., twenty-five families of Waldensians settled twenty-five years ago. Like their Texas friends, they have prospered wonderfully in agriculture, and like them, also, these Missouri settlers have maintained from the first their own worship and built their own church. This congregation is identified with the Presbyterian Church U. S. A., and is served by an English speaking pastor. One of the sons of the old manse which stands alongside the church is now professor of the Romance languages in the University of California, Dr. Arthur Salomon.

The largest of these three colonies is settled where agricultural conditions have proved most burdensome and difficult, yet its wealth is perhaps but little less per capita than that of the other two Waldensian settlements. This is at Valdese, N. C.—a station on the Southern railroad where the Asheville line ascending from Salisbury enters the foothills of the Blue Ridge. Here forty-six families, emigrating together from Alpine valleys, established themselves twenty-three years ago. They had purchased the land before leaving Italy, and came over to America trustfully believing that they were to settle in a paradise of fertility. They found instead a next-to-hopeless expanse of bare clay hills. But they wasted no time repining over the cheat they had suffered. They promptly went to work to find out what the land would raise, and to develop its fertility to the highest possible point. Today Valdese is famous for its grapes, and as well for excellent crops in other lines. A little beginning has also been made in an industrial way, and a saw mill and hosiery factory are prosperous. The stone farmhouses of the colony are a wonderful contrast to the tumbledown cabins of the native American mountaineers, and the stone church which stands in the center of the settlement is a most picturesque part of the landscape.

A new migration, smaller than any of these, has just taken five more families to Mandeville, Ark., near Texarkana. Other neighbors are expected to join these soon. Meanwhile, Dr. Clot, who has his headquarters at 213 West 76th street, New York City, is interesting himself in New York to persuade Waldensian immigrants whom he finds stopping in the metropolis to go out and join one of these agricultural colonies. He reasons that the Waldensians have always been farmers, and that it is far more rational for them to continue on the land in America than it is for them to crowd the cities. Dr. Clot finds 200 young men from the original home parishes of the Waldensians who are now doing service in the hotels of New York. Many of the waiters in the Astoria, the Martinique and other famous New York hostelries are Waldensian men. But if Dr. Clot can influence the situation the hotels will soon lose the service of these dependable employees, for he confesses that he is constantly pressing upon them the superior advantages of outdoor life.

A Chance for a Chapel on Wheels

G. V. Albertson, a Sunday school missionary in Florida, who is indorsed by Dr. Alexander Henry, Sunday school secretary, as an effective worker, writes that in the lowlands where he is preaching and laboring a motor chapel would multiply his usefulness enormously. He believes that a simply constructed car that would be entirely suitable for this work could be obtained for $800 or a little more, and his hope is that some one appreciative of the needs of a pioneer country just being rescued from swamp and forest will be willing to furnish this highly important equipment.

In the southern sections of the state where drainage and clearing are yet going on, the settlements are yet far apart and the roads between them are so deep in sand and muck that it is almost impossible to drive horses through them. Entertainment is hard to procure, and often impossible to reach at night when traveling is heavy and slow. Camping in the forest brings the traveler in most uncomfortable proximity to many varieties of insect pests and to huge rattlesnakes whose bite is scarcely less to be feared than the venom of the cobra in India. The heavy rains of the summer season make another difficulty incidental to this.

But these are elements of the case from the worker's side only. The larger fact counting on the side of the people is that in a community so raw and new meeting places are rarer than houses of accommodation for travelers. All of these necessities the proposed motor chapel would meet, for it would give a rallying place sufficient to accommodate the audience drawn from these pioneer settlements and at the same time would supply the missionary with a home which, as the snail does, he could virtually carry on his back. Any person interested in this opportunity for missionary investment will be furnished complete details on communicating with Dr. Henry in the Witherspoon building, Philadelphia.

Missionary Brevities

—Dr. J. I. Blackburn, former pastor at Covington, Ky., who has been preaching with great acceptance for a year past in the Union Evangelical Church of Yokohama, has concluded his term of ministry there and is proceeding to complete his tour of the world by journeying through the Philippines, China and India.

—The mission schools at Makawn, Siam, have been especially requested by the government to encourage their older pupils and graduates to apply for admission to the national normal school in Bangkok. These young Christians, in order to induce them to become teachers, are offered three to five years of training free, and then guaranteed government positions in public schools for life.

Board Notes and Announcements

—Leading the Friday morning meeting at Chicago, Mrs. Covert, secretary of the Board of the Northwest for correspondence concerning missionary speakers, illustrated by stories from real life the value of human sympathy and the power of example. A sister of Mrs. J. Monro Gibson of London brought beyond-the-seas nearer by kind words. Two officers of the board brought gleanings from Home Mission Day of the Illinois synodical society. The president spoke of the book "Early Life of Hudson Taylor," saying she wanted no one to read it unless ready to meet the question "In what degree am I by self-denial extending the kingdom of Christ?" Mrs. Coulter read letters from Miss Schaeffer and Mrs. Melrose of Hainan. Mrs. Clow emphasized this request from Miss Bessie Allen, whose address is Teheran, Persia, via Berlin and Baku: "We like to have pictures that might be framed as rewards for the larger girls of the Iran Bethel school, also small picture cards for the little ones. If you know of any society that would like to send dolls for the primary girl we should be more than delighted. Books, too, for the older scholars would be most acceptable, especially those of an uplifting nature." Postage on printed matter to Persia is the same as domestic—1 cent for each two ounces or fraction thereof.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

November 9, 1913—Abstinence for the Sake of Others

Everyday View of the Lesson

By J. L. Scott

Lesson Text, Romans 14:7-21. Golden Text, Romans 14:21: It is good not to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor to do anything whereby thy brother stumbleth.

Temperance may apply to a loaf of bread as well as to a bottle of wine. In Paul's time one ate as well as drank to his own condemnation. The church at Rome had a mixed membership, being made of both Jews and gentiles. The Jew had been trained to regard certain foods as unclean. With him it was not a question of appetite, but of law. A menu, subject to no revision, had been in use for a thousand years. Not so with the gentile. He ate things because he liked them, and called for more. These two contradictions entered the same church and by the same door. Moreover, this was a matter over which the Jews themselves were in contention. Conservative and liberal were names by no means strange to the ancients. The conservatives would insist upon the retention of forms and customs to which the less formal paid no heed. As a consequence the church at Rome was by no means the most irenic institution on earth.

Conscience is a most worthy possession, except when it happens to be in the wrong. That was the trouble at Rome. The disputants were conscientious, which only added emphasis to their contention. Men seldom fight over a principle. The faith once delivered to the saints depends for its defense upon other means than words and blows.

Gift of Wise Discrimination One Greatly to Be Desired

There is no gift greater than that of discrimination. Two objects are presented and we are asked to discriminate as to which is the better. Whether wise or foolish, the answer determines. There are those who are quick to respond and usually correct. How they arrive at their conclusion they do not know. That is genius. Others are slow, deliberative, and finally decide wrong. That is folly. Wisdom has been defined as the art of knowing the difference. Nowhere is this more fully illustrated than in church life. We all have our own tastes, inclinations and convictions. To please each is the task that confronts the minister of the gospel.

It is a law in reading that the sense depends upon the location of the emphasis. Unfortunately there are those who accent only the less important words! That was the condition of the affairs with which our lesson has concern. Some gave to meat and drink a significance never intended of God. Others ate what appealed to them. The Levitical bill of fare had been materially modified since they had embraced the Christian faith. Paul's suggestion involved what we term personal liberty. He saw in the controversy nothing of vital importance to either faith or life.

Servants of God Admitted on Equal Footing to His Grace

Jew and gentile had been received into Christian fellowship by virtue of their faith in the Christ, and with no reference to times, seasons, meat or drink. In this respect the Presbyterian Church is in line of apostolic practice. Its doors are wide enough to admit Jew or gentile on this one essential basis. And this because we are servants, not of each other, but of God.

Paul was great enough to comprehend the distinction. He saw things as few are able to see them even today. Many of our differences are purely individual. They belong to the first birth rather than to the second. One taught in his youth that certain things are essential, finds it very difficult to regard them as anything else. He may realize the folly of the teaching, but conscience has taken up the argument. Conscience is sometimes synonymous with custom. Education does not create conscience, but it does give it direction. "To him who accounteth anything unclean, to him it is unclean." But no one person constitutes the entire race. Others may think differently and with better reason. Life is not a footpath but a highway. We are all parts of the same procession, and whatever hinders or helps another is of interest of each.

There is a wide difference between the sanctity of conscience and the sanctity of food. For the one the apostle had great regard, for the other none whatever. This principle he would apply not only to forbidden food, but also to wine. The second application is stronger than the first. Proscribed meat could not injure the user, while wine might lead to death. It is also quite possible that the question of wine had reference to the gentiles, as meat did to the Jews. Wine, once offered to an idol, became offensive to many Christians, as it did to the Jews in Babylon. At all events, it was one of the things from which Paul abstained, if not for his own sake at least for the sake of others.

Personal abstinence is the only position in this matter that requires no defense. The element of temptation is never absent even to the strongest, while to many it is a challenge from the pit. The best cure for drunkenness is not to begin to drink, and the most direct way out of the saloon is to stay out. Temperance as a sentiment is growing stronger all the time. There are positions of trust that are open to the abstainer and to no one else. Certain great corporations require a pledge of total abstinence before a man's application for a position will be considered.

Wine Becoming an Outlaw on the Face of the Earth

Drinking, even in the most moderate form, has lost its respectability. The trend of sentiment is toward the position of Paul. Never did the world have less use for wine than it has today. The engineer who loses his reputation for sobriety will soon lose his engine. Life and property are possessions too sacred to be trusted to the unsteady hand of intemperance. Wine is fast becoming an outlaw on the face of the earth. It is being driven from factory and field until the drinker is destined to find himself alone. Abstinence has ceased to be a theory and has become a necessity. The reasons are urgent, if not for our own salvation, then from that higher motive, the salvation of our fellows.

The Lesson Verse by Verse

By Hermon D. Jenkins

ANALYSIS—The frightful prevalence of drunkenness justifies our frequent return to the study of its nature and its fruits. There are three reasons for abstinence which we as Christians cannot gainsay: We are the servants of Christ, the brothers of all men, and the approval of conscience is the richest of all rewards.

When one considers that drunkenness lies at the base of much of the criminal life of America today, it is easy to understand why those who arrange these lessons frequently revert to it as a grave peril. Just as today the physician makes a special study of cancer or tuberculosis, so the student of religion and life sees in drink the most powerful foe of both.

And after long and searching investigation, most men who wish well to their fellows have come to the conclusion that the only safe stand to take in regard to intoxicants is that of total abstinence. This is not the result of narrowness or ignorance, but of observation. One of the foremost settlement workers in London today, son of a brewer and heir to millions, declined to touch one dollar of the wealth made in his father's trade, so thoroughly was he persuaded that it was a curse to men. When the famous London brewer, Mr. Guinness, determined to use a part of his vast riches in building better homes for working people, he made it one of the conditions of rental that no intoxicants, not even his own beer, should be sold on the premises. When in the Chicago fire the largest brewery went up in flames, the man who had made his fortune from it was asked if he would rebuild. He replied, "I do not intend to. Chicago would have been better off if I had never built." A brewer was in line for diplomatic appointment. The senator who strongly indorsed him wrote to the secretary of state that he could recommend this candidate because, while he manufactured beer, he never drank it himself nor permitted it to be brought into his home. The secretary of a barkeeper's union recently advised his fellow members to sign the pledge.

To Do What State Life Requires Is Our First Duty

Verse 7—This verse is seldom quoted in its original and true meaning. It is used as if it meant that no one can live or die without influencing others. That is true enough and is brought out in the latter part of this lesson. But the first reason for exercising moral restraint over ourselves is that we have not the right to determine any question as if we were self-created and self-centered. We are Christ's bondmen. Personal slavery has disappeared from civilized countries, but we can understand what it meant by remembering that we are bound, as citizens, to consult first what are the needs and interests of the republic. We are not our own. We are citizens, a part of the state. Our first duty is to do what the state life requires. That is the attitude which Paul takes here as related to Jesus.

Verse 8—Even to the limit of life, in the matter of death itself, we are not free to choose. The man pursued by a robber may save his life by running away. But the soldier must stand where he is placed because he is "not his own," but his country's. He must do—live or die—according to what his country needs. Whether for life or death, we are Christ's, not our own.

Sovereignty of Jesus Rests on Complete Experience of Human Life

Verse 9—The meaning of this verse is somewhat enigmatical, but it appears to rest the sovereignty of Jesus Christ upon his complete experience of human life. The soldier feels a peculiar power to belong to the commander who has risen from the ranks, fought, been wounded and revived to reassume authority. It is something the same in the industrial arts. The employee in a telegraph company who knows that the president of the company began life digging holes for telegraph poles, instead of inheriting his stock, has a feeling of cheerful subordination that would not exist under any other conditions. So the apostle tells us Jesus rests his authority not simply on his divine nature but on his human experience.

Verse 10—When we have a true brotherly feeling for other men we will neither judge them harshly nor coldly ignore them. If our brother falls we will not point the finger of scorn at him. We will seek to distract attention from his misfortune or his weakness. If he lack the physical vigor with which we may be blessed, we will undertake only such tasks before him as he may be able to share. We will never attempt any difficult and dangerous feats in the presence of a brother who would be sure to hurt himself were he to attempt the same.

Abstinence Can Hurt Nobody, and Is Sure to Help Some

Verse 21—It is a good thing when our conduct is inspired by a sense of duty toward God and love toward man.

The particular self-restraint which was in Paul's mind was that with reference to "meats offered to idols" (I. Cor. 8). The Oriental religions are sharply differentiated to this day by the things which their disciples may eat or may not eat. Dr. Barrows tells us that in his travels through India he was so moved with pity at sight of a starving Hindu child looking hungrily at his abundant lunch that he handed it out the car window to her. But the child refused to touch it. She would rather starve than identify herself with his religion. When we see over a Jewish market the sign "Kosher" we know that it advertises meat which the strict Jew can eat without identifying himself with Christianity. Every time we ask a blessing at the table we are reminded that eating was always a sacred function in the East. "It is a good thing," says Paul, so to live that people will not think of you as a harsh critic or a loose liver. It is a good thing for you in approval of conscience, and a good thing for others that they be not tempted by your freedom to fall into license. It is a good thing to avoid anything which, however safe for us, may be a peril to those weaker than ourselves, or a peril to those who will misinterpret our intent and purpose.

BY EDWARD ARTHUR WICHER

Week Beginning November 2, 1913

HOME MISSION TOPIC—Social service.

The department of social service is a very important part of the missionary activity of our church. In the present conditions of social and industrial life the world over it represents an indispensable work of the living church. Social service is the complement of evangelism. Both lines of work aim at saving men.

The bureau of social service originated as follows: In 1903 the Board of Home Missions established a workingmen's department, the name of which was later changed to "the department of church and labor." In 1911 it was called "the bureau of social service" and its functions were "to study social conditions as they are related to the progress of the kingdom of God, and to suggest to the church practical ways of realizing the social ideals of the gospel." Under the strong, sane leadership of Rev. Charles Stelzle this department has done more to reconcile the laboring men of the nation to the church than any other single organization. It has poured forth a steady stream of religious literature into the labor journals of the country; and on the other hand has served as a spokesman to the church of the ambitions and rights of labor. So important has this work been that the other great Protestant churches have followed our example in the institution of similar bureaus. Mr. Stelzle has now withdrawn from his office in our church to serve a wider constituency as adviser upon social matters to all the churches.

The work of the department deals with the problems of labor and capital, child welfare, charities and correction, public health, the housing of the poor, recreation and the attitude of labor to the liquor trade. The end of all its labors is the glory of God and the increase of his service among men.

The social aspect of our religion has been recognized by all the prophets of the Christian faith from the beginning until now. St. James, the great prototype of the modern preacher of the social gospel, said: "Pure religion and undefiled before our God and Father is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep oneself unspotted from the world."

The history of Christianity is the history of all human charities; it is the history of almshouses, asylums and orphanages; schools and colleges; progress of thought and freedom of speech; the rise of democracy and the growth of the rights of man; the ministry to the poor and the protection of the innocent; the invention of medicine and the alleviation of pain. It is only ignorance of history that can permit men to underestimate the place of the church in the work of human betterment, for there has been no achievement of any lasting value to the life of man that has not been brought to pass by forces which the gospel of Christ has set in motion.

After having said this, I desire to make two observations upon this point.

First: The church has indeed been habitually conservative about engaging in many of the new enterprises which eager spirits have tried to thrust upon her. She has been right to be conservative, for she holds in trust an inheritance of immense value. She dare not, she cannot, imperil the old, which has been tried, for the new, which is still uncertain. But just as fast as the old and the new can be brought into harmonious relations the church as a whole will move forward.

Second: While this is true of the church in the aggregate, it is not necessarily true of the individual members of the church. There have always been church people who would throw stones at the penitent prostitute. St. James himself found that he had to do with those pious Christians who, under the cover of the very creed that bade them love not the world but the Father, would hide their heartlessness and avarice; who would say to their destitute brothers, "Go in peace, be ye warmed and filled," and would themselves do nothing for them. They were so wrapped up in the prospect of the world to come that they forgot to do any good in this world. These are the men whom the warm-hearted and practical St. James holds up to shame in the light of the compassion of our Lord. The problem of the first century and that of the twentieth century is the same. It is not simply to aid to a higher life those men and women who are still outside the church; it is also to convince large numbers of those who are within that they have a duty for the salvation of their brother's soul, and another duty for the feeding of his body, i. e., for the maintenance of such social conditions as are favorable to his spiritual welfare.

In parts of California the orange groves may be seen lying side by side with stretches of desert sand. The difference between the fertility of the one and the barrenness of the other is due to the fact that the one has been irrigated and the other has not. And this is a parable of the religious life of our nation, whether we consider the church as a whole or the individual human soul. There are vast tracts today that are beautiful with all the fruits of the Spirit of grace; there are other wide areas lying close to them that are dead and barren. We are sensitive to some forms of righteousness, and indifferent to others. We need to pray the prayer of the psalmist: "Unite my heart to fear thy name" (Ps. 86:11).

The church that is true to the mind of her Founder dare not withhold her witness for righteousness, justice, equality and brotherhood in all the relations of society. She needs today to hold together in harmonious proportions the work of personal evangelism, the work of social service and the work of civic righteousness. She needs to lay new emphasis upon the divine origin and control of the institutions of the family and the state. She needs to insist upon the enforcement of some old laws and the enactment of some new ones.

With a new faith and reverence, with a new consciousness of prophetic power, with a new sense of personal responsibility, we pray: "Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth."

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SERVICE

COMMENTS IN BRIEF BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS

November 9, 1913

THE CITADEL OF CITIZENSHIP

TOPIC—Christian home life. II. Timothy 1:1-5.

Movements and societies and campaigns, all aiming at social welfare, fill the air with their clamor. Earnest men and women are being worn out in the endeavor to keep abreast of all the new measures for human betterment. Fads and forces, both fine and foolish, are offered as remedies for the day's ills. Reforms of assorted kinds are so popular that one scarcely dares lift his voice to cry that we need to abolish a few hundred of our strenuous organizations and committees, and just quietly go home to our families. Most persons with a social passion are spreading out too thin, and their intensity defeats itself. They need to return to the old-fashioned ways of shaping public life and opinion. Private character and public influence are both promoted by a vigorous home life. If everybody who feels a concern for the state of society would earnestly turn his attention to making one home happier, holier and more helpful, results would be attained which are possible in no other way. The oldest of human institutions, the home, still remains the most powerful. To establish the home in its most perfect form is to rear the mightiest citadel of patriotism and piety.

The billboards of New York last winter bore flaming placards of a play, "The Never-Homes." Many persons commented upon it as an apt description of the life of many modern city dwellers. One successful New York physician declared recently that, despite his large practice, he could not call at the homes of more than six of the families he knew in the city, on a given evening, with any reasonable expectation of finding them at home. The New Yorker of today goes out to dine, goes out to play, and goes out for social intercourse. All of which means, when bluntly put, that some sections of society are abandoning the home—forsaking the deepest and sweetest spring of life, of happiness, of culture and of social service.

Christian homes are more useful than Christian rescue missions. It is better to build fences than to repair wrecks.

The flavor of home life is surely sweetest when it is permeated with religion. At the family altar spirit blends with spirit. A common faith is the strongest of all home ties. The family that are one in Christ come nearest to realizing the highest happiness ever vouchsafed to mortals. There can be no adequate substitute—not even the Sunday school or the church—for religion in the home. That is the influence which strikes deepest into the characters of children and fits them for the responsibilities of citizenship. When mother and father share with the boys and girls the great verities of the spirit, and when the spaciousness and refinement and love of Christ dominate the table talk, the family pleasures and reading and the daily chores, then the most that is possible for parents to do for children has been done for their training and happiness.

Many young women are enamored of vague ideas of "a career" who ought to settle down to that largest and most useful work in the world, the making of a Christian home.

Both state and church are better served by the making of homes than by the making of speeches.

Some homes do not know how to play. There are never any games around the evening lamp. The science of fun-making is as unknown as the black arts of ancient Mesopotamia. Every normal home needs play as well as study and work and intelligent social conversation. The typewriter recently made me say "funatics" for "fanatics." The word thus accidentally coined is a good one. Would that every home might have its "funatic" or tireless promoter of good times.

Everybody rejoices that the moving picture theaters and the dance halls are being regulated. Far more important than this, however, is the task of creating attractive, wholesome homes, given to hospitality, skilled in devising pleasures for the young and filled with the atmosphere of modest refinement and sincere religion.

The arch-enemy of all the enemies of society is the happy, hospitable home.

Any alert public school teacher will admit that the school is either in competition or cooperation with the pupil's home. When the latter is not the abode of correct speech, good taste and large outlook, it can undo all the efforts of the school teacher. For the essential and abiding part of every person's education is received in the home.

The only theological seminary ever attended by the world's greatest Teacher of religion was a Nazareth carpenter's home.

A worthy and adequate ambition for any young person is the purpose to make a home. The courageous and independent young man or woman does not care to have a home just like a neighbor's; he knows that great lives and complete happiness can abide in the smallest of cottages, with the simplest equipment. Indeed, a real social service will be done by the lovers who dare get married while young on a small income, and who establish homes of the utmost simplicity, which is always consistent with genuine refinement and hospitality. The nation has few greater needs than for patriotism and religion thus expressed in homes that dare to be very plain, while still holding fast to good taste and gentility.

NEW BOOKS

The Unity of Protestantism

WHAT MUST THE CHURCH DO TO BE SAVED? by P. Marion Simms. Dr. Simms is evidently impressed, as thousands of other earnest Christian workers are, with the demoralization and waste caused by the existing divisions of Christendom. He discerns in its present condition certain tendencies inherited from the past, whose continuance can only mean increasing loss of power for the church. In fact, the title of his book suggests even a more serious alarm on his part. The dissensions of Protestantism and the more or less belligerent attitude of each of its many segments towards all the others are surely driving the church to the very brink of disaster. He therefore repeats more emphatically the word of warning often sounded before against the persistence of Protestantism in its divided condition. He calls for a definite movement towards a more effective cooperation and reunion. Only with the achievement of such reunion can the church attain an ideal efficiency. He realizes all the difficulties in the way of reunion, but he is not appalled either by their multitude or by their seriousness. The reader may not always agree with the author's theological views, but he must certainly be impressed by the array of facts placed before him. Dr. Simms's message is not a new one, but none the less is it urgent. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1.50 net.] A. C. ZENOS.

The Barrows Lectures

SOCIAL PROGRAMMES IN THE WEST, by Charles R. Henderson of the University of Chicago. The Barrows lectures are delivered first in the Far East as a message from the Christian West; then they are delivered here. Such a course as that of Dr. Henderson is needed here, not for the new facts it may present so much as for the marshaling of facts to which we have become so accustomed separately that we do not realize them in the aggregate. We are so much impressed in all our reading and writing with the evils which are to be combated that we do not see what strides have been and are now being taken toward the cure. Professor Henderson made no pretense before his Indian audiences that we have solved our problems, but he must have impressed them with the many genuine and helpful movements which are under way. He describes all of these as "modern revelations of Christ's spirit in works of love, kindness and justice; what he is doing through men for the infant, the sick, the insane, the poor, the criminal, the toiling and ill-paid wage earner." He speaks as a Christian, and his book strengthens the thesis that Christendom is the final evidence for Christ as a social redeemer. The mechanical work is so poorly done that we wish Dr. Henderson's excellent lectures might have a better dress. [University of Chicago Press. $1.25 net.]

CLELAND B. MCAFEE.

Some Psychological Studies

PERSONALITY, by F. B. Jevons. What can seem more certain to anyone than his existence as a person? For most of us the "Cogito ergo sum" of Descartes is convincing. But Professor Jevons shows in his book that personality is a most elusive thing. Science does not presuppose it, nor need psychology do so. The latter may confine itself to states of consciousness, ignoring a personality to which they may be supposed to belong. As a matter of fact, some psychologists do deny it, maintaining that states of consciousness themselves constitute what is called personality, and that it is a mistake to suppose that a thought necessitates a thinker or a state of consciousness a person. The falsity of this position Professor Jevons seeks to show, and considers especially the theories of Hume, James and Bergson, which have much in common. The reasoning throughout the book is close but clear, and offers something worth while to the seeker for intellectual stimulus. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $1 net.

AMERICAN PATRIOTISM, by Hugo Muensterberg. The first of these nine essays from the pen of the greatest living American psychologist deals with a trait which the author considers more highly developed in America than in any other modern country, and more associated with blind prejudice than in any other—at least any other European nation. He urges the American reader, then, while retaining the fine fire of his patriotism, to temper it with that spirit of admiration for other countries which they are fully able to evoke in the mind of the fair observer. The other essays deal with various aspects of American life and with current thought in Germany as well. Like other men of fame, Professor Muensterberg has suffered greatly at the hands of the German press, and in "The Case of the Reporter" he criticises the situation—not blaming any one class of those involved, however—very trenchantly. [Moffat, Yard and Company, New York. $1.50 net.

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF REVOLUTION, by Gustave Le Bon. The present work—translated by Bernard Miall—is an application of the principles gradually worked out by the author in his "Psychology of the Crowd," and an elucidation of principles actuating the conduct of revolution—with a special study of the French revolution. In regard to human nature in the mass M. Le Bon is a pessimistic fatalist, and it is precisely in his deductions from that point that many psychologists will cease to agree with him. For amid all his parade of up-to-date psychology he still speaks of human nature as if it were a fixity which could not be changed by the machinations of man. However, it is but fair to pay tribute to the exceptional analytical ability which the author has brought to bear upon the actual situations which he surveys with scientific thoroughness. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $2.50 net.

Marriage and Race Culture

PROBLEMS OF THE SEXES, by Jean Finot. There is a difference between the discussion of sex and the discussion of the sexes. This translation by Mary Safford of the work of a modern French writer of scientific culture and an idealistic bent deals with the question of sex only incidentally and simply to make clear his remarks on the relations of the sexes. For his book is in reality a justification in the light of history and of physiology of an ever greater participation by women in the affairs of life. He regards the institution of marriage as the result of an age-long evolution, and one which cannot be set aside; he looks forward to its gradual improvement and assumption of changing external forms, but correlates these with an ever increasing spiritualization of the function. On the moot question of divorce he takes up a more radical position, and predicts that some day it will be obtainable whenever it is the clearly expressed wish of both parties to a marriage. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $2 net.

MARRIAGE AND THE SEX PROBLEM, by Dr. F. W. Foerster; translated by Meyrick Booth. In Europe this work has received careful attention on the part of ethical leaders as well as Christian thinkers. Its message is a vigorous protest against the looser teachings recently put forth by certain would-be reformers, notably the famous Swedish author, Ellen Key. Dr. Foester began his studies on this subject with a bias somewhat anti-Christian, but the deeper he went into it the more thoroughly he became convinced that the Christian teaching about it lies at the foundation of both social and individual welfare. He believes in the exclusive validity of monogamous marriage, in the prohibition of all divorce, in the wrongfulness of the artificial restriction of the family and in the cultivation of love as the sole basis of true happiness in marriage. The view as a whole is undoubtedly sound. [Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York.

OUTLINES OF EVOLUTIONARY BIOLOGY, by Arthur Dendy. As a sound and inviting approach to the larger problems of biology this is the most satisfactory work that has come to our notice. In discussing the factors of organic evolution the author presents the opinions of classical investigators, and upon the foundation thus laid explains some challenging ideas of his own, which although inadequately appreciated at present in Great Britain (the author is the professor of zoology in the University of London), he thinks will be popularly accepted in the future. In the main these ideas are in opposition to the theory of natural selection. Professor Dendy's attitude toward the modern doctrine of the noninheritance of acquired characters is that of a conservative, open-minded eugenist. He thinks it "highly probable" that this doctrine is erroneous. [D. Appleton and Company, New York. $3.50 net.

MARRIAGE AND GENETICS, by Charles A. L. Reed. This book is from the pen of a surgeon—a former president of the American Medical Association—and will appeal to the student of eugenics. One chapter is given to the social diseases and the social purity movement; another deals with eugenic medical examination. [Galton Press, Cincinnati. Sold by subscription; $1.

THE THREE GIFTS OF LIFE: A Girl's Responsibility for Race Progress, by Nellie M. Smith. A biological argument for sex hygiene, written in simple language, which ought to be very helpful to the modern young woman. [Dodd, Mead and Company, New York. 50 cents net.

Matters of Public Interest

THE JUDICIARY AND THE PEOPLE, by Frederick N. Judson, comprises addresses lately delivered in the Storrs lecture series at the Yale Law School. The author, a St. Louis lawyer of national reputation, investigates the causes which have led people to lose confidence in the courts, and suggests conservative remedies. The relation of the judiciary to the people in a self-governing country is a matter of grave importance to all patriotic citizens, and Mr. Judson notes that the popular distrust of our legal machinery has been voiced by our two ex-presidents, though from radically different points of view. There is a chapter on the recall of judges and decisions, and in this connection the appointment or selection of judges to hold office during good behavior is urged with the power of removal reserved to the legislative body after due hearing. This latter remedy, says the author, should be freely enforced wherever there is mental unfitness or physical incapacity; and where there is no moral dereliction retirement pensions should be provided. [Yale University Press, New Haven. $1.35 net.

BUSINESS ORGANIZATION AND COMBINATION, by Lewis H. Haney. Professor Haney, who has the chair of economics in the University of Texas, undertakes an analysis of the evolution and nature of business organization in the United States, and a tentative solution of corporation and trust problems. He has borne in mind the business man and the general reader as well as the college and university student for whom primarily he writes. Legal and economic aspects of commercial enterprise are considered and illustrated with a mass of up-to-date data. Professor Haney says he wants to make the corporation "a more desirable citizen than it now is." He also suggests that a new form of organization is needed in America—a limited-liability association which will occupy the gap between the partnership and the corporation. [Macmillan Company, New York. $2 net.

CERTAINTY AND JUSTICE, by Frederic R. Coudert, is a volume of thoughtful legal essays by a well-known authority on constitutional and international law. Mr. Coudert discusses the problem which confronts conscientious judges who would find a middle way between precedent on the one hand and progress on the other—"precedent" corresponding to certainty and "progress" standing for justice. Very many important legal decisions disclose a conflict between the rigidity of past interpretations and the flexibility needed to meet the changing social and political standards of a progressive age. The author does not believe that law should become stereotyped, but should be made to meet social changes and economic transformations. In presenting his thesis he is always clear and logical. [D. Appleton and Company, New York. $1.50 net.

The Publisher, by Robert Sterling Yard. It is always a pleasure to read a book written by a man who knows just what he is talking about and who knows how to talk—or write. Mr. Yard has been a publisher, a member of a prominent book-producing firm, and he is now an editor, having recently taken editorial charge of The Century Magazine. He deals with publishing both as a business and as a profession, and while he does not reveal as many trade secrets as the non-elect might expect, yet he does tell a good deal about the process of book selection, making and marketing. People who say the book publishing business is on the decline are prevaricators, says Mr. Yard. But though it is not declining he finds it changing and always interesting. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1 net.

The Influence of Monarchs, by Frederick A. Woods. The science of historiometry has not only been named by Dr. Woods, but has been developed largely by him. The latest volume of investigations into the lives of sovereigns and the countries they ruled brings to light a number of interesting comparisons between the intellectual strength of a ruler and the progress of a nation. The author's measure of the relation of each ruler to his kingdom presents history from a new angle. [Macmillan Company, New York. $2 net.

Two Books for Baptists

Evangelistic Sermons, by B. H. Carroll. President Carroll of the Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary at Fort Worth, Texas, has an enthusiastic friend in Dr. J. B. Cranfill, who compiles these sermons. Dr. Cranfill gives his hero a considerable task to live up to his introduction. He says, "It is my deep conviction that Dr. Carroll has no peer in the Baptist world." After this introduction there appear ten vivid sermons of evangelistic purpose, and one extended study of the nature and person of our Lord. Dr. Carroll is very much a Baptist, and a number of his references to Baptist principles show that he does not tend to read his message in quite such wide terms as many have become accustomed to use. Baptists and Their Doctrines, by the same author and compiler, is a volume of sermons and conference addresses primarily designed for use among Baptists. The author is well versed in the history of his denomination. He represents, however, that wing of the denomination which stands for the most exclusive sectarian view of Baptist doctrine and polity. He has not learned, as Baptists of all lands have learned in large numbers, that it is not enough to know the words of the New Testament, but that one must understand those words in the light of the history with which they are associated. Nevertheless the volume is a clear expression of the beliefs of a large section of the Baptist fraternity. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. Each $1 net.

New Testament Studies

The Text and Canon of the New Testament, by Alexander Souter. This small volume published in the "Studies of Theology" series, cannot and does not aim to supersede Dr. Caspar Rene Gregory's thorough work under the same title issued a short while ago in the "International Theological Library." Professor Souter pleads a place for his book among the more compendious theological works, and for such a volume there certainly is a place. The progress constantly being made in the study of the canon and text necessitates the restatement of results from time to time. The author's experience in the teaching of these subjects in Mansfield College, Oxford, has enabled him to keep abreast of the progress of discussion and research. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. 75 cents net.

The Life and Teaching of Jesus, by Charles Foster Kent. In the "Historical Bible" series Professor Kent places his experience as a teacher of Biblical literature at the service of the public at large. The series is to consist of six volumes, four devoted to the Old Testament and two to the New. The latest of these has for its subject the life and teaching of Christ. Professor Kent's method requires the rearrangement of the accounts of the gospel, together with such minor passages in other writings of the New Testament as bear on the life of Jesus both before and after the resurrection. This arrangement aims to place the Biblical text in chronological order. In addition Professor Kent appends explanatory dissertations containing historical sidelights made available by modern study and research. The volume is meant to supersede the ordinary harmonies of the gospel and to serve as an adequate basis for the study of the life of Christ. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $1 net.

Theology

The Reasonableness of the Religion of Jesus, by William Stephen Rainsford. Dr. Rainsford seeks to go back of all later interpretation and to rest upon the earliest teachings of Jesus. It is difficult to see how he saves himself from sheer Unitarianism, of which he is evidently not particularly afraid. The thesis of the lectures is that all religion must grow. Dr Rainsford indicates that that growth is not simply from half light to fuller light, but from error to truth, while at the same time much that we count error is not so, but is partial truth. We cannot help feeling that, fine as Dr. Rainsford's spirit always is, he hardly does justice to the historical faith, and certainly in the chapter on the supernatural he does not justify his position. Even with this criticism, however, we commend the book to thoughtful men. It does not say much that is new, and it is regrettable that university students should not have more positive teaching, but it does carry a message that needs to be heeded. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.25 net.

Jesus the Christ: Historical or Mythical? by Thomas James Thorburn. Dr. Thorburn takes up the denial of the historicity of Jesus recently put forth by Professor A. Drews, J. M. Robertson and Professor W. B. Smith. In Germany the controversy regarding the historicity of Jesus has been in progress for several years and the literature produced in its course is threatening to assume the proportions of a considerable library. In England and on this side of the Atlantic the question is still a comparatively new one. It may be expected to challenge larger and larger attention in the years to come, and Dr. Thorburn's volume is of a nature to give direction to the discussion and measurably to determine its results. The author takes up the reasonings of the mythical theory and examines them with great patience, moderation and seriousness. At the same time his conclusions are clearly and firmly given in diametrical opposition to the mythical theory. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

The Message of the Disciples of Christ for the Union of the Church, by Peter Ainslie is a series of lectures delivered before the Yale Divinity School, the object being to explain the original intention of the founder of the communion known as the Disciples of Christ. Much misunderstanding has arisen as to Alexander Campbell's doctrinal teachings because his implacable opposition to all creeds left his followers to define the tenets of the new communion in their own way. Mr. Ainslie seeks to bring into view the original type of thought as put forth by Campbell and his associates. Although, instead of working out the union of Christendom, the Campbell gospel has only resulted in the addition of another denomination, there is no doubt that the Disciples have inspired the Christian church and helped it in many ways, and this volume will bring many to the true knowledge of their services. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1.

The Open Secret, by James Thompson Bixby. The one supreme lesson which the author aims to enforce in this well-written volume is that the dominant realities are beneath the surface of things in the world. Behind the material organism is the life that organizes, behind the body politic the moral and spiritual aspirations of citizens, behind the whole universe an indwelling eternal reason. It is certainly a world-view which needs to be brought periodically to the attention of thinkers. Dr. Bixby reiterates it with an amplitude of illustration quite adequate to produce conviction. [American Unitarian Association, Boston. $1.25.

What Is the Truth About Jesus Christ? by Frederich Loofs. The author of this little volume is one of the best known professors of church history in Germany. He has treated his topic in a comprehensive way, grouping together the questions just now being discussed in the field of Christology. The first of these questions is whether Jesus was a real man or only a mythical deity, and in his answer Professor Loofs refutes the views of such men as W. B. Smith, A. Drews and P. Jensen. The ancient Christology he likewise declares untenable. Unfortunately he offers no substitute for this. Perhaps the time for a clear-cut solution of the problem has not arrived. Nevertheless since a working theory is absolutely necessary upon such an important point, the author will fail to satisfy the Christian mind. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $1.25.

Getting Together, edited by James Morris Whiton. This volume of "essays by friends in council," prepared under the supervision of a distinguished member of the staff of The Outlook, has been frankly written to show how much the new thology of the present age differs from the old; but in the opinion of The Continent it demonstrates rather that the new theology finds itself unable to dispense with the regulative ideals which have dominated Christian thinking from the time of the reformation at least. There is vast variety of expression within the cover of the book, but even the most extreme of its contributors rest back on fundamental spiritual ideals that no man who has felt the mastery of God can repudiate. [Sturgis and Walton, New York. $1.50 net.

Redemption and the New Birth, by T. T. Martin. This volume is in some sense complementary to the same writer's "God's Way with Men," noted in these columns last winter. It contains the same intense loyalty to the very letter of Scripture and the same assurance of the cross of Christ as the only way of salvation. This book is more polemic, dealing with several familiar recent volumes with unsparing hand. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1 net.

Popular Science

Science from an Easy Chair, by Sir Ray Lankester. A delightful series of short papers by a scientist of established reputation, who discusses in a popular and charming style many interesting scientific subjects, such as glaciers, elephants, pigmy races of men, the strange history of the tadpoles of the sea, carriers of disease, etc. These papers read as though they had been written by a man in an easy chair and they can certainly be read by a man in that comfortable position. The Age of the Earth, by Arthur Holmes, is one of the latest issues in Harper's Library of Living Thought. It is an exceedingly well-written discussion of the length of time that has elapsed since the coming together of the elements to form our earth. The book reads like a fairy tale in its interesting attempts to decipher this fascinating riddle. [Harper and Brothers, New York. 75 cents net.

The Open Hearth

Young Man, Do Not Fear!

I am a minister's wife and read with interest the article by a minister's daughter. My sympathy is with her, especially in the matter of delayed salaries. A minister should be paid according to the ability of the people he serves. He should be paid promptly—quarterly, or monthly, which is better. But whatever salary is agreed upon it should be paid promptly and the pastor should not have to ask for it. With this serious fault eliminated, I think the pastor's family is as comfortable as the majority of people. So long as we live in houses made with hands, there will be some discomforts in all callings.

After long service in the pastorate our most pleasant memories are of the kindness of our people. Were strangers entertained in the manse, delicacies were slipped into the kitchen. If a church supper was given, however willing the pastor's wife was to serve, she was unanimously put on the receiving committee and only required to shake hands and be agreeable. If sickness or trials came to the pastor's family every one was sympathetic and kind. Many other things might be mentioned. "The dead line at 50" has been moved on to 70, and the young man and his wife need not fear to enter upon the highest and best of callings.

Opportunities for Presbyterians

[The writer of the following letter, a well-known layman, offers a practical suggestion that has had some demonstration from time to time in the classified "want" advertising department of The Continent. He would have The Continent a medium for bringing Presbyterians into touch with improved living conditions.]

In all our large cities are those (not of the slums but in our good families) who for reasons of health or unsatisfactory business or for their children's sake, would like to go back to the country or to a small country town. There seems to them no opportunity on account of their limitations, but there may be many opportunities if they but knew of them. In many villages there are opportunities of unusual promise to Christian tradesmen, workers in various callings or in orchard, garden or farm.

It is said that the statesmanship of this generation will be shown in getting able and talented people back to the country, so that their strength of mind and muscle can be made productive instead of "consumptive." It is certainly true that there is need of getting into our country churches and homes some of the strength and uplift our city churches have been blessed with. If not the church, what agency is to develop in our country people the sterling qualities of our forefathers whose religious character has to this time bulwarked the moral and spiritual life of this nation?

There may be many country communities looking for people of fidelity whose help will enable them to make a success of some orchard or dairy or garden or farming proposition. And they can give to families a far better living than the city affords. Some town may need a particular tradesman and want a Christian. Some friend of either may know of such opportunities without himself having them. The bond between city and country churches could thus be strengthened and brotherly kindness such as our Lord admires extended.

Train Matrons Proposed

I urge that a consecrated woman be placed on every through train and on all trains entering our great cities to protect girls when traveling and also make it easier for mothers and sisters.

The Travelers' Aid reports assisting a young girl in New York just off an incoming train and on her way to the street all alone to look for a family named Smith! But for the Travelers' Aid another girl might have been added to the sum of the awful tragedies which overtake so many girls and young women traveling alone, some fifteen hundred of whom are said to have disappeared from through trains between New York and Chicago in 1912.

I wish to arouse public opinion to demand that all through trains and all trains entering our great centers from any distance be supplied with train matrons—Protestant, Catholic or Jewish—women of the highest type who will have a double duty: First, to look after women generally, and second, to become acquainted with and to help in every way all young women and girls traveling alone.

Why is it that our railways have neglected giving special care in this way to the hundreds of millions of women travelers, the very class who most need the help of one of their own sex? How many thousands of car sick women there are who would be thankful for the timely assistance of women such as I have described? How is it that railways have failed to realize that trains with such women would attract travel and in large measure offset the additional expense? Thousands of women and girls would travel more often than they now do if their parents knew that they would be under the protection of women of high character.

These women, train matrons for lack of a better title, should have some first aid training, they should be of cheerful demeanor, alert and ever on the watch for the wolves of both sexes who prey on ignorant girls and women. The railways would of course furnish transportation and salaries, but the latter would not be the principal consideration which would attract this type of women, who would not in any sense be servants nor of the type who would look for tips. They would be supplied with leaflets on the dangers of our cities to young women. General Booth of London has expressed personal interest in the plan and his organization here is one of those which could furnish women of the right type.

Ways of Working

Plans for Home Mission Week

Immigration problems can be brought forcibly to the attention of church societies by appointing committees to make personal investigation of housing conditions and manner of living of those who have only recently called themselves Americans. A report of the number of languages spoken by the public school children may bring startling facts. Talks with teachers about the relative scholastic standing of foreign born and native born children may provide food for comment. A plan similar to this was used by a young people's missionary society of Central church, St. Paul, Minn., a year or two ago. Workers among the people studied were also invited to talk to the society. That they were not gifted speakers, but told only of their efforts, appealed to the members.

Women Help Prayer Meeting

The ladies' Sunday school class of Canton, Ill., took charge of one of the midweek prayer meetings recently. Four members of the class were appointed as a reception committee to stand at the door and welcome all who came. All members of the class had invited their friends to make a special effort to be present. One of the women presided and several members of the class took part in the program. Two special musical numbers were also furnished. There was a brief word by the pastor and by the superintendent of Sunday school. After the program light refreshments were served. The social hour developed and strengthened acquaintances in the church. The meeting helped all who attended and did most good to those who took part in the preparations.

There are eighty-four ordained ministers and seventy-eight assistants working among Presbyterian Indian churches.

The Borderland of Heaven

Almighty God has given the world the season of autumn as the borderland between summer and winter. This season has a glory all its own, the beauty of the yellow and crimson leaf and the brilliance of the autumnal sky.

The same good God has made old age to be the borderland between earth and heaven. He has designed it for rest and meditation and for the mellowing of the soul. He has made "the hoary head a crown of glory."

Why should the greed of men and women in the harvest season of life be permitted to rob the aged of their right to a peaceful sojourn in the borderland of heaven? How can they enjoy the borderland of heaven upon a pittance that barely keeps them alive? Do you want to give the veterans of the church a well earned rest in the borderland of heaven?

IN THE FIELD OF CHRISTIAN EFFORT

HAS $50,000 FOR HOME FOR GIRLS

Los Angeles Presbyterian Makes Large Gift—Commission Protects Donors to Charities — Dr. Shaw's Work Grows.

LOS ANGELES—The Florence Crittenden Home of Los Angeles has received a gift of $50,000, the largest in the history of the institution, from O. T. Johnson, a member of Immanuel church. The money will be used to erect a new building with modern equipment for rescue, maternity, industrial and child welfare work. A committee consisting of Mrs. Frank Stoddard, president of the board of managers, with M. H. Hellman, John S. Mitchell and H. M. Hurd, will choose a site. The annual report for the current year shows that ninety-five girls and eighty-eight children were cared for. It is planned to add a day nursery when the new building is complete.

Spanish King to Found Museum—Public announcement has been made that King Alfonso of Spain is interesting himself in the restoration and preservation of the missions of California. The plan contemplates the establishment of museums in connection with the missions for the exhibition of Spanish art in charge of Spanish priests.

Investigate Charity Accounts—A meeting of the Municipal Charities Commission was held recently in the office of the head of the commission, Dr. Milbank Johnson, to form constructive plans for social betterment. According to the rules of the commission every charitable organization in the city must present its books before receiving indorsement. Many organizations have come forward voluntarily with the record of receipts and expenditures, and others are being looked into by the commission.

A portion of the banqueters when Kansas Synod recently met at Emporia College. At the speaker's table: President Culbertson directly under the "O" of "Emporia"; from left to right, Alonzo Wilson, Winfield; A. A. Hyde, Wichita; Dr. William Foulkes, Kansas City; Dr. W. S. Marquis, Rock Island, Ill.; Dr. W. H. Foulkes, Philadelphia; President Culbertson, Emporia; Oliver R. Williamson, Chicago; William Allen White, Emporia; Dr. J. E. Clarke, Nashville; and Mrs. D. H. Stewart, wife of the moderator of Kansas Synod. At this meeting two men each gave a 320-acre farm toward the building and endowment fund of the college. Other pledges brought the total to $23,000.

Work Grows Under Dr. Shaw—The first month of Dr. John Balcom Shaw's pastorate in Immanuel church closed with a communion service at which 150 members were received. Other evidences of activity are seen in the increased attendance upon the midweek prayer meeting, which has passed the 500 mark, and the organization of an adult Bible class under the leadership of the pastor.

THE MOUNTAINS AND BEYOND

Idaho—The brotherhood of Boise First church resumed its meeting with a strong address by ex-Governor John T. Morrison on "Service." The pastor is encouraged by the fact that the prayer meeting attendance the past few months has broken all previous records.

Montana—A manse has recently been built at Terry.—A church has grown out of the Sunday school work at Savoy.—A church has recently been organized by Rev. T. M. Patterson, Jr., at Bear Creek, Mont. This is the outgrowth of a Sunday school organized in 1906.—Although there are only seventeen Presbyterians in Pineville, Mont., they joined with other Protestants in asking for a church organization. The pastor at large, Rev. Alexander Pringle, obtained contributions and a church will soon be built.

Colorado—The congregation at Arapahoe church is building a home for the minister, Rev. H. H. Gane. It will be occupied in October.—The new church at Holly was recently dedicated, the pastor, Rev. W. K. Wright, being assisted by neighboring ministers. It was completed with practically no debt.—Rev. Otis G. Dale, pastor at La Junta, who spent a leave of absence in Rock Island, Ill., has resigned and will seek in Arizona a climate more favorable for his wife's health.

Wyoming—Rev. James A. Slack has just completed his third year at Powell. During that time he has seen his membership increase from twenty-six to 142 and other portions of the work in like manner. A church that seats 350 persons and a comfortable manse have been built.—By enlisting the aid of President Wilson the grant of land to the Presbyterian Indian mission at Arapahoe has been ratified and work has commenced on the buildings. Rev. Edwin E. Preston has charge of the mission and in spite of much determined opposition from some quarters progress is being made. Being located back in the mountains and off the beaten track this mission needs some eastern friends to "discover" it, says Mr. Preston.

NEWS OF VARIOUS DENOMINATIONS

Lutheran—Rev. Heinrich Wunder, pastor of St. Paul's Lutheran church, Chicago, recently celebrated the completion of sixty-two years in that church. From the pastorate of a small congregation of poor people, the sole representatives of Lutheranism in a Western town, Pastor Wunder has seen the denomination grow until he is the Lutheran patriarch in a city which is said by members of that denomination to be the Lutheran metropolis of the world.

United Presbyterian—A plan for intensive denominational cultivation has been proposed by the missionary and efficiency committee of the United Presbyterian Church which met recently at Pittsburg. This plan contemplates a selection of a team of two speakers for every ten congregations in the church and the holding of conferences on Saturday evening and with addresses on Sunday. An exchange of pulpits for all pastors on Feb. 15 is one of the features of this report, which was submitted by the subcommittee on education. George Innes is chairman.

Baptist—Many Presbyterians would approve of such action by Presbytery as that taken by the Philadelphia Baptist Association creating a commission to promote efficiency among the churches of the city and vicinity by "coordination and centralized direction." It was felt that the large churches lived too much for themselves, zealous for their own growth, and gave too little help to the weak churches.

Will Enlist Temperance Army

It is hoped that at least 1,000,000 children throughout the United States will on Nov. 9 sign the total abstinence pledge which Abraham Lincoln kept during his lifetime. The Anti-Saloon League from its headquarters at Westerville, Ohio, is sending out large quantities of pledges to be used in Sunday schools and young people's societies.

Rev. George G. Mahy, secretary of General Assembly's committee on evangelism, has taken great interest in Carroll College and when he was attending the synod at Waukesha, Wis., he was presented by Dr. W. O. Carrier, president, with the degree of doctor of divinity.

PLAN CAMPAIGN FOR ALL CHURCHES

Mass Meeting and Reception for All Officers Will Begin Movement—Dr. Stone to Speak at Banquet—Synod Honors Dr. Ludlow.

CLEVELAND—Beginning Sunday, Nov. 9, the Presbyterian churches of this city will inaugurate a forward movement, holding the evening of that day a union service in Calvary church. The following Tuesday evening in the Chamber of Commerce the church extension committee will give a reception to all the church officials, in number fully 700. The speaker will be Wilton Merle-Smith, D. D., pastor of Central church of New York City and formerly assistant pastor in Old Stone church. Thursday evening the annual banquet of the Presbyterian Union will be held in Hotel Statler, Moderator John Timothy Stone of Chicago being the principal speaker.

Dr. Ludlow Fifth Cleveland Moderator—At the recent meeting of synod Arthur C. Ludlow, D. D., pastor of Miles Park church, was elected moderator, this being the fifth time that the honor has come to Cleveland Presbytery since the foundation of the present synod.

Wooster Memorial to Mr. Severance — Many local Presbyterians would have been glad to attend the Severance memorial in Westminster church of Wooster had the time not been Sunday. President Holden, Dr. O. A. Hills, Dr. Chalmers Martin, David Roderick and Professor H. C. Grumbine took part.—At the recent meeting of synod Sheldon Parks, a member of East Cleveland church, was elected a trustee of Wooster.

Various Recent Events—Rev. Peter E. Monnet, pastor of Beckwith Memorial Italian church, has resumed his Sunday afternoon French service, which has been conducted for a number of years in Second church at 4 o'clock. —The Chinese Sunday school, which is held in Old Stone church during the winter months, has also resumed its work. —At the close of Dr. R. R. Bigger's fourth year in Westminster church that congregation finds itself greatly strengthened, provision having been made for the debt of $12,500, while the Sunday school has increased to a 900 enrollment.—Rev. Adam C. Thompson and his people of Lorain church recently rejoiced over the burning of a mortgage.

Cleveland's Gifts to Charity Increase

After five months' work on the part of the federation of charity and philanthropy of Cleveland, Ohio, the number of individual givers to the half hundred social organizations in the federation have increased from 6,000 to 8,000. Money for all organizations of a charitable nature is collected through one agency. An effort is also being made to establish a central purchasing bureau for the various philanthropies.

Young Women from Many Colleges

The National Board Training School of the Young Women's Christian Association in New York City opened with forty-five students, representing three universities and seventeen colleges. Three of these students came from the extreme South and four from the Pacific coast. Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin of Madison Avenue church delivered the opening address.

LEARN WAYS OF SUNDAY SCHOOL WORK

Conferences Attract Large Majority of Teachers and Officers—Dr. McGaw After Long Service Is Honorably Retired.

PORTLAND, ORE.—There was a total of 656 people registered at various meetings in connection with the special campaign in the interest of Sunday schools the last week in September. The whole month was filled with special exercises leading up to the special conferences. At the luncheon for pastors and superintendents there were present sixty-five persons, including all but four pastors and all but seven Sunday school superintendents. Conferences with workers were held in nineteen churches and attracted 74 per cent of the teachers and officers in the schools concerned. The entire program was under the general direction of Rev. A. M. Williams, district educational superintendent for Idaho, Oregon and Washington. A similar Sunday school week of interdenominational character held in the city a year ago attracted only 109 Presbyterians, which was then thought a good representation. Of twenty-two Presbyterian churches in the city seventeen have definitely adopted the Sunday school standard as the basis for their organization. The blanks for the educational survey of each church covered details of all sorts in connection with enrollment and management of the school and the participation of parents in the religious education of the young.

A Minister Fifty-Five Years—Dr. J. A. P. McGaw, who was honorably retired by presbytery, is 79 years of age and has served fifty-five years in the ministry. He moved to Portland in 1904 after resigning a six-year pastorate at Fort Wayne, Ind. He volunteered his services wherever they might be required by the synodical missionary and during the past nine years has spoken to many of the congregations in Oregon. For more than a year he had charge of the Protestant Indians in a large government school and about 100 of them were received into the churches at Salem. During his ministry he has received 452 people into the church. He served the U. P. Church ten years after leaving seminary and was pastor of Presbyterian churches in Rock Island, Ill., Central, Toledo, Ohio, First, Kansas City Linwood, and Springfield, Ohio, First.

Will Study Civic Righteousness—An open forum for the discussion of applied Christianity and the cultivation of civic righteousness has been started in connection with First church by the pastor, Dr. John H. Boyd.

MINISTER STUDIES LABOR CONDITIONS

DETROIT—At the ministers' meeting Oct. 20 Rev. James D. MacDonald gave an account of his investigation of the big strike at the copper mines in Houghton and Keweenaw counties. It was a very thorough examination into the conflicting claims of the mine owners, the miners and the Western Association of Miners. Such experiences are the best possible refutation of the assertion that ministers are not interested in practical social and industrial questions. The Ministers' Association has appointed a committee to report on the advisability of inviting Rev. Charles Stelzle to hold conferences in Detroit in the near future.—A. M. Bruner of Chicago, national secretary of the Industrial Evangelistic Foundation, has been in Detroit for a few weeks, addressing Y. M. C. A. shop meetings and community extension institutes.

Hope to Find Lost Members—Central church has been conducting a thorough canvàss of the neighborhood of the church. One hundred visitors, under the direction of the session, have visited 11,000 people and have thousands of names of those who claim some church affiliation, and have given the names to churches interested. It is hoped in this way to reclaim lapsed members. Dr. Hugh Jack is pastor.

Chuch Investments Lag—Detroit's manufacturing capital increased from $15,000,000 in 1880 to $210,000,000 in 1913, or fourteen times. Detroit Presbyterianism has increased its church property plus its various endowments to at least six times its valuation in 1880. But the contributions of the Detroit Presbyterian churches since 1880 for congregational expenses have increased from $37,000 to $241,000 or nearly seven times, and the benevolent contributions from less than $14,000 to $72,000, or over five times as much. The seven churches have become nineteen.

Synods Hear Encouraging Reports

Per Capita Gifts Are Large—A notable feature of the meeting of California Synod was the placing of San Francisco Theological Seminary under supervision of General Assembly. The change of presbyterial boundaries is agitated both in the north and the south of this immense synod. New populations are accumulating so rapidly in the Sacramento and Imperial valleys that extraordinary home mission effort is required to serve them. The matter is in the hands of a committee. Addresses were made by Dr. John Balcom Shaw on foreign missions, Dr. Oxtoby in behalf of education, Dr. McLean for the Spanish work and President Baer for Occidental College. Dr. Graham Lee told his miracle stories of Korean missions. A wholly new experience for synod occurred when a professor of the state university invited all its members to attend in December the proposed "Clergymen's Week" of agricultural instruction. Entertainment and probably transportation will be provided clergymen, Y. M. C. A. secretaries and theological students. Many statistics encouragingly favorable and stimulatingly unfavorable were produced in committee reports. Synod gives $1.31 a member for foreign missions, which is above the average for the synods, and the self-supporting home mission presbyteries give 73 cents a member, or about twice that required in eastern synods for self-support. The ladies' foreign mission societies reported gifts of $22,935. Los Angeles Presbytery, besides being self-supporting in home missions, leads the synod in foreign mission gifts with $1.68 a member. William S. Young, D. D., of Los Angeles, for twenty-one years stated clerk of synod, was this year unanimously made its moderator.

A. P. Vaughn.

Synod Will Support Missionary—North Dakota Synod met at Langdon and was opened with a sermon by the retiring moderator, Rev. G. W. Barnum, who has just accepted a call to Boise, Idaho. Charles W. Harris, D. D., of Bismarck was elected moderator. Thursday afternoon was spent in a conference on personal and pastoral evengelism. S. B. Roberts, D. D., of Minneapolis led the conference. A new and helpful feature of this meeting of synod was the devotional services led by Dr. Roberts. Rev. Moses Breeze and Doctors William Hiram Foulkes, Jesse C. Bruce, Richard C. Hughes, Calvin H. French, William R. King and Rev. G. G. Mahy addressed synod upon phases of the work with which they are connected.

Miss Abbie Upham, representing the Woman's Board of New York City, and Mrs. J. P. Engstrom of the Board of the Northwest were in attendance at the woman's synodical society and addressed synod.

As a result of a stirring address by Dr. King on Sunday evening Landon church raised nearly $1,000 toward the support of a foreign missionary in China. The next forenoon synod resolved to support a missionary of its own in China. The money to support this missionary is to be raised over and above the usual budget for foreign missions.

Synod overtured General Assembly on the matter of synodical oversight of home mission work. It also took strong ground in the matter of urging stricter enforcement of law against intemperance in the state and nation.

Texas Ready for Union—Synod of Texas met in Waxahachie and elected Rev. R. H. Rogers of San Antonio moderator. The stated clerk, Rev. S. M. Templeton, in office twenty years, and permanent clerk, Rev. R. W. Benge, were each reelected. The interests of Trinity University engaged the attention of synod to a greater extent than usual and much impetus was given to the campaign for $150,000 within the next fifteen months.

At an evening educational popular meeting addresses were made by W. A. Provine, D. D., of Nashville and Rev. J. H. Burma of Dallas. Dr. John R. Sutherland addressed synod in the interest of the relief-sustentation fund, and synod urged that open doors in the churches be extended to the representatives of this fund. The home missions committee reported that three new Bohemian churches have been organized. An interesting Mexican work at San Angelo was also reported. A program for vigorous work on home missions was laid out and a request made to the board for the services of Dr. Warren H. Wilson and Rev. Moses Breeze. Addresses were made by Rev. Robert McLean, Rev. R. Thomsen and by Elder H. C. Glenn of Temple. Mrs. W. B. Preston, president of the synodical woman's missionary society, conducted an interesting popular meeting. Rev. J. T. Molly, for eleven years a missionary at Aguas Calientes, Mexico, made stirring addresses Saturday and Sunday.

A strong resolution offered by Dr. Bishop touching the vigorous war on houses of prostitution in Austin, Dallas and other Texas cities led to an illuminating discussion by Dr. Bishop, Dr. J. Frank Smith and Rev. Glenn L. Sneed.

A resolution offered by J. Frank Smith, D. D., and adopted, expressed gratification at the unanimity of the vote by Presbyterians favoring the union negotiations with the Reformed Church and a strong desire and prayer "for the union of the whole Presbyterian family, east, north, south or west, as speedily as it can be accomplished without hurt to all the interests involved," and a willingness "to sacrifice in order to the attainment of the larger end—a united Presbyterianism, and ultimately a united Protestantism and a united Christendom."

Is Twenty-One Years Old—Synod of Montana celebrated its majority by holding its twenty-first annual meeting at Billings. The opening sermon was preached by J. M. Ross, D. D., of Anaconda. Rev. Newman Hall Burdick, pastor of First church, Helena, was elected moderator.

This resolution was presented by the committee on narrative at General Assembly, Atlanta: "That all pastors and sessions be requested to see to it that our excellent little paper Over Sea and Land be found in every home where there are children, so that early in life they will become interested in mission work."

Over Sea and Land is the only missionary magazine for children of the Presbyterian Church—a monthly devoted to telling the news from the home and foreign fields.

BELIEVES THERE IS LESS PROFANITY

r. Speer Talks at University of Pennsylvania—No Member in Hundred Years Connected with Liquor Traffic.

PHILADELPHIA—Dr. Robert E. Speer, secre-ry of the Foreign Board, in an address before e faculty and students of the University of Penn-·lvania Oct. 19 dwelt upon the prevailing and creasing influence of Jesus Christ in the world's e. He believes that there is less profane use of s name than formerly and asserted that never had e world been so receptive of Christianity as at esent. In the evening he preached in the Taber-ıcle. In the plan to esablish church centers for e students of the university the above church be-mes the center for Presbyterian students.

Bring Offering to Altar—At Harvest Home Day Bethany Temple, Rev. Asa J. Ferry pastor, the ferings were made by the congregation marching the front of the church and depositing the gifts front of the pulpit. The total contributions nounted to more than $5,000, which will be ap-ied to liquidating a mortgage.

Personal Items—Dr. W. Y. Brown, commissioner synod, whose name had been spoken of in con-ction with the moderatorship, was obliged to fore- attendance owing to an accident which resulted a broken collar bone.—Rev. T. Clayton Welles, esbyterial missionary of Philadelphia North, was cently married to Miss Anna Priscilla Lowrie of 'atsontown, Pa.—Miss Gertrude Schultz has been ected field secretary of the Woman's Board of oreign Missions. This board reports its treasury ,000 ahead of this time last year.

Has an Honored Record — Among the speakers the 100th anniversary of the Church of the rethren were Dr. John R. Davies, John Wana-aker, former Governor Pennypacker and Superin-ndent Brumbaugh. During the century of this urch's existence no member, it is said, ever vned, operated or petitioned for a saloon; nor s the church permitted any of its poor to become charge on the community. Its present pastor Rev. D. Webster Kurtz.

Dedicate Church Soon; Big Bible Class—Rich-dson Memorial church, O. G. McDowell, D. D., stor, erected at a cost of $125,000, will dedicated with special services Nov. 2. Bridesburg church, Rev. W. L. Schmalhorst stor, has a men's Bible class which numbers 200. series of six lecture-entertainments has been ranged for their monthly socials.

May Merge Churches — Many Presbyterian urches in the southern part of the city have en consolidated from time to time and it has en proposed recently to unite Mizpah with James vans Memorial church. The latter was formed few years since by the union of Wharton Street d South Broad Street churches.

Laboring Men Help in Social Service—A cam-ign in which men who work in the mills will co-erate with the Christian church in social service orts will be inaugurated Nov. 9. On that day rty pulpits, it is said, will be occupied by leading cial workers of the nation. At one of the meet-gs the foremen, superintendents and heads of partments of the city's largest industries will eet in conference. Dr. Edwin Heyl Delk is ominent in the movement. W. P. White.

ILLY SUNDAY WILL TACKLE PITTSBURG

clined to Forego Battle When Choice Site Was Denied—Four Campaigns for Money Started or in Prospect.

PITTSBURG—The question of Billy Sunday's ming to Pittsburg has finally been settled. When was reported to Mr. Sunday that the Old Cathe-al site could not be obtained he declined to come. ct. 21 a party of business men and preachers ent to Steubenville and prevailed on him to ange his mind. Mr. Sunday finally yielded and e tabernacle, with a capacity of 12,000, will be ilt on the Oakland site, near the Carnegie li-ary. Committees have been selected and plans carry out the campaign inaugurated.

VETERAN PASTOR AND WIFE CELEBRATE

Dr. Walker Married Half Century—Brotherhood Men Are at Work—Recent Occurrences at Cincinnati.

CINCINNATI—Golden wedding echoes reverberated through presbytery when one of the ministerial patriarchs—Dr. J. H. Walker—and wife celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of their marriage at their Clifton home. The veteran is now serving the people at Pleasant Run, where the church people at the last service presented the couple with a purse of gold coin. Most of Dr. Walker's local ministry has been at College Hill. He came here from Chicago.

No Successor to Dr. Goss—Avondale, former pastorate of Charles Frederic Goss, the cleric-author, is still supplied by Dr. Edward Mack of Lane Seminary.

Men of Bible Class Active—Men of Kennedy Heights are aroused to action and new life was infused into the Bible class at a supper addressed by Charles Edgar Wilson, leader of the big brotherhood class at Norwood.—The Norwood class had a recent "get together" dinner which was marked by a splendid turnout and enthusiastic helpful talks.

Layman Conducts Services—Linwood Presbyterians have joined with all the other congregations in union gospel services directed by a Norwood layman, C. E. Bennett.—Dr. Edward Mack has resumed his Bible study classes at the Y. W. C. A.; his last lecture was on "Judges: A Nation's Adolescence." Ren Mulford, Jr.

NEW TEMPERANCE SECRETARIES

The Board of Temperance has secured the services of three additional workers. Rev. Clarence G. Miller, Ph. D., until recently pastor of First church of Fremont, Ohio, takes charge of the Ohio and Indiana district. Robert C. Westenberg, D. D., has been invited to take charge of the Iowa-Nebraska district, and Rev. John E. Fulton is jointly employed by the board and by the Women's Presbyterial Society of Pittsburg to work among foreign-speaking people.

Dr. Westenberg is pastor of First church, Marshalltown, Iowa, and will enter upon his duties as soon as arrangements can be made. Dr. Westenberg has traveled widely in Europe and the Orient and is an expert in the use of a stereopticon. Dr. Miller enters upon his work Nov. 1. He is warmly commended by President Holden of Wooster University and other prominent ministers throughout Ohio and Indiana, where he is widely and favorably known. Mr. Fulton has been pastor of the church at Donora, Pa., for seven years and is no stranger to the people for whom and with whom he is to work. His sympathy with them and deep interest in the temperance cause promise to make him a useful addition to the board's corps of workers.

The board is in receipt of numerous calls to which it is unable to respond. The high grade of the work and the careful business methods commend themselves to a rapidly increasing number of our churches. The demand for literature, programs, pledge cards and other supplies is also increasing rapidly. One of the slogans is "You can get anything in the line of temperance from the Presbyterian Board of Temperance which you can get anywhere else." Charles Scanlon.

FRIENDS HONOR EVERETT SISSON

A large company of his business friends gathered at a farewell luncheon in honor of Everett Sisson at the Union League Club, Chicago, Oct. 24. Mr. Sisson, who was for years the publisher of The Interior and The Continent, has now completely recovered his health after over two years' rest. He will, however, reside in a milder climate than that of Chicago, having accepted the Pacific coast management of the Curtis Publishing Company, Philadelphia, with offices at San Francisco.

The gathering at the Union League Club brought together about seventy of Mr. Sisson's associates in the social and business life of Chicago, and letters were read from numbers of others who could not be present.

WILL RAISE BIG SUM FOR BUILDINGS

New York Christian Associations Launch Project —Brick Church Adds to Mission Gifts—Seaside Preaching Successful.

NEW YORK—One hundred men and women interested in the Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations of New York City Oct. 21 planned a whirlwind campaign for $4,000,000 with which to erect new buildings for the two associations. The campaign will be opened Nov. 10 and will last two weeks. The young men's association is to have only $1,000,000 and the young women's $3,000,000. Charles S. Ward, secretary of the international committee of the Y. M. C. A., who has raised $20,000,000 for the association in the last eight years, is in charge. Some of the prime movers in the undertaking are George W. Perkins, William Fellowes Morgan, Henry P. Davison, Miss Grace H. Dodge and Mrs. James S. Cushman.

Dr. Grenfell Talks to Boys — The all-Brooklyn older boys' conference Oct. 17 to 19, the first ever undertaken by Brooklyn churches, was pronounced a great success. Nearly 350 delegates registered. Dr. Wilfred T. Grenfell addressed the boys at the first service.

State W. C. T. U. Prospers—Preceding the opening of the world's convention of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, New York state W. C. T. U. held its annual convention Oct. 22 in the Hanson Place M. E. church, Brooklyn. The treasurer's report showed a balance of over $20,000. The total membership in New York state is 34,000.

Will Lecture on Missions—Rev. James B. Rodgers, pastor of the Presbyterian church in Manila, who for the past few months has been serving as secretary for the Foreign Board during the absence of Dr. White, will deliver a course of eight lectures on missions in Union Seminary Wednesdays and Fridays of November and to Dec. 12.

Immigration Students Return—The students of Union Seminary gathered in the social room last week to welcome home Rev. Kenneth D. Miller and Rev. Joel B. Hayden from their year's stay in Austria-Hungary. They are two of the immigration "fellows" sent by the Home Board to study immigration problems abroad. Mr. Miller is now associated by Dr. Vincent Pisek at the John Huss Bohemian church and Mr. Hayden goes to St. Paul's Polish church, Baltimore.

More Aid to City Missions—Brick church, Dr. W. P. Merrill pastor, inaugurated on Sunday, Oct. 26, a new offering for Presbyterian home missions in New York City. Brick church is already maintaining on its own account two affiliated churches, Covenant and Christ, at an expense of over $25,000 a year. The church also gives $4,000 to the Home Board. This new offering is to go directly to the home mission work of New York Presbytery. The girls' lunch club of Brick church is beginning in a small way an employment bureau as a feature of its own work. The club is now entirely self-supporting with an average daily attendance of 350.

Negroes Remember Beecher—Nearly 2,000 negroes gathered in old Plymouth church, Brooklyn, Oct. 22 to celebrate the centennial of the birth of Henry Ward Beecher. Many white people were present, and General Horatio King, who is a member of Plymouth church, welcomed the gathering in behalf of the congregation. The meeting was presided over by G. E. Wibecan, one of the foremost negroes of the city.

Preach at Coney Island—During the summer Brooklyn City Mission Society conducted evangelistic work at Coney Island. A carefully kept record shows that 164,500 people attended the services at sixty-eight open air meetings. Thirty-one different nationalities were represented. Over 1,360 asked for prayers and 300 professed conversion. Cards and pamphlets were presented to all who would accept them and nearly 2,000 Bibles and portions of Scripture in various languages were given away.

"Earn your passage and $25"

At Leyden, Holland, last July a young man spent most of his time during the day at the railway station seeking customers—his nights and idle moments in study. As a guide he piloted visitors to places famous in Dutch history. In this capacity, having been trustworthy, he served a representative of Dubuque German College and Seminary on several sight seeing trips about the town. He was intelligent and made an effort to enliven dry facts of the past. He became interested in the opportunity offered by the college in America which would help him to be a minister, and wanted to know how he could come to Dubuque.

"Earn your passage and bring $25, and we will find work for you in America," was the reply.

Before October was a week old, the young man was at Dubuque ready to continue the studies he had been following by himself in Leyden.

He is one of many men from a score of countries studying in our institution to be Presbyterian pastors. The story of how others were found and brought to Dubuque will interest you. Address C. M. Steffens, D.D., President, Dubuque German College and Seminary, Dubuque, Iowa.

PRESBYTERY MEETINGS

Will Confer on Evangelism—Elizabeth Presbytery favored union with the Reformed Church, commended the united mission campaign, ordered two evangelistic conferences at an early date, and held a conference on Christian education, conducted by Dr. J. W. Cochran.

Consider Christian Education—At the meeting of Olympia Presbytery there was held a two hours' conference in the interest of Christian education. Rev. R. E. Cooper of Aberdeen was elected moderator. At his own request Rev. Andrew G. Boyd was retired. Presbytery appointed a committee on evangelism with Dr. McLeod as chairman.

Enroll Holt Chinese Church—Portland Presbytery elected Rev. J. E. Synder moderator. J. F. P. McGaw, D. D., resigned as stated clerk and C. W. Hays, D. D., was elected to fill the place. Ng Mon Poo was received under the care of presbytery as a candidate for the ministry. A Chinese church which takes the name of the Holt Chinese Presbyterian church of Portland was enrolled.

Emphasizes Home Mission Week—At the meeting of Kendall Presbytery Synodical Superintendent J. H. Barton, D. D., delivered an address on home mission work, placing emphasis upon the every-member canvass and home mission week. The fine prospects for work in the Teton basin country were set forth and the newly licensed pastor, Robert McElwee, will enter upon the work there at once. The request for the half cent per member for vacancy and supply was granted.

Hungarians Would Preach—Westchester Presbytery met in Scarborough, N. Y., church. Rev. William T. Duncan was licensed to preach and two candidates for the ministry, members of the Hungarian church of Yonkers, were received under the care of presbytery. The live questions under discussion were Christian education and the every-member campaign for benevolence. Joseph W. Cochran, D. D., spoke on the former and David McConaughy on the latter. The every-member campaign was placed in charge of a committee.

Plan One-Day Conferences—Princeton Presbytery met at Dixon, Ky. One-half of the churches were represented. Elder W. P. Black was elected moderator. An earnest effort will be made to increase the number and efficiency of young people's societies next year. Presbytery heartily indorsed the united missionary campaign and every-member canvass. Two teams are designated for work in Kentucky under the united campaign. Presbytery has authorized a campaign of one-day conferences among home mission churches and weaker churches that cannot be reached by these larger agencies.

Hold Services in Vacant Churches — Winona Presbytery at Rochester, Minn., elected Rev. W. Edward Williams moderator. Resolutions were adopted urging that evangelistic services be held in all vacant churches and all home mission churches in cooperation with the pastor or minister in charge, to be conducted or provided for by the pastor-evangelist; that every home mission church make a thorough every-member canvass for benevolence as well as self-support; and that the pastor-evangelist be requested to continue his work of conducting Sunday school institutes. Finlay D. McMartin and O. L. Morgan were received as candidates for the ministry.

Form New Committee—St. Paul Presbytery at White Bear Lake, Minn., elected Rev. J. A. Johnston moderator. Dr. George E. Davies of St. Paul was appointed to receive names of members changing residences. A committee was formed out of the committees on home missions, Sunday school work, church erection and church extension with the name of the latter. Union with Reformed Church was affirmed. Presbytery does not approve of the expenses of the committee on vacancy and supply being paid by an assessment on the churches. Dayton Avenue church, St. Paul, was congratulated on the volunteering for foreign service of two of her members, the Misses Brack.

Plan Gifts to Ministers' Fund—"Our Part in the Endowment" was the most thrilling feature of the Fort Pierce meeting of Florida Presbytery. Dr. E. G. McLean, the chairman, submitted the report of the committee and announced that $596 had been subscribed during the first day of effort. Each bread-winner member of churches is asked by this presbytery to pay $6 a year for five years as a minimum subscription to be distributed between relief and sustentation. At the education rally Dr. Faris of Miami delivered an address and Rev. H. C. Denison of Lake Alfred and Dr. Frost of Crystal River spoke at the foreign missionary meeting Sunday night.

Large Missionary Responsibility—Benicia Presbytery convened in Santa Rosa, Cal., before and during the session of synod. The body is delighted with the fact that Dr. Oxtoby, formerly of Philadelphia, now professor of Hebrew in San Anselmo, brings his membership to this presbytery. Presbytery's territory is an empire in extent and almost wholly a mission work, but existing organizations are more fully manned and the oversight of the home mission committee and evangelist is felt to be more intimate and helpful than for a long time past. Presbytery faces the responsibility of providing permanent appropriate religious ministry for thousands of Italians in its lumber camps now unreached.

Would Have Department Retained—St. Joseph Presbytery has overtured General Assembly to continue the department of church and country life and the home mission secretary for the South and Southwest; also to change rules of the Board of Church Erection touching the matter of loans to churches so as to eliminate the requirement that such loans shall be secured by "a satisfactory collateral personal bond."

Ordain Licentiate—Rio Grande Presbytery met in adjourned session of Tucumcari, N. M. Overture on union with Reformed Church was answered in the affirmative. J. W. Harrison of Silver City church was taken under the care of presbytery as a candidate for the misistry. Liceniate William Price Wright was examined for ordination and presbytery adjourned until Oct. 10 to meet in Rincon church, which Mr. Wright has been supplying since Jan. 1, that he might be ordained in the presence of his own congregation.

SALT RIVER EXPERIMENT SUCCEEDING

Two pastors brought into Salt River Presbytery through the efforts of the department of church and country life of the Home Board have declined tempting offers to other fields. According to Dr. Warren H. Wilson of the Home Board the experiment which the board has been undertaking in this presbytery for the last thirteen months is succeeding. The elders and most of the ministers have consistently adhered to the plan first adopted of grouping churches to form pastorates and requiring ministers to make their residence near the churches in which they preach.

There were two years ago five ministers preaching in a scattered fashion in different pulpits on different Sundays and living sometimes as far as fifty miles away from their charges. There are now only three ministers thus intinerating. The way is open for three more men to undertake the building of churches along the lines of Presbyterian tradition who will live in the country. They will have the backing of presbytery and the Home Board.

TO EVANGELIZE THE COLLEGES

Rev. William H. Crothers of Logan, Utah, has been engaged by the Board of Education to become its secretary for "candidate enlistment." His task will be to travel among the Presbyterian colleges and inculcate as far as possible among the students a serious consideration of their vocational duty toward the kingdom of God, with especial appeal for the ministry or other religious callings. Prior to taking up this work, however, Mr. Crothers is to be for four months under the joint employ of the Board of Education and the Assembly's evangelistic committee, for whom he is to set up a more extensive plan of college visitation in connection with the day of prayer than has yet been carried out.

Secretaries Cochran and Mahy, representing the board and committee respectively, are to join again, as they did a year ago, in visiting a number of colleges for evangelistic campaigns. They propose to spend practically a week in each of seven important Presbyterian institutions, beginning with the second week of November in Wooster. Their service in this particular was greatly blessed last year in Coe, Macalester and Carroll. It is hoped also to organize a second team.

SCHOOL AND COLLEGE

The School Is Crowded—Hillcrest School, Beaver Dam, Wis., a Presbyterian school for girls under 15 years of age, has this year all the pupils it can care for.

Enrollment One-Third Greater—Kentucky College for Women was forced at the opening of school to enlarge its faculty on account of an increase of one-third in its enrollment.

Ohio Furnishes Most Students—The freshman class this year at Western College is the largest in the history of the institution and numbers an increase of 18 per cent over the freshman class last year. Ohio furnishes 35 per cent of the students and Indiana 30 per cent.

Princeton Gets Big Addition

Princeton University's Graduate College and Grover Cleveland memorial tower were dedicated at Princeton Oct. 23 in the presence of a large number of distinguished American and European scholars. All of Princeton's graduate students will be housed in the new structure. William H. Taft and Dr. Hibben, president of Princeton, took prominent parts in the exercises.

Expect Much of Purity Congress

The World's Purity Federation Congress to be held in Minneapolis Nov. 7-12 promises to be one of the most important gatherings of this organization that have ever been held. Eminent reformers and philanthropists throughout America and foreign lands will be present. It is expected that this congress will be the most important meeting ever held for the repression of public vice.

A LOOK AHEAD
WITH THE CONTINENT FAMILY

¶ "I look at the news first," said a caller at The Continent office the other day. He is but one of many who have made similar comment on the paper. Of the many news features each week the Calendar and Record is likely to draw attention first. This department as well as all the news of the field of Christian effort will be covered this fall and winter more thoroughly than ever before.

¶ A mass of digested information is presented each week—dates of synod and presbytery meetings (women's meetings as well), calls, resignations, accessions, vacant pulpits and similar news. Often the activities of sixty to eighty pastors in various parts of the country are mentioned thus in a single issue. Graduates of the various seminaries keep track of their classmates, congregations learn where former pastors are now at work.

¶ As a stimulus to renewed evangelistic zeal by pastors and people, the weekly record of accessions is serving a useful purpose. Except for this tabulation, church members have no means of knowing what other churches than their own are doing in the way of adding members.

¶ The Calendar and Record is in itself an active vacancy and supply bureau. Few pastors can leave their work in any part of the country without information being transmitted very soon to the news editor's desk. Perusal of the "resignations" column gives ministers suggestions of possible larger opportunities than afforded in their present pastorates.

Financial Situation

Chasing Rainbows for Large Returns on Stock in Prospective Companies Often Serious to People of Small Means.

"Chasing rainbows" is an occupation which many people did not leave behind when they outgrew other childish things. The results of rainbow chasing by those whose financial means are small present to bankers and those who advise investors some of the most difficult problems with which they have to deal. Women who must depend upon their own resources or who have $1,000 or so to support them for the rest of their life seem to be attracted by the brazen promises of promoters to a much larger extent than are men of moderate wealth who perchance can afford to lose $3,000 or $4,000 on foolish investments and suffer no bad consequences. Dreams of farms in Utopia which will produce many round dollars after the soil bears grape fruit; lots out West, the value of which will increase thirty or sixty times as soon as some city grows; suburban tracts "within easy distance of New York"; stock in oil wells not yet driven; shares in textbook companies which need only a large patronage to bring big returns—these and many other "opportunities" are offered to those who would chase financial rainbows, but only seldom does this sort of investment return profits.

What Is the Acid Test?—The person who buys stock in a little known concern very often gets nothing that is of value. All of the assets of the concern may be mortgaged so heavily that, if there is trouble, after the bondholders are satisfied there is nothing left. People who buy bonds must be sure that the assets behind the bonds are of sufficient value so that if a sale were suddenly forced for some reason there would be enough realized to return to them the money paid for the bond. If the concern which has issued both bonds and stocks is forced into liquidation and a court sells the assets, the bondholders are paid first. If there is anything left after they are satisfied the stockholders get their share. Before you buy stock inquire what would be left if the company went into receiver's hands. If a corporation earns large sums of money, the bondholders will get no more than a specified rate of interest. The stockholders, on the other hand, divide most of the profits after the fixed charges are taken care of. This dividend in many concerns runs as high as 20 or 30 per cent. Buying of stock is more a gamble on the future prosperity of a concern than it is an investment. Bonds and farm mortgages are two different classes of ordinarily safe investments, although they have not the attraction of the extra dividends sometimes earned by stock as a reward for the hazard. There can be found, however, few more safe investments than a farm mortgage bought through a reliable house.

The Continent Will Advise You—Readers of this column who are puzzled over the advisability of making contemplated investments are at liberty to seek advice from The Continent. A postage stamp is all that is needed for a prompt reply.

The Present Financial Outlook—The absence of serious labor trouble, the gathering of a fair harvest and general employment of labor give promise that the financial future of the country will be free from serious trouble. The tariff readjustment, the tightness of the money market and the dullness of the stock exchange are set forth as indications by pessimists that the financial skies are not as clear as they seem. Meanwhile, however, trade generally is good and the amount of money in circulation is fully up to normal.

Big Losses by Mexican Anarchy—People who invested their savings in Mexican rubber stock a few years ago are in many cases regretting their purchase on account of the troublous times in Mexico. Not only industrial concerns in that country, but railways as well, have been forced to cut their dividends and in some places the property which in other years has earned dividends is now in the hands of the enemies of established order.

Foreign Mission Church in Michigan

There was recently discovered at Calumet, Mich., a Hungarian Protestant church of 145 members. It has Presbyterian leanings and was brought to the notice of presbyterial authorities by Rev. Moses Breeze. This church is supported in part by the Reformed Church of Austria-Hungary, so that it is in effect a foreign mission of that European denomination.

Wednesday was largely devoted to hearing the messages brought by the representatives of the boards and committees of General Assembly, and reports of committees of synod representing the same boards.

That synod seeks to keep step with the church in the adoption of improved methods of work is shown by the adoption of a plan by which home mission work of synod is centralized in one committee. Synod also overtured the Presbyteries within her bounds on the subject of consolidation of Sunday school and home mission committees. Committees were appointed to cooperate with President Henry R. Fancher in increasing the endowment of the College of Montana from $100,000 to $300,000.

A committee was appointed to cooperate with similar committees of synods of the Northwest in erecting a monument to the memory of Rev. and Mrs. H. H. Spalding. Rev. Edwin M. Ellis was reelected synodical superintendent of Sunday school work, a position he has held ever since the erection of synod in 1893

Has No Outside Speakers—This year Missouri Synod at St. Joseph broke away from precedent, closed the door to all outside speakers, and gave serious consideration to its work. Conferences were held at the morning and afternoon sessions with inspirational addresses in the evenings. Each conference passed at last naturally into a prayer meeting with definite aims and petitions. The one cry is for men not afraid to face the problem of an unsaved community in country or in city; men whom the offer of a thousand dollars more salary cannot divert from a great need. The rural church, the city slums, the lumber and mining camps all clamor for men—Godly, patient, prayerful, powerful, persistent, prophetic, saved men. Rev. F. S. Arnold, Rev. W. H. Black and Rev. F. W. Russell made evening addresses. The Summer Assembly of the Southwest at Hollister now passes from direct control of synod into the hands of a self-perpetuating body. The executive commission was instructed to prepare and transmit to the presbyteries an overture and plan for making synod a delegated body, and also to confer with the Synod of Missouri, U. S., relative to joint interest in the school of the Ozarks at Forsyth. Synod will meet next year in Marshall to join in celebrating the twenty-fifth anniversary of Missouri Valley College.

Wisconsin Draws Large Crowd—A conference on religious education preceded the meeting of Wisconsin Synod at Waukesha. Conference speakers were Rev. H. W. Knox of Green Bay, Dr. W. A. Canfield of Carroll College and Rev. N. B. Barr of Chicago. The attendance at synod was the largest in its history. Rev. John L. Marquis of Neenah was moderator and the following were recommended to be continued: Rev. M. G. Allison, university pastor; Dr. Gerritt Verkuyl, educational superintendent; Rev. R. A. Carnahan, financial secretary of home mission committee; Rev. C. A. Adams, Merrill, and Rev. C. J. McConnell, Superior, district superintendents. Moderator Stone, Doctors C. L. Thompson, R. C. Hughes, W. J. Johnson, J. M. Gaston, S. B. Stewart and Alexander Henry were among the special speakers.

The university work at Madison carried on by the student pastor has grown so that a committee of three was appointed to confer with representatives of other denominations as to the advisability of an interdenominational building for religious meetings. There are about 700 Presbyterian students there. Carroll College in its opportunity and effective work for the 250 students so impressed synod that it was decided to ask the churches for offerings of 50 cents per member. The home mission work continues to grow in interest. The dollar per member secures cordial response. The women's societies maintain constant cooperation generously.

Synod adopted the new standard of Sunday school work and also voted to secure if possible an increase of 25 per cent in offerings for the board. Evangelism received a new impetus from the presence of Dr. George G. Mahy, secretary of Assembly's committee.

Elder William H. Phipps of Hudson was appointed vice moderator. Through his generosity Hudson church built a $20,000 Sunday school and young people's house.

Rev. W. T. Angus of Eau Claire impressed synod with his appeal for the special China propaganda, ably backed by S. N. Wilson, D. D., Rev. John R. Muir of China Inland mission and H. W. Reherd, D. D. George E. Hunt, D. D., of Madison gave a paper on "The Church and the Child" that will be used throughout the Sunday schools of the church.

Need More Money for State Work—New Jersey Synod met with Olivet church, Atlantic City. The moderator was Principal J. C. Sharpe, head of Blair Academy, Blairstown. He appointed Rev. Courtlandt P. Butler of Lakewood vice moderator. The session was principally notable for the adoption of a new home mission plan. New Jersey was one of the first synods to adopt the idea of synodical self-support, but like New York and Pennsylvania, it provided for separate funds and all through the twenty-six years during which the synod has worked under this policy it has taken separate collections for the Home Board in New York and for its own state work. The great inrush of foreigners into the state, however, has enormously increased the burden of home evangelization and the feeling that more money must be had for state work induced the appointment a year ago of a committee, whereof Dr. Nelson Chester has been chairman, to devise means of enlarging the synod's missionary income.

This committee reported an adaptation of the "Indiana plan," by which all home mission collections go to the synod's treasurer, who will forward an assigned percentage to the New York board. The New Jersey proposition differs, however, in leaving this percentage to be fixed anew year after year in conference between the synodical committee and a representative of the Home Board. It is suggested that the division at first will be two-thirds for state work and one-third for board.

The debate led to general consent that the plan should at least be tried for a year or two and it was at length adopted with only a very few negative votes. This result insured that Rev. Samuel J. McClenaghan of Jamesburg would accept the synodical superintendency which had been offered to him.

There were many loving references during synod to the memory of Rev. Walter A. Brooks of Trenton, who served the synod as its stated clerk for twenty-five years. Dr. John F. Patterson, Central church, Orange, was chosen his successor.

The synod was addressed on foreign missions by Rev. George S. McCune of Korea and Rev. C. H. Yerkes of China and Secretary David McConaughy made a strong appeal for the united missionary campaign. Professor Ebenezer Mackey, superintendent of public schools at Trenton, read an unconventional "narrative" on the state of religion in New Jersey, which stimulated a great deal of serious thought and comment.

Extend Home Mission Activities—For the second time within two years New York Synod met at Auburn, Second church entertaining. The moderator was Dr. E. Van Dyke Wight of Middletown and his invitation was accepted to meet in the new Horton Memorial church which is being erected for his congregation. Judge L'Amoreaux of Albany was vice moderator. The devotional spirit of the sessions was remarked as peculiarly strong. The evangelistic conference hours over which Dr. George G. Mahy presided were peculiarly impressive. The main business of the sessions centered around the report of synod's home mission committee, which under the chairmanship of Elder George P. Conrad of Lafayette Avenue church, Brooklyn, a high official of the New York Central railroad, is forging ahead. Synod confirmed the appointment of Rev. U. L. Mackey of Schenectady as state superintendent. Rev. A. W. Maddox is to serve the committee all the year round among the lumbermen of the Adirondacks.

Synod took interest in the prospect of a strong work in connection with Ithaca church for students of Cornell University. Rev. Herbert Moore of Covington, Ky., will be student pastor.

The platform addresses were by Moderator Stone, Secretary Speer, Dr. John Fox and Professor Arthur S. Hoyt.

Synod adjourned early on Thursday afternoon in order to attend in the chapel of Auburn Seminary the inauguration of Professor Robert Hastings Nichols in the chair of church history. Both the charge of Professor Brown and the inaugural address of Professor Nichols insisted strongly that instruction in church history in any seminary must be related in the most practical way to Christian experience.

New Superintendent of Home Missions—Ohio Synod at its recent meeting in Youngstown accepted the resignation of Rev. Walter H. Houston as superintendent of home missions and elected in his place Rev. Robert E. Pugh of Canfield. Mr. Houston has held this position six years and last year when he was elected secretary of Assembly's committee on vacancy and supply he attempted to resign, but was persuaded to continue double duty.

Dr. Arthur C. Ludlow of Cleveland was elected moderator. Among the special speakers representing various boards and committees were Doctors Robert MacKenzie, L. E. Holden, Joseph W. Cochran, J. T. Henderson, Joseph E. Donahey, John Dixon, E. T. Swiggett, retiring moderator, Jesse C. Bruce, Darby, Arthur J. Brown, John Fox and Clinton T. Wood, Rev. Charles G. Jordan, Rev. Charles Scanlon, Rev. Frank Foster and Rev. W. H. Houston.

The work of the men of the church received special emphasis, as did that on the committee of vacancy and supply. Synod granted the request of the women's synodical society for a separate date upon which to hold their conferences hereafter.

Stress Religious Education — Iowa Synod at Storm Lake Oct. 21-24 was preceded by a largely attended Sabbath school institute. Professor G. C. Fracker, recently appointed educational superintendent of Sunday school work for Iowa, gave addresses. Dr. E. E. Hastings of Fort Dodge was elected moderator. Rev. William R. Bennett of Morristown, N. J., addressed synod on the work of the Board of Church Erection. Rev. William Johnson of New York reported encouraging progress with the ministerial and sustentation fund. He said 240 Iowa churches gave $2,964 and $12,875 was paid annuitants in the state.

Foreign missions were presented by Dr. H. W. Reherd, Rev. David S. Tappan, Jr., of Hainan and Dr. Wallace M. Hamilton of Sioux City. The report of Chairman C. F. Ensign, D. D., on publication and Sunday school work included a hearty tribute of appreciation of Captain A. P. Obrien, who has moved to California. Rev. D. H. Fahs presented the work for Presbyterian students in state institutions. Rev. Howard W. Johnson takes charge of the church at State College, Ames. Dr. Richard C. Hughes, secretary of the university work, and Dr. E. A. Bess of Iowa City spoke on university work with students.

Thursday evening A. B. T. Moore of Cedar Rapids, president of the Gideons, spoke on men and the church. Other speakers were W. D. Fellows of Cedar Rapids and W. H. Hughes of Washington. Buena Vista College faculty and students gave a reception on the campus to synod. Gifts to home missions were $2,403, $300 better than last year. The average gift of Iowa's Presbyterians was $15.74 for all causes.

Extend Home Mission Work—Nebraska Synod meeting at North church, Omaha, adopted a report of a special committee declaring that synod needs the full time of a superintendent of home missions and Sabbath school work. Dr. W. H. Kearns, who has acted in this capacity in addition to his burdens as field secretary for the Sunday school board, will continue until the synodical appointment. It was under Dr. Kearns's management that synod reached self-support. In the exceptionally well prepared report on home missions by Dr. N. McGiffin was included a resolution favoring the continued attention to rural church work by the Home Board. Synod adjourned one afternoon to visit Bellevue College as guests of President Stookey and adopted a resolution that the educational status of synod would remain the same, Hastings College being the synodical institution, and the college board committee being instructed to indorse Bellevue's request for aid from the College Board. This settlement of a vexatious question is said to be satisfactory to both sides.

Nebraska Presbyterians have made the largest advance in home mission gifts for five years of any synod. The report of Rev. R. H. Houseman, educational superintendent, shows the rapid advance of the state in Sunday school policy. Nebraska gives a larger per cent of contributions to Sunday school work than any other synod. Dr. J. M. Caldwell of Wakefield was moderator and among the special speakers were Moderator John Timothy Stone, Dr. R. C. Hughes, J. E. McAfee, President A. B. Marshall and Dr. John M. Gaston.

Centralize Home Mission Work—Illinois Synod convened at Millikin University, Decatur, Oct. 20 and elected as moderator Dr. R. R. Marquis of Ewing Presbytery. With apparent unanimity the work of home missions, church erection and Sunday school missions was combined under a new committee, to be known as church extension, composed of the chairmen of corresponding committees in the twelve presbyteries. The new committee promises to conduct its work on strictly scientific principles. The twelve presbyteries are to be grouped into four districts, each under a district superintendent. A distinctly forward movement was the appointment of Dr. W. S. Marquis of Rock Island as superintendent of benevolences. He will lead in a united, simultaneous every-member campaign. February is to be a month of spiritual preparation, to be followed in early March by the actual campaign.

Members of synod made a generous response to an appeal for the churches crippled by the Ohio floods. One of the striking features of the session on Christian education was the appeal of President Hudson of Blackburn. This college invites as students those who have insufficient means and it has doubled its attendance.

Among the addresses of special value were those by F. S. McBride, Dr. Lee, Dr. Caward, Dr. Reherd and Dr. Russell. The greeting to President Fellows, the banquet by the domestic science students and the intermingling of the synod and the student body in chapel were happy occasions.

Get Unexpected Gift—While representatives of Lafayette College were speaking before Pennsylvania Synod at Waynesburg they received a telegram from a Presbyterian whose name is withheld that he had contributed $90,000 to the endowment fund. Dr. J. T. Henderson of Chicago spoke on men's work and was the guest of honor at a banquet one evening during the session.

WHERE THE NEWS COMES FROM

More than 166 individuals contributed to the news columns of The Continent this week. This is not an unusual number and indicates the practical cooperation of pastors and others from coast to coast which makes possible the printing of the most significant and important church items of every state. There are this week approximately 16,720 words of news from the field of Christian effort.

Expect 1,000 Bible Students—The aim of Detroit Y. M. C. A. to enlist 1,000 men in Bible study promises to be realized. The fall campaign opened with an address by Clayton S. Cooper.

CHURCH HAS RAISED $2,500,000

The seventy-ninth anniversary of Second church, . Louis, was commemorated Oct. 19. Six con-egations have been colonized from Second church Central, Grand Avenue, Washington and Comp-n, First German, McCausland Avenue and Lee venue. The church supported a foreign mission-y long before missionary effort had become a gen-ally accepted part of the work of most congre-tions. Five missionaries in Siam, China, Korea d Africa are now maintained by the church, as e four mission churches and institutions in this untry. In the seventy-nine years the church has ised $2,500,000, more than half of which was for uses outside of its own maintenance. The pas-r, Dr. S. J. Niccolls, in the sermon commemor-ing the event, in an illuminating manner con-asted the morals and ecclesiastical usage then and ow.

Letchworth—

The Challenge of a Completed Life

As the fall opens in church and charitable work, the vacancies caused by the deaths that have occurred during the summer will be keenly realized. One such exists in the session of the First Presbyterian church of Buffalo, caused by the death on June 30, 1913, of Josiah Letchworth.

Probably no one, even though having lived fourscore years and ten, would say reverently of his own life, "I have finished the work that thou gavest me to do." There are, however, lives which to those who observe them seem to have achieved a singular completeness, having included all the fundamental experiences of human life, and having accomplished a work definitely undertaken. Every one who has been privileged to know such a life has had his ideas of what this life may be enlarged and exalted, and has seen fulfilled Christ's assertion, "I am come that ye might have life—abundantly."

More than half a century ago a young man not yet having reached his majority came to Buffalo to engage with two of his elder brothers in the saddlery hardware business. Josiah Letchworth had already laid the foundation for a successful business career in habits of punctuality, uniform courtesy, scrupulous regard for the rights of others and in the ability to accept and carry responsibility.

He was one of the first in Buffalo to beautify the surroundings of an industrial plant, and made the neatly trimmed grass, the ornamental shrubs, the vines and flower beds at the malleable iron works at Black Rock a refining influence. He also provided there as early as 1870 a free circulating library and reading room for the benefit of the employees and their families.

His own enjoyment of good literature was so genuine that he was constantly planning to extend that pleasure to others, and his frequent gifts of books have added joy and improvement alike to young and old. His belief in the Bible as the book of books was evidenced by his services for many years as an officer of the Buffalo Bible Socity. He was ever a lover of poetry and had written and published verses of deep sentiment and reflection. His "Home Letters from Abroad" are only one evidence of his varied gift of expression.

Ever a lover of nature in all her forms, Mr. Letchworth was one of the very first to plan for the beautiful city that Buffalo now is by planting trees and shrubs in abundance in his own large grounds and by caring for them with an almost personal devotion to each one. His love of the beautiful led him to encourage all forms of artistic expression, and to assist materially in the development of the Buffalo Academy of Natural Sciences and Fine Arts. Extended travel only increased his natural liberality of thought and charity in judgment. His quick and tender sympathy for all forms of human suffering found a partial outlet in his service until the last year as a trustee of the Buffalo General Hospital.

While providing for the comfort and entertainment of guests with most generous hospitality, Mr. Letchworth was himself "temperate in all things," and thus kept his body as a finely controlled instrument for his spirit's use. Indeed it was in his home that Mr. Letchworth revealed the richness of his nature. Careful thought bestowed upon his summer home on Owasco Lake through thirty-five years had resulted in perfecting a haven of rare restfulness and charm. Here it was his pleasure to provide not only for his own family—children and grandchildren as the years went on—but for many others who needed the reinvigoration to be gained in such a favored atmosphere. It was most fitting that it was from Glenwood Beach that his spirit should wing its flight to his Creator, for here he had regularly conducted a Sabbath morning service, and had led the thoughts of his household to nature's God.

There is no call to a noble, high-minded life more insistent than that voiced by such a character as Josiah Letchworth. The vacant place in the family circle can never be filled, but the vacancies on the session of the church, on boards of trust and of philanthropy are a challenge to the men of the younger generation. Who follows in his train?

Is Helping to Solve Our Immigrant Problem

838,172 alien immigrants entered the United States during the last fiscal year. The best things that the United States has to offer to the immigrant are the HOME, the SCHOOL, and the CHURCH. More than 800,000 people in a single year come speaking a foreign tongue. Who can so well give to them the HOME, the SCHOOL, and the CHURCH, as the TRAINED YOUNG WOMEN OF THEIR OWN RACE?

THE SCHAUFFLER SCHOOL SEEKS TO PROVIDE THESE TRAINED YOUNG WOMEN.

It is more necessary today than ever before in the solution of one of our greatest problems.

The Schauffler School is

The Immediate Needs of the School:

1. A new adequately equipped building, for which plans have been drawn, containing Administration Rooms, Gymnasium, Library, Reception, Lecture and Music Rooms, Domestic Science Equipment, Kindergarten, Dormitories, Laundry and Cold Storage Equipment. The student enrollment at this time overtaxes the capacity of the present building, and some are provided with rooms outside.
2. Additional Endowment of $50,000.
3. Several Permanent Scholarships of $1,000 each.
4. Several Temporary Scholarships of $50 each.

$100,000 Will Make Possible

1. The New Building.
2. Better Trained Young Women and more of them.
3. Equipment more nearly commensurate with the great purpose of the school.

Will you help to forge the links in the chain of this great enterprise? All gifts are welcome, large or small.

Get this one idea (13)

"Local pride" used to be responsible for neighborhood church papers.

"Kingdom interest" has, to a gratifying extent, taken the place of "local pride," and Christians are nowadays more concerned to know how fares the great cause of Christ everywhere than to know the church gossip of their own vicinity.

"About this time I passed into an era of comprehensiveness," wrote Horace Bushnell in his diary; and of late a similar entry might be made by many Christians.

One reason why The Continent is the church paper of today—and of tomorrow—is that it is primarily concerned for the living kingdom of a contemporaneous Christ.

Around the Shop

Not long ago there came into the "shop" a new employe, and the Around-the-Shop Man chanced to overhear the instructions of the Man in Authority. "Be sure to remember this," he was saying. "You must think of each subscriber not as a mere name among many thousands, but as a live person who is a friend of ours, a member of our family. Your part in our dealings with him may be no more than writing a figure on his subscription card. But he may judge us all by the results of your carelessness if you make a mistake. Perhaps you may need to write him a letter. If so, treat him just as though he were a friend of yours whom you might meet at any time."

The Around-the-Shop Man's real existence is in this column, where he is a sort of latch-string to the door that opens up to you the good things the publisher and editor have stored up for you each week. Try to corner him in corporeal actuality, and you discover that he belongs to the family of the Mrs. Harris made famous by Sairy Gamp. But it's different with the rest of the folks. Just as there is a person behind every name on our list, so there are behind The Continent and all that goes into it the individuals who, each one in his chosen capacity, are seeking to make a publication worthy of its constituency. Probably they are sensitive to unfair criticism as anybody could be, yet The Continent has the most friendly constituency that ever blessed a periodical with large circulation. Every day, in every mail, come words of encouragement; rarely indeed come comments that grieve by their unfairness.

It is a pleasure to work with and for such a body of people. Such agreeable folks must have friends who would also be congenial. Why should they be outside when a few words from you might mean life membership with us? Say the words today!

Pious Insults to God

WOULD YOU SLAP THE LORD ON THE BACK IF YOU MET HIM?

Shocking question, no doubt. But not more shocking than acting that way in public worship.

A vast deal of what happens, both in speech and behavior, inside churches and "evangelistic tabernacles" in this country during religious services, would seem to suggest that modern Christians have largely forgotten that reverence is a virtue and irreverence a sin.

Ritualism sprang from outraged reverence. There was nothing of ritual, of course, in the first stages of the apostolic church. But men who had felt the awesome holiness of God and his Son Jesus Christ, grew heartsick as they saw rude and crude converts, entering the church out of heathen thoughtlessness, bring with them the ribaldry with which they had rollicked before their pagan deities.

So they invented the idea of ritualism to counteract indignities that affronted Almighty God in his sanctuary.

Prescribing every word that should be uttered in public worship appeared the only way of insuring that the majesty of the divine presence should not be violated with gross familiarities.

And it must be admitted that the device served its purpose. The worship of the church, through even the darkest ages of mediæval vulgarity, remained wonderfully elevated and impressive.

But the awakening era of the Reformation brought consciousness of ritualism's failure. Dignity it had indeed; it offered before the face of the high and reverend God a homage fit in all outward forms; but it failed disastrously at the point after all the most vital:

It did not meet the call of Jesus for "worship in spirit and in truth." It produced neither spirituality nor sincerity.

So the reformers revolted against ritual. They indeed mostly sought to stop half-way—with substitution of less formal liturgies—but the reaction which they began carried their successors farther than they themselves desired to go.

The result is the practically complete exclusion of regulative forms and ceremonies from the public worship of all the foremost Protestant bodies save the Episcopalians and the Lutherans.

"Free prayer" and corresponding free speech in the sanctuary are the rule of the overwhelming majority of Protestant churches.

With what result? Well, the original ritualists would seem to be pretty well justified.

The doing of things decently and in order, which Paul recommended, is rare enough in Protestant churches to be remarkable where observed. Awe of the presence of the Lord is a feeling whereof lifelong church-goers often remain unconscious.

Indeed, negative lack of reverence is at times cultivated to positive irreverence by diligent and continuous endeavor to produce, in young Christians especially, a brash familiarity with God falsely supposed to be required in order to realize his nearness to them.

Particularly does this become painful and obnoxious in many evangelistic meetings where the leader seems to know no other way of bringing God near to the consciousness of his hearers than by making, in prayer and sermon, a sort of sample demonstration of what informal terms of chummy friendship he himself manages to maintain with the Almighty.

It is not to be questioned for a minute that this sense of intimate fellowship is genuine; no doubt it fulfills the ideal of worship so far as concerns the stipulation, "in spirit and in truth." And doubtless God accepts it with pitying patience.

But that does not change some great facts that ought to be soberly faced by all who have any responsibility for leading the worship of Christians or shaping the religious ideas of the irreligious. Here is one tremendous fact never to be forgotten:

God is not a jolly comrade to be hailed with a "hello," nor a familiar equal with whom conversation may turn to unguarded chat.

Far different from all this, God is our ineffably mighty and majestic King and Creator, high and lifted up, filling his infinite temple of eternity with the glory of his presence and no less to be had in loving awe when he condescends to dwell in the lowly intimacy of a humble and contrite human heart.

Nor is Jesus Christ, friend of sinners though he be, one to be treated as a "hail fellow well met."

Americans, bumptious in their ideas of equality, seem to have lost the art of deferential association with a superior. They cannot even bear fellowship with the Lord himself without airs that are presuming and forward.

There is not the least danger that any longing soul will insist on pressing too close to the Master. But there is a gulf of difference between stealing near to kneel at his feet and marching up jauntily to shake hands.

This fault must not be specially attributed to evangelists and unconventional preachers. It perhaps does not break out so bizarrely in other places, but the demoralizing spirit of it runs through a sorry proportion of the services of American churches and a worse proportion still of Sunday school exercises.

Noisy, shouting singing, worked up to the top pitch of sound and fury, by choristers whose best ideal appears to be the splitting of the roof overhead, and rambling, mouthy prayers, full of pious twaddle addressed to human hearers and uttered in apparent forgetfulness of a listening God, are some of the worse symptoms of a common dullness of soul, capable of going through the forms of worship without any mystic sense of marvel at the grandeur of God.

Nothing can be worse for the future depth and strength of religion in any land than training children for manhood and womanhood without disciplining them in reverence. They may be religious in spite of the lack, but not profoundly religious.

The antidote of irreverence is the fear of God.

A man may have a host of other Christian virtues and in the strength of them he may be vastly useful in the kingdom of God. But if he sins in irreverence, he is not a complete Christian.

For irreverence in him proves the absence from him of the fear of God.

And fear means fear. A deal of harm has been done by trying to show that fear in the Bible means something else. It does not

"Let all the earth fear Jehovah; let all the inhabitants of the world stand in awe of him."

"God is in heaven and thou upon earth; therefore let thy words be few."

The World

Why New York City's Election Is Important

It is sometimes a source of wonder to people who dwell outside of New York that an election in that city should attract so much attention from the newspapers generally and from persons interested in public affairs the country over. Of course the Manhattanites not unnaturally regard their metropolis as the center of the universe—particularly if they have not traveled far west of the Hudson—but the fact remains that a political contest such as the one just waged in New York is, indeed, of national importance. Reasons are not far to seek. New York's population is larger than that of several big states—greater, for example, than Iowa, Minnesota, Indiana, Georgia, Texas, California or Massachusetts separately, and larger than numerous other small states in combination. There are considerably more people living in New York today than there were alive in the thirteen American colonies at the period of the Revolutionary war. The elements which go to make up this vast aggregate of nearly 5,000,000 humans are diversified and heterogeneous to a remarkable degree. Every nation and creed under heaven is represented, every shade of belief and unbelief; every proponent of law and order and every disciple of disorder and anarchy here finds followers. Will the spirit of the older Americans be understood and appreciated by the horde of immigrants and newcomers? Can American ideals make themslves felt under conditions ofttimes apparently hopeless? Will the lower tear down the higher, or will the higher lift up the lower? Will God rule or will graft control New York's citizenship? And will that citizenship be honestly alert or criminally apathetic?

It is these and similar considerations and questions which made last Tuesday's contest, like others gone before and to come, more than a strife of individuals, more than a scramble between Mitchel and McCall, or Murphy and Sulzer. Murphy, the boss, deposed Sulzer as governor, but will Sulzer and the storm he raised up eventually destroy Tammany and the feudal and paternalistic machine symbolized by the Tammany organization? Truly, the situation is one to provoke thought and the prospect is far from discouraging. New York's problems are many of them of the selfsame sort which other parts of the country are facing or must soon face.

President Wilson Says Huerta Must Quit

Notice was served on Provisional President Huerta at Mexico City last Monday by order of the President of the United States that he must resign without loss of time and that he must not leave as his successor General Blanquet or any other man whom he might be expected to control. The terms of the message, so far as disclosed, left the Mexican dictator no alternative except to quit or to oppose the United States.

Arrangements have been made by which the army and navy can be available for service in Mexico if intervention is decided upon. Rear Admiral Fletcher's squadron has been in Mexican waters for a long time and the Atlantic fleet is in touch with Washington by wireless telegraph from the Virginia capes. The six months' cruise to Mediterranean waters furnished a sufficient excuse for completely outfitting the Atlantic fleet for long service, but it has been pointed out by shrewd observers that Gibraltar is not appreciably farther from Vera Cruz than is Hampton Roads.

General Felix Diaz fled from Mexico last week, escaping from his hotel at Vera Cruz to the American consulate and from thence to an American warship in the harbor. Rear Admiral Fletcher gave him asylum until opportunity offered to place his unbidden guest on an outward bound steamer, safe from Huerta's machinations.

American Policy and the Western Hemisphere

President Wilson spoke at Swarthmore, Pennsylvania, and at Mobile, Alabama, and in both speeches he made incidental reference to Latin America and to the situation in Mexico. At Swarthmore the President spoke in a big tent not far from the spot where William Penn landed, whose spirit he extolled. The exercises were also commemorative of founders' day of Swarthmore College. The President proclaimed his belief that nowhere in the Western hemisphere should any government endure "which is stained by blood or supported by anything but the consent of the governed."

Addressing the Southern Commercial Congress at Mobile, the President, without any specific mention of Mexico, outlined with some directness the policy of the United States toward all the nations to the southward. The Panama canal, he said, severed land, but brought countries closer together. He warned the Latin states against material interests of concession hunters and speculators and declared that the United States would seek no more territory. Liberty, not dollars, he argued, should be the password between neighbors, nor could we be fast friends with those neighbors except upon terms of equality. Morality and not expediency is to rule.

Almost simultaneously with President Wilson's statement of American policy in the two addresses referred to, ex-President Roosevelt delivered speeches in Brazil, suggesting a new and better Monroe doctrine, a doctrine which would admit the three great South American republics of Argentina, Brazil and Chile—familiarly known as the A, B. C—to share in the responsibility of protecting and policing the North and South American continents. If the A, B, C alliance would join Uncle Sam, with as many more North and South American nations as could be induced to join, it might put an end to the suspicion and hostility with which the United States is regarded by many of the southern peoples, and as an inevitable consequence an era of peace and increased prosperity would supervene.

Elections in Italy; Franchise Greatly Extended

General elections for the chamber of deputies were held throughout Italy a week ago Sunday with a second balloting last Sunday in several constituencies where majorities had not been obtained by any candidate. The elections were interesting for more than one reason. It was the first test of the new franchise system which extends practically universal manhood suffrage and increases the number of eligible voters from about 3,000,000 to over 8,500,000. This large extension of voting rights has enfranchised a great many uneducated and theoretically "unprepared" citizens, but Italian publicists are hopeful of good results, particularly in Sicily and Calabria, where there has been a numerous lawless element. There were some disorder and fatal affrays in connection with the election, but not as serious on the whole as expected. It was also the first popular test since the Turkish war with its victorious campaign in Libya. This fact may have helped the government to carry most of the provinces. Giovanni Giolitti, the premier, was almost unanimously returned.

Fierce struggles developed at numerous points between the Catholics and the Socialist and other anti-Catholic candidates. There has long been a papal prohibition against Catholics participating in the Italian elections, with certain special exceptions, but in the recent contests Catholics voted openly, particularly in the Venetian provinces. At Cesena, according to press reports, the local bishop was one of the first at the polls. If abstention is no longer to be practiced by adherents of the church the effect will probably be strongly felt in Italian politics.

New Zealand has been known as a country without strikes, but that enviable record has lately been broken by strikes of shipwrights, coal miners and dock laborers with resulting cessation of work by most trades in every port of the big island. At Auckland and Wellington the rioting has been so serious that bluejackets from British warships have been assisting in preserving order. Their assignment has been primarily to protect men loading fruit on vessels and to cover the embarkation and landing of passengers. A shortage of food and coal has caused privations.

The labor upheaval, as it has been called, began several weeks ago with the shipwrights, and the dockers and the miners and other trades struck in sympathy with the shipwrights' demand for higher wages, better working conditions and recognition of their union, and this led to a trial of strength between the employers and the Federation of Labor. This organization has never come under the New Zealand compulsory arbitration law, by the terms of which the inciting of a strike without first offering to arbitrate is made punishable by severe penalties. This is asserted to be the first time that this and allied statutes for industrial peace and good will have failed to work out satisfactorily. New Zealand, as is well known, has been largely dominated and ruled by men of the so-called laboring classes.

University Professor Credits "Ritual Murder" Charge

One witness of apparent responsibility and intelligence was produced, up to the opening of the present week, to testify affirmatively as to the "ritual murder" for which the Jewish workingman Beiliss was placed on trial at Kiev, Russia. Professor Sikorski of the University of Kiev on the stand last Friday gave it as his conviction that ritual murder was not a figment of the imagination nor a relic of outworn superstition, but was a twentieth century reality. He affirmed that the number of wounds were always seven or a multiple of seven, and that the wounds on the body of the slain boy Yushinsky, with whose death Beiless is charged, bore out his theory. Press reports do not show that the Kiev professor had anything more than an emphatic expression of his own personal belief to corroborate his testimony, which apparently was in the nature of a speech to the court.

At a recent sitting of the court, lasting from early in the morning until midnight, the name of the prisoner was not once mentioned in the proceedings, which have developed into a clash of creeds almost inexplicable to American minds.

Meetings of protest have been held throughout Great Britain and America, attended by Jews and gentiles alike, but without producing any observable effect on the Russian government. The impression is growing in the absence of positive information that the prosecution of Beiliss was instigated from St. Petersburg or at least fully approved by the imperial authorities.

Million and a Half Given to Medical Research

The General Education Board founded by John D. Rockefeller nine years ago has announced a donation of a million and a half of dollars to the medical school of Johns Hopkins University at Baltimore. This is the largest single gift ever made by the board and the first to a college of medicine. It will be known as the William H. Welch endowment in honor of an eminent pathologist long connected with the institution. The income is to be used to permit the staff of professors and surgeons to devote all their time to clinical education and research work without the distraction of private practice—possibly an adaptation of the familiar formula in ministerial calls in being "freed from worldly cares and avocations." The chairman of the board, E. P. Gates, states that these men are to be absolutely unrestricted to do any service that medical science or humanity demands in hospital or laboratory, classroom or elsewhere, but they will accept no personal fee for such service. The way is thus opened for important discoveries and giant strides in the treatment of disease.

At the same time this gift was made the same board gave $200,000 each to Barnard and Wellesley Colleges and $50,000 to Ripon (Wisconsin) College.

Wisconsin Issues First State Life Insurance

The first life insurance policies to be issued by an American state were written last week in Wisconsin under a law passed by the legislature in 1911. A similar plan is in force in several European countries, but it remains to be seen how popular it will be in America. Applications for insurance may be received by town and city officials, but no paid solicitors or agents' commissions are provided for and applicants have not yet come forward with noticeable volunteer eagerness.

Policies will be limited to $1,000 until 1,000 are issued; then $2,000 will be the limit until 2,000 are enrolled, after which $3,000 policies may be written, the authorized maximum. The purpose is to give the people insurance at cost, eliminating commissions and high salaries. Under the law only residents of Wisconsin may be insured.

Federal Inquiry Into Economic Conditions

Uncle Sam has an inqury of his own somewhat similar to that projected by the Civic Federation. The last Congress authorized an examination into economic conditions, and the President appointed an industrial commission to make the investigation, which is to be sweeping in scope. The commission held its first meeting last month at Washington and elected Frank P. Walsh of Kansas City permanent chairman and Professor John R. Commons of Madison, Wisconsin, temporary secretary. The subjects to be covered are public and governmental agencies, trades unions and employers' associations, unorganized labor, the courts, and legal and legislative machinery. By the time these public and semipublic surveys are concluded Uncle Sam ought to know just what is wrong, and the right remedies can then more readily be selected.

Colonel Gorgas will investigate and endeavor to check pneumonia, locally a fatal scourge among the miners.

Religious World

White Ribbon Circles the Whole Globe

The boast that the white ribbon of the Women's Christian Temperance Union encircles the globe was vindicated again and again in the sessions of the world's convention in Brooklyn. A more cosmopolitan gathering could scarcely be imagined. On one occasion, when there was a call for a hundred speeches in a hundred minutes, the globe was belted several times. It goes without saying that every part of the United States was represented by large delegations.

A number of the foreign delegates brought observations and reports of pungent interest. The Baroness de Laveleye, from Belgium, asked the pity of her international sisters for her own country, which has more saloons in proportion to its population than any other country in the world—seven and one-half millions of people and 200,000 saloons. Miss Agnes Slack of England said that the enormous cost of Britain's navy, against which so many peace-loving Englishmen are beginning to protest, is but a bagatelle compared with what Britain annually spends for drink. She calculated that in the last thirty years the British people have paid out more for liquor than the cost of all the wars of the world for a century past. The president of the Canadian union, Mrs. Gordon Wright, boasted of the live organization of white ribbon women at Dawson in the heart of the Klondike country. Miss Toki Iwasawa, who appeared on the speakers' platform in the native costume of her land, reported that young girls whom the Women's Christian Temperance Union has trained in Japan refuse to marry young men who have not pledged themselves neither to drink nor to smoke.

The delegates from Australia and New Zealand were enthusiastic speakers in the suffrage sessions of the convention. They declared that they could not realize how it was possible to organize American women to oppose equality in voting privileges. The sentiment of the meeting, however, was vigorous and unanimous against militant methods.

The most striking American speaker was Mrs. Mary Harriet Armor of Georgia, for whom the Women's Christian Temperance Union claims the main credit of having carried Georgia for prohibition. Mrs. Armor introduced Mrs. Lenna Love Yost of West Virginia as the woman who deserves the like credit in that state.

When the convention came to elect officers for the next triennial period Lady Aurea Howard of England, who brought to the convention a $5,000 present from her mother, the Countess of Carlisle, declared that her mother absolutely refused reelection to the presidency on the ground that she was too busy in other interests to give time to this work. But Mrs. Stevens, the American president and vice president of the world's organization, affirmed that the countess' name was indispensable to the standing of the society abroad, and the upshot of her argument was that the British delegation cast sixty-five votes for Mrs. Stevens herself and the remainder of the delegates, 308 strong, supported the countess, who was declared reelected.

Following the adjournment of the world's convention in Brooklyn most of the American delegates went to Asbury Park to hold there the union's annual national convention.

Episcopalians Not Ready to Practice Unity

Protestants of all other denominations will regret that the late General Convention of the Episcopal Church adjourned without making the slightest degree of progress toward any practical cooperation with other Christian bodies in any religious ministry. Yet the church vigorously reemphasized its much advertised invitation for other denominations to join it in a general conference on Christian unity.

There were two points in which it was hoped that Episcopalian aspirations for eventual unity would lead to immediate steps for cooperation. The nearest and quickest point of contact for such conjoint effort was offered by the united missionary campaign, which is now under way. With this the Episcopalian missionary secretaries, Bishop Lloyd and Mr. Wood, at the outset joined hands, but their board later compelled them to withdraw. The subject came up in the house of deputies when a resolution was introduced declaring that the Board of Missions would not exceed its powers if it should commit the Episcopal Church to cooperate with other bodies for the education of missionary givers. This the deputies passed by a considerable majority, but the house of bishops threw it out and so left the whole matter precisely where it stood before.

This experience was almost exactly repeated when the second issue arose—the question whether the Episcopal Church should join officially in the Federal Council of Churches. Here again the deputies stood for closer relations with fellow Protestants, though the resolution passed by the lower house was in form permissive only. But it did express a thorough indorsement of the Federal Council and authorized the commissions on church unity and social service to appoint delegates to attend the council meetings. And this was too strong for the bishops, who substituted a resolution which avoided any indorsement, and amounted simply to a statement that the two commissions named might appoint delegates to represent themselves if they wished to. Inasmuch as this is what the commissions have been doing already, there is no gain here either.

As will be seen, the parish clergymen and the laymen who directly represent the people in General Convention are ready for a nearer approach to their Christian fellow citizens, but the bishops by majority are still exclusive and reactionary. This "standpat" disposition of the episcopacy blocked practically all the other progressive legislation of the convention except the division of the church provinces under provincial synods. And even that may prove in the long run a backward step. The plan to have an effective presiding bishop elected by the convention was approved by the bishops in principle, but was put over three years longer.

Advance Steps by Convention of Methodist Men

A convention heralded with the avowed purpose of being the "largest representative gathering of Methodist men ever assembled" would naturally reach extensive proportions. Yet the "national" convention of Methodist men which closed its four days' session last Friday night in Indianapolis surpassed the expectation of its promoters in at least two particulars. Announced as "national," it was really international in the speakers on the program and in the foreign branches of the church represented. Bishops J. L. Nuelsen of Switzerland and H. C. Stuntz of South America were early speakers; J. T. Denyes of Java, G. H. Jones of Korea and Dr. A. A. Parker of India were among the delegates from remote corners of Methodism. The program, too, had quite an interdenominational aspect, with such names as Robert E. Speer of the Presbyterian Foreign Board, J. Campbell White, Fred B. Smith and others, who told "What Our Denomination Has Done."

It was "the Methodist extension of the Laymen's Missionary Movement" and the enthusiasm of the delegates soon exceeded these limits. A committee on policy, consisting of sixty-four members, made a report which gave form to the significant actions of the body. This broader turn of affairs was quite logical in view of the themes discussed on the first day under the general heading "The Central Task of the Church of Christ." Having about 500 officers, 1,000 ministers and 1,500 laymen, the conference was more representative than the usual General Conference. Hence the influence of this expression of opinion in the twelve articles making up the "new policy" will at once begin to bear upon the deliberations of the regular judicatories. This was seen in the immediate action of all district superintendents in pledging hearty cooperation with other official agencies in carrying out the program. Notable sections of the report emphasized personal evangelism at home and abroad, setting a goal of 10 per cent increase in local church memberships next year. The bringing of youth everywhere into real Christian life and service was urged, as was the social ministry through educational, philanthropic and mission institutions, and finally "the utmost cooperation with all other churches which exalt our Christ."

To put into effect these plans $100,000 for two years was voted. Subscriptions for this fund began at once and reached $60,000. One card read "$1 and prayers." In fact, the prayer note was often sounded. A memorable outdoor meeting was the rally at the local civic center, where, under the shadow of the soldiers' and sailors' monument, several thousand delegates and their hosts held a noonday prayer meeting.

The largest and most inspiring gathering was the closing session, where over 4,000 assembled. Bishop William A. Quayle, now of Minneapolis, and Secretary G. Sherwood Eddy of the Young Men's Christian Association international committee were the speakers. "America a World Influence" was the general theme, having special example in "China" as indicated by the second speaker.

The prominence given to lay authority and responsibility will remain as an advance step for the denomination.

Congregationalists' Council Does Things

New Constitution Regarded as Indicative of Zeal for Usefulness and Efficiency—Triumphant Missionary Spirit Is in Evidence

"THE BEST council meeting ever held," is what I always have heard Congregationalists say at the conclusion of every National Council I have attended. They are saying it here at Kansas City and with considerable reason, for this National Council has done things. It has bent, if not broken, the spinal column of an independency which was in danger of becoming too stiff to bow to modern conditions. The watchword of the body in making the changes and reorganizing the denomination has been efficiency. Congregationalists are more concerned to be useful than they are to preserve any cherished polity or policy of the past. They are willing to throw an old thing on the scrap heap if thereby they can more successfully meet the tremendous forces of evil and push the kingdom of God out toward the horizon or down into the deeper needs of the city slum.

Adoption of the apportionment plan in raising money for the missionary societies also made another reason for reorganization. Heretofore these societies have been pretty much of a law unto themselves. They asked the churches for money, but did not ask them how they were to spend it. But the apportionment plan practically being a kind of holy taxation, the churches felt the stirring of the old principle that there must be no taxation without representation; that if they were under obligations to give money they must have the right to say how it should be spent. In order to bring this about the new constitution which has been adopted gives the National Council control of the societies by making all its members also members of each and all of the societies. The plan seems somewhat cumbersome—certainly it is not ideal—but it puts a lot of honor and official dignity on the delegates elected to the council. It makes one think of those gorgeously uniformed military officials who are to be seen in Europe, all plastered over with the insignia of authority. Think of an ordinary Congregationalist decked in membership in the National Council and also in the seven different benevolent societies of the denomination! Won't his wife and children be proud of him as he figuratively puts on his regalia and sallies forth to the joint meeting of the council and the societies! But if the man of much membership does his whole duty he will be compelled to go here and there to seven different meetings in a year. He will have a contract on his hands, especially if he be a busy pastor.

Some of the eastern delegates were strongly opposed to the more radical changes made in the reorganization. Governor Baldwin of Connecticut, who for years has been a notable figure at Congregational gatherings, was one of the conservatives who criticised the departures most severely. The Middle West was almost solid for the change.

Moderator a Leader of the New School

The theology of the council was mixed; all shades of past positions and present tendencies were represented. But plainly there was a larger liberal element in the meeting than in any former council. This was indicated by the big vote cast for Dr. Charles R. Brown for moderator. Dr. Brown is a leader of the new school. In his address on the "Training of Leaders," given before a great audience on Sunday evening, he took a pronounced position on the side of new things. But Dr. Brown is frank and somewhat open-minded.

The address of the retiring moderator also was of a somewhat liberal character. His attack on revivalists and revivals was so scathing and terrific that Billy Sunday himself could hardly hit harder at the other fellow. It would be an interesting entertainment if the big Brooklyn preacher and the man who turns towns upside down with his campaigns could be put into a theological arena and fight it out. Dr. Boynton complained so bitterly of the "hysterics" which he thinks mark revivals that one could not help wondering whether he had attended any of the modern political conventions where the great parties nominate their candidates for the presidency, and where an hour of roaring applause would make any "amen corner" want to go away and hide itself. As long as politicians are not afraid of stirring the emotions it is hardly worth while for religious people to be scared out of their boots by fear of an appeal to the feelings.

But there were strong manifestations of conservatism in the Council when attempts were made to emasculate the declaration of belief with which the new constitution begins. When the young pastor of Center church, New Haven, pleaded for what he called "the note of reality," by which he meant less of faith, another New Haven pastor, who was none other than Dr. Newman Smyth, once charged with heresy, sprang to his feet and argued for a positive declaration in tones of earnestness which electrified the great assembly. Everything that meant belief was kept in the statement of faith by a majority which was so overwhelming as to be crushing.

Mention also could be made of the deeply spiritual devotional exercises which were conducted each morning by Dr. Raymond Calkins, of the conference of intercessory prayer led by Secretary Brewer Eddy of the American Board, and of the many addresses which were marked by utterances of as profound a faith as ever were heard from the lips of former generations of preachers.

Great Plea for the People of Albania

Of course the greatest meeting of the ten days was that at which the final vote on the constitution was taken. I never saw anything so impressive. Everybody felt that the vote itself was an act of consecration, that whatever prejudices and traditions of the past had stood in the way were being surrendered in the interest of harmony and usefulness, and that the denomination was pledging itself anew to the great work of building up the kingdom of God on earth. Next to this meeting in the profound impression which it made was that of the American Board on Albania. The principal speaker of the evening was Rev. H. T. Erickson, missionary to that country. I have heard the great preachers on both sides of the sea, but I have heard few addresses as eloquent as that which fell from the lips of this missionary. He was pleading for a people who have suffered 2,000 years of oppression and wrong; and he himself had suffered as few missionaries ever are called upon to suffer. He had paid the price of tears and blood for the power to plead for Albania as he pleaded that night. It was one of those occasions which only a multitude of sorrows can make.

As this meeting drew near its close Secretary James L. Barton of the American Board said, "What shall be our response to this appeal?" Then a voice in the gallery called back, saying, "The only answer which we can make to such a pathetic and eloquent cry as we have heard tonight is to give, and I will be one of ten to raise $10,000 for the hospital which Mr. Erickson wants for the suffering people of Albania." Then the giving began, and it rushed along until it had reached $8,000. Here it lagged and the chairman of the meeting was on the point of dropping the effort. But then came another voice from the rear. It was that of a home missionary in North Dakota. "I am only a poor missionary," he exclaimed; "$10 is all that I can give myself, but if you will let me take charge of the meeting I will raise the remaining $2,000 in ten minutes." The audience cheered his audacity and the chairman welcomed him to the platform. He soon had the full $10,000 and more. The audience sang "Praise God from Whom All Blessings Flow" with tremendous unction and then went home thanking God that ever they had seen such a meeting as that.

Sorrows, Fears and Hopes of All Lands

Here I might say that the American Board can put up such meetings as seldom have their equal in any of our other great gatherings. And it is easily explained. Their meetings are staged against the rim of the earth and their workers bring to us a message of the sorrows, the fears and the hopes of all lands. Moreover, these workers come to us with a feeling that the world is resting upon their shoulders, that the missionary stations which they have planted are the pillars of the earth. And they have such great things to tell. Think of the wonderful changes which they have seen in Turkey, and of the still more wonderful transformations which they have just witnessed in China. Think of the degraded humanity which they have seen transfigured into the image of the Master, of the communities which they have lifted out of the barbarity, nakedness and cruelty of savagery into the refinement of Christian civilization. It all is so glorious that it is not strange that it should give to men lips of eloquence and messages which wonderfully move great assemblies.

It is worth much of what the missionaries cost for the churches to hear them tell what the Christian religion can do for the heathen world.

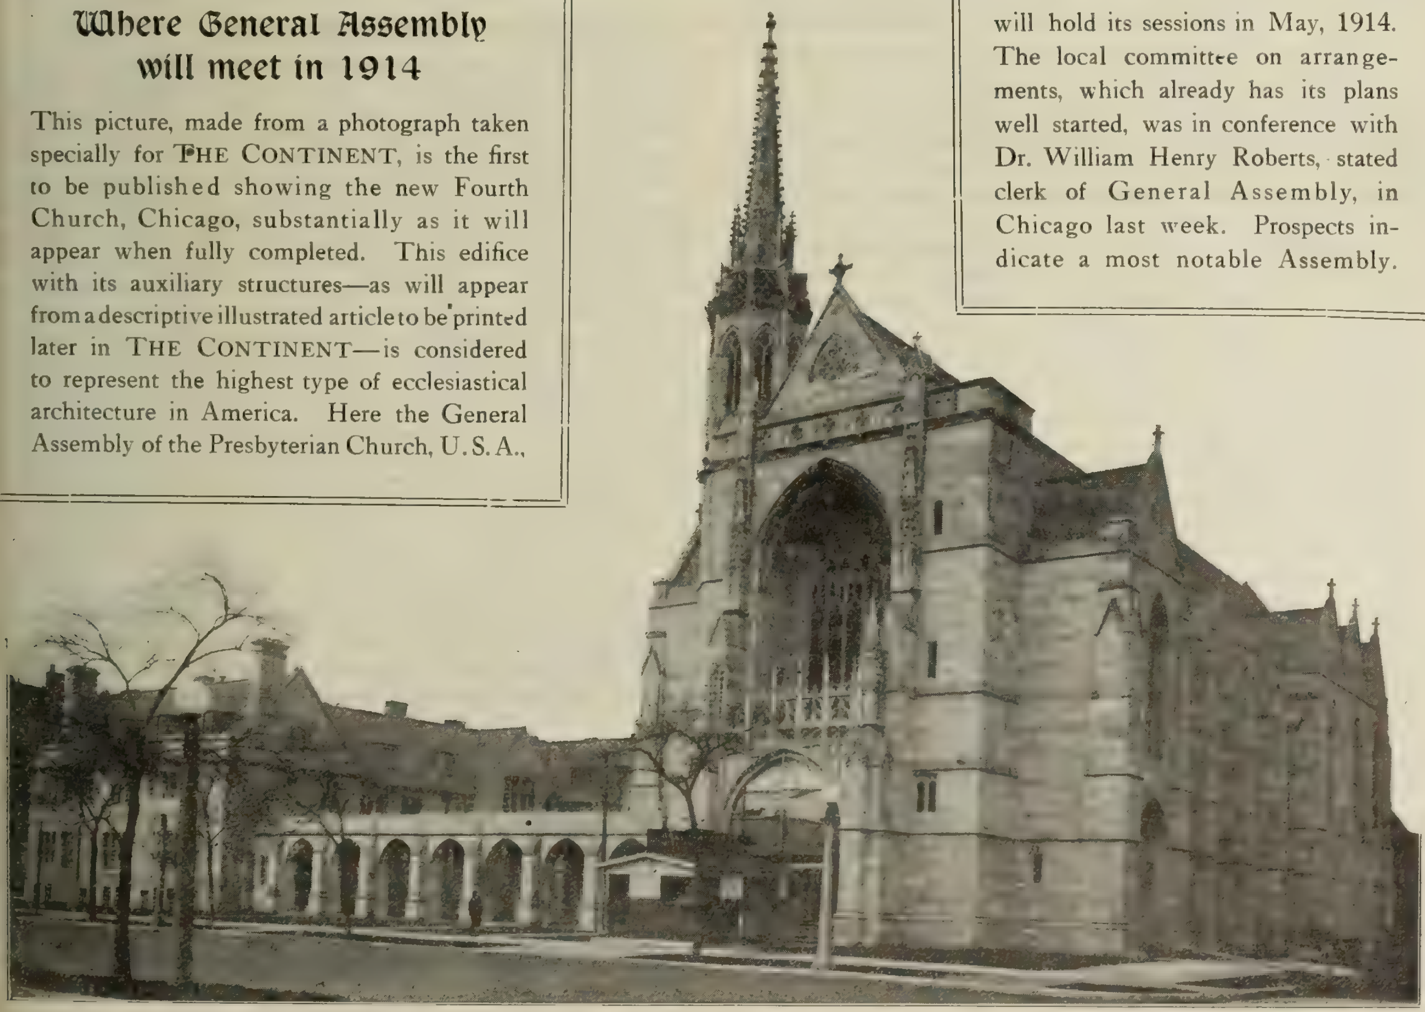
Where General Assembly will meet in 1914

This picture, made from a photograph taken specially for THE CONTINENT, is the first to be published showing the new Fourth Church, Chicago, substantially as it will appear when fully completed. This edifice with its auxiliary structures—as will appear from a descriptive illustrated article to be printed later in THE CONTINENT—is considered to represent the highest type of ecclesiastical architecture in America. Here the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A., will hold its sessions in May, 1914. The local committee on arrangements, which already has its plans well started, was in conference with Dr. William Henry Roberts, stated clerk of General Assembly, in Chicago last week. Prospects indicate a most notable Assembly.



Editorial

That Prayer Meeting Again!

HERE COMES AGAIN the symposium about the prayer meeting. Several pastors report receiving it in due course. "We understand you have a large and successful prayer meeting; it is one of our problems. Will you kindly give us some hint of your methods?" The results of one symposium were to be read in a church meeting a little while ago, but we have not heard what came of it. Others are to appear in articles or tracts. It is all very well, and at most points really encouraging.

The two points of difficulty seem to be, first, to get people to come to prayer meeting at all, and, secondly, to get them to take any part in it. Most sessions are not willing to take the obvious ways out of the two difficulties. The first can be cleared by agreeing that "it is not numbers that count"; "the Lord can save by many or by few"; "there are enough of us here in this room to work wonders for God"; "Christ started his whole enterprise with fewer than are here this evening," and similar rather familiar remarks which many of us have heard or have made under discouraging conditions in the midweek meeting.

This really helps only when one's forgetting apparatus is in good order and one does not think about the great number who never come to the meeting, but who need it deeply and ought to be made to see it. We have also to forget that if Christ did start his enterprise with so few, he did not keep it going with small numbers. The fact is that numbers do count, when they are at the disposal of God. It is not a healthy condition when church people agree to accept a condition which at first troubled them and which needs correction all the time. If the prayer meeting is to do its real work, it ought to appeal to the people generally who need it. Let us keep ourselves from lowering our standards.

The other difficulty, getting the people to take part, is easily escaped also. "How few people can take part to edification!" "The pastor is the real leader of the people; let him bring a message which will help"; "I have turned my midweek meeting into a Bible study meeting, where I do all the talking, and my people like it better"; "You see, times have changed and men talk less about religion now than they once did, so the old-fashioned midweek meeting is out of date." These remarks are often made as though they were fresh observations, but they are not so unique as speakers suppose. They have merit if we really believe them; they are not worth much if they are excuses for a condition which we would like remedied but do not see how to remedy.

Certainly if men talk less about religion than they once did, it is the only thing regarding which the net amount of talking is reduced. The modern man, minister or layman, does not at first thought bring to mind a blushing violet as his symbol, unless possibly in the matter of religion.

The old verse does not read, "Let the redeemed of the Lord say so, in case he is a minister." It is doubtful if any one revival would do us all more good than a revival of lay talking in the department of religion. Ministers love to talk and are generally well trained to do it, though we do wish they would not drop their voices so often at the end of a sentence. They make a great mistake, however, in our judgment, when they do not magnify the value of talking by laymen.

Both these methods of clearing the difficulty of the midweek meeting are surrenders. Neither smacks of conquest. The initial demand of the situation is a deep-seated belief in the value of the meeting, and a definite purpose which leaders of each church expect it to accomplish. Until that belief and that purpose are clear, work in its behalf will be perfunctory. It may consist in nothing more than an effort to do under one's own circumstances what another church has done under its different conditions. But with such a belief and purpose, the way is cleared for the planning and downright hard work in which alone lies the human hope for success.

Session and pastor can make the midweek meeting do a great work in virtually any church if it is made a real object of concern that knows no rest. It cannot have the tag-end of attention and be anything but a tag-end meeting. It cannot be haphazard in its preparation and be other than haphazard in its results. Any church can have a midweek meeting that will be worth anybody's while, and will make its real appeal to the people of the church, if pastor and session are willing to pay the price for it, though the price is often a high one. The Chinese have a saying, "'What will you have?' says God; 'pay for it and take it.'" It applies here.

Olivet's Conviction Better than Logic

The end of October and the beginning of November brought to Olivet church in Chicago the happy celebration of twenty-five years of ever-expanding usefulness. Congratulations on that splendid quarter-century of service are due to the pastor, Rev. Norman B. Barr, and his workers not alone from the presbytery to which Olivet is a chief pride, but from the whole denomination—indeed, from all evangelical churches in America. For Olivet has put the religious statesmanship of the country deeply in its debt; indirectly it has steadied the thinking of many anxious Christian leaders who have perhaps never even heard its name.

Olivet was founded just when the social settlement idea was beginning to take root in the United States. At that time nearly everybody interested at all in that kind of endeavor accepted it as self-evident that no fraternal social service could be brought acceptably to the conglomerate immigrant populations of the great cities unless religion was altogether left out of account. It was deemed obvious that where religions were so many and so fiercely antagonistic, the only way to help all classes impartially was to be strictly neutral—quite noncommittal about religion in any form. But Olivet was not governed by the logic of the situation. It went ahead on conviction rather than logic, and today not only Olivet itself but all the American church world has experience to attest that conviction.

Living and working in the midst of a community as heterogeneous as any American city can afford, this brave and sturdy Presbyterian church, under its unfailingly devoted leader, has done for its neighbors every whit as much social service as the most effective of the nonreligious settlements. And in addition thereto, it has maintained and preached Christ for the salvation of men's souls—which is all clear and clean extra profit on the investment. Hosts of people have, of course, accepted Olivet's temporal help without being drawn to its spiritual ministry, but the point here is that they have not been less helped by Olivet nor are they less grateful to it because it has been so unmistakably religious.

Today the original theory that religion and social service are incompatible is completely exploded; not even the settlements which still continue to work on secular lines would now affirm the proposition as a general principle. And disproof has of course by this time accumulated from many quarters. But the church which has doubtless stood steadiest and longest for the religious side of the argument is Olivet, to which on that account should be rendered a far-reaching acknowledgment at this auspicious anniversary.

Still More than Most Pastors Can Manage

The committee recently in conference over a proposal to limit the number of "special Sundays" which various philanthropic agencies and social movements ask the churches to observe has reported an approved schedule of six—child-labor Sunday, mothers' day, peace Sunday, labor Sunday, prison Sunday and antituberculosis day. All of these are undoubtedly worthy of attention at one time and another from pulpits that feel present-hour social obligations; but The Continent doubts whether a minister who remembers that his primary duty is to instruct his people in spiritual things will be able to "observe" every year the whole of even this reduced list. More especially does this doubt grow with observing that the committee recognizes ten other calendar anniversaries of fixed national or religious import which no live pastor is supposed to ignore—New Year's, Lincoln's birthday, Washington's birthday, Easter, Sabbath observance day, Memorial day, children's day, Fourth of July, Thanksgiving and Christmas. Even this makes no account at all of the special Sundays appointed by the various denominational and interdenominational movements of which the times are so prolific. The attempted simplification is not dazzlingly simple yet. The upshot of the whole consideration seems to be the conclusion which many practical men in the pulpit had reached in advance; to wit, that a minister who does not wish to preach "special" all the while will simply have to do as he has a mind to about "special Sunday" appeals that reach him.

A Difference Between Giving and Getting

There are four Bohemian papers in Chicago. Two of them are out-and-out atheistic. But it was one of the latter which said editorially just after the Presbyterian settlement house had been dedicated in the midst of the Bohemian colony on the west side of Chicago: "This is a remarkable religion. These people seem to be wanting to give the Bohemians something, not to get something from them."

It is plain that atheistic Bohemians are atheists chiefly because the only church that most of them know—the Roman Catholic—has never exhibited to them a religion sincere enough to be unselfish. The typical Roman priest in his behavior toward the community where he lives is far more apt to manifest the feeling that the people are to serve the church than a feeling that the church should serve the people. And sad it is to record that the masses sometimes get the same impression of the Protestant attitude. But anybody who knows Christ intimately knows that only one sort of church will ever have Christ's power to win the multitudes in either city, town or country, and that is the church which makes the multitudes believe that it "wants to give them something instead of getting something from them."

An Advance Bit of Christmas Good Will

Being the first of November it is high time to sound the "Shop Early!" cry to the countless legions of prospective buyers of Christmas presents. This forehandedness in making November preparation for Christmas giving falls short of practical religion in only one particular—there is no element of self-sacrifice in it. For it is no greater benefit to anybody else than to the giver himself or herself thus to secure a comfortable release from the horrors of last-minute distraction with the question "What under the canopy shall I give?"

But this is not the reason for the earnestness with which press and pulpit and every agency of social reform have joined of late years in the widely chorused slogan, "Shop Early!" Religion which is religion indeed prompted this now vast national effort to save salespeople and delivery men in American stores from the maniacal and maniac-making rush of buyers rendering the last two days before Christmas torture days in the trade world. And surely there is proof of the humane heart of the average American in the remarkable change which three or four seasons of agitation have already brought about. Christmas last year and the year before was vastly less terrible to store people than in previous years.

Now the important thing is to take care that this goodness shall not prove a spasm of goodness—that the public shall not get weary in the well-doing of shopping early. If you shopped early last year, recall how blithely your conscience approved you for it—and shop just a little earlier still this year.

—Hundreds of thousands of admiring citizens who have given thanks to God for the Christian character of the nation's present chief executive are undoubtedly suffering pain from President Wilson's use of a recent Sabbath for an all-day journey to a distant city where he had been invited to make an important address. Honest application of the spiritual law of individual responsibility requires every Christian, indeed, to grant his brother liberty to decide what are for himself allowable works of necessity on the Sabbath. But on the other hand there is an equally binding law which forbids a Christian to offend needlessly other men's consciences by what might be lawful to his own. And in this instance it would seem that the President might have easily avoided an arrangement for travel by which he must have known that a host of friends, particularly in his native Southland, would be hurt. One can hardly doubt that his hosts in Mobile would have been glad to wait a day longer for him if he had frankly said that he would prefer a date which would not necessitate Sunday travel. And whatever might have been the personal disregard for such scruples, they would only have thought the better of Mr. Wilson for maintaining a strict Sabbath respect.

—A year ago now Presbyterian journals were remarking with considerable pride on the fact that the great state of New York had elected a Presbyterian governor. A year later the fact is one that Presbyterians would like to forget. For judged even according to the explanation of his best friends, Mr. Sulzer has shown himself a man of far less integrity and straightforwardness than would do honor to Presbyterianism or any other church. It is true that the governor's impeachment and dishonorable dismissal from his office were directly consequent upon some good things that he did, but he would have been still able to defy all such malicious attacks if his own record had been the record of a clean and straightforward man. The whole sorry spectacle is a new illustration of how poor a guaranty of Christian character is mere church membership. And it is also a warning to the church that in these times when there is such a distinct advance in the power of high moral ideas in politics, there is a corresponding increase of danger that hypocrites will profess church affiliations for the sake of advancing their own political fortunes.

—The entire Presbyterian fellowship is beyond a doubt prepared to join the Synod of Missouri in a complimentary resolution adopted at the late session of that body wherein congratulations are paid to President William H. Black of Missouri Valley College. Dr. Black was the chairman of the Cumberland Presbyterian committee which negotiated with the mother church the reunion of 1906, and as such he has been since pursued with uncommon virulence by the contingent in the Cumberland body which would not go into union. These enemies have particularly sought to take away from him and the reunited church the prosperous college which he has been the chief factor in upbuilding at Marshall, Missouri. But through all the difficult pass into which he was thus forced, Dr. Black, as his synod now testifies, has borne himself so wisely that fellow workers have constantly been guided by his example. The danger of losing the college has now passed, thanks to a recent sustaining decision of the federal courts, and the synod justly says: "We feel that to his fidelity, courage, counsel and persistence more perhaps than to those of any other one man is due the happy issue now in view."

—The Romanist effort to use federal laws against obscene literature to stop Tom Watson of Georgia from circulating attacks on the Catholic priesthood has failed because the judge presiding at the trial held the indictment bad and quashed it. This is a matter of congratulation all round—even to honest Catholics—for their church cannot afford to increase the American suspicion that it is unable to endure free speech. This suspicion was particularly sharpened by the proceedings against Watson, because the obscenity complained of in his writings was not his own language by any means, but quotations which he said came direct from books authorized by the church as guides for priests' questions in the confessional. Avoidance of the charges by this means had much the aspect of acknowledging the truth of them. The only answer which can convince the American public that Watson is wrong is direct evidence that the quotations he uses are fictitious. Any other rejoinder will help Watson and hurt Catholicism—as this unsuccessful criminal prosecution has done very plainly.

—Methodism in England is represented by three bodies of considerable size—the Wesleyans numbering half a million, the Primitive Methodists with 200,000, and the United Methodists with 180,000. This last denomination was formed only a few years ago by the combination of three smaller fragments of Wesley's family. And now the union stress is becoming strong on the three existing divisions, and the Wesleyans have recognized it by appointing a commission to inquire whether the two other bodies are not ready to join hands with them. It is generally believed that a complete Methodist consolidation will soon come out of this.

—Bishop Williams of Detroit illustrates for his Episcopalian friends the absurdity of carrying American denominational distinctions into China or other mission fields, by citing the result of the attempt to translate "Protestant Episcopal" into the Chinese tongue. The churchly title which sounds so dignified in English turns in Chinese to the disconcerting literalness of the "Church of the Kicking Overseers." No wonder "change of name" has been popular in China. Presbyterianism hardly fares better, for the best China can do with "Presbyterian" as a church name is to transmogrify it into the "Church of the Ruling Old Men."

—The week of prayer observed annually in November by the Young Men's Christian Associations of the world has never thus far taken particular hold of the churches and is probably noticed in very few Christian congregations. Men and women, however, who know how to pray, although not actively connected with association work, ought to remember in some way this week of intercession for God's power to meet in this and all other nations what the international committee calls "the appalling spiritual needs of young men." This year this observance runs from November 9 to 15.

—The trials seem at an end which the heroic Protestant Christians of Madagascar have suffered first from Romanist and then from infidel governors since France took over the island nearly twenty years ago. President Poincare, the new chief executive of France, has issued a set of regulations for the churches of Madagascar which insure to the Protestants unmolested liberty of worship in their own churches, as also in private houses for communities where no churches have yet been erected.

—American Endeavorers who have been planning to go to the world's Christian Endeavor convention in Sydney, Australia, will be disappointed to learn that the prevalence of smallpox in Sydney has made it necessary to cancel all the arrangements and postpone indefinitely what was expected to be a great religious occasion.

DR. JOWETT'S MESSAGE

Washing the Stripes

THE FIRST SIGN of new spiritual life is the undoing of the wrong in the old life. The jailer, when he had been brought into the light of the Lord Jesus, took the apostles the same hour of the night and "washed their stripes." He sought to soothe the sorrow that he had created and assuage the pangs which he had made. Reparation is always a part of true repentance. Stripe-washing is essential to the full cleansing of redeeming grace.

While the Lord God is dealing with our personal sin we must rectify the wrongs we have inflicted upon our brother. When sin is forgiven the reparation is not canceled. I cannot steal from my neighbor and obtain the Lord's forgiveness, at the same time keeping the stolen money in my pocket. The full life and sweetness of the forgiving mercy of God come to a man while he is washing the stripes of those whom he has injured and betrayed. It might be worth while to look a little more clearly into the manifold issues of acts like these. The jailer washed the apostles' wounds. What happened?

Reparation Wins Almighty Favor

First of all—what happened to God? Have we any scriptural guidance? What is the instruction of the Old Testament? We are told of worshipers coming up to the ancient temple and being confronted by the Almighty with stern resistance. "Your hands are unclean;" "your hands are full of blood." The first figure suggests the doing of dirty work, the engagement in deliberate mischief, the weaving of filthy webs in the corrupt ways of the world. The second figure is more suggestive of murder. It describes the outrage inflicted upon a neighbor's life and right. And we are told that conditions such as these make the benediction of God impossible. God's blessing is checked because of unrepented and unrepaired wrong. "Wash ye;" go and rectify the injustice and then return for the blessing.

The witness of the New Testament is equally clear. "If thou bring thy gift to the altar and there remember that thy brother hath aught against thee, leave there thy gift." The grace of the Lord is backed by the obtrusion of wrong which has received no amendment. We make no headway while the wounds are unwashed. God is straitened in our own impenitence. How could it be otherwise? What would our God be like if he accepted the adoration of hands that are wet with blood?

And so it is perfectly clear that when the jailer washed the stripes of the apostles he opened out for himself fountains of spiritual blessedness. While he washed the prisoners' wounds the water of life washed his own soul. His willingness to repair the wrong brought him into full communion with the wonderful bounties of grace. We have frequently a small spiritual bounty because our unrepaired wrongs hinder its flow. We block up the channel, and then we wonder that the flow of the water is so restrained. The righting of a wrong is always an act which unseals fresh springs of heavenly grace. When the jailer washed the wounds, he really released God.

And what happened to Paul and Silas? What was the jailer saying as he washed their stripes, and what were they saying as he ministered unto them? Were they all silent or were they all in tears? One thing is perfectly sure—the love of the two men went out to the jailer. There was born a great, deep, vital spiritual kinship in which they all became one. Resentment can never endure in the presence of the spirit of reparation. It is like ice when the sunshine flows upon it. I cannot think that any resentment, however fierce and stolid, can finally hold out against the ministries of penitent love. "Love never faileth."

When we do a wrong to a man we often injure his relationship to God. Our wrong creates moods in his soul which are hostile to grace. Our wrong makes him bitter and cynical, and the realm of his soul becomes like a sodden marsh soaked with the sour waters of revenge. It may be that this ought not to be the result, but there it is. We wronged a man, and the wound festered, and the poison entered into his entire life. Now if we can put that right again we shall "prepare the way of the Lord." All the more so will this be if the reparation comes from a professed believer in grace. The world makes very little of our professions, but it is prepared to place great value upon our deeds. And when we go to a man whom we have willfully wounded, and wash his stripes, we shall restore to him the way and the joy of God's salvation.

What happened to the jailer? If the reparation unseals fountains of blessing, then streams of mercy are flowing into the jailer's life. I have no difficulty in imagining what happened to him as he undid the wrong. There dawned upon his soul the soft light of reconciliation, like the coming of some sweet morning after a night of pain. There also entered his soul the peace of reconciliation, concerning which only they know to whom it has been given.

I went into a hospital a little while ago to see a patient who had been the subject of a serious operation—a foul growth had been removed. In the course of our conversation she said to me, "But oh! the sense of rest when the thing had been taken away!" There is an analogous experience in the soul. We can operate on ourselves. When we right a wrong which we have done to a brother, we at the same time remove a diseased growth from our own souls. With the forgiveness of God, and our own reparation, we come into the possession of a quiet conscience; and the bells, that have only rung muffled peals of death and fear, ring out the joys of Easter morn.

And with the light and the peace of reconciliation there would also come the appointed joy. Light and peace are always the conditions in which joy abides. The bird-song comes with the bright and beautiful dawn. There was singing in that gloomy prison even before the stripes were washed—"and at midnight Paul and Silas sang praises unto God." But there was sweeter singing after the washing, singing in which the jailer joined. "And he rejoiced in the Lord." Is it an unwarrantable liberty to imagine that the prisoners would teach their jailer some of their songs, and that they would sing them together?

Restitution Only Can Bring Peace

After the earthquake at Messina new springs were opened out in innumerable places. And after the earthquake that night in Philippi and after the washing of the stripes new springs of delight were unsealed in this jailer's soul and he drank of the pleasures of God.

There are many of us who are impoverished in the spiritual life because of wrongs that have never been repaired. We were treacherous in business and the money is still in our pockets. "The voice of thy brother crieth to me." If the voice of the wrong mixes with our prayers, God cannot hear the one because of the other. We must wash the stripes of those who are sore because of our sin. With all our strength we must seek to put things right. The religion that does this kind of thing provides its own witness to the world. To wash the wounds is the only way to holy light, holy joy and holy peace.

The Factor the Shepherd Forgot

BY WILLIAM E. BROOKS

THESE FROSTY AUTUMN nights bring out the stars. A host that the haze of summer hid shine clear and bright. They are wondrously beautiful, they are marvelously bewildering, they are infinitely humbling. Man's littleness never is so plain to him as when his fancy wanders in the far spaces where they swing. The cry of the shepherd of the Bethlehem plain is echoed in his heart: "When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained; what is man, that thou art mindful of him?"

And there would be more point to the shepherd's plaint could he live in this day when astronomical science has revealed the fact that the stars he saw were but the vanguard of the luminous host that stretches leagues on leagues into unseen, unguessed space, a host in whose vast reaches our little world were all but lost. "If God," says one despairing astronomer, "dispatches one of his angels to discover this tiny planet amongst the glittering hosts of his stars, it would be like sending a child out upon some vast prairie to find a speck of sand at the root of some blade of grass."

What is man, all men, against such a background? And the phrase "all men" adds another distracting element. For the man is only one among the thronging multitudes of his town or city. Then he multiplies the multitude by the myriad cities the world around. He adds the vast army of the dead, the throng of lives that are yet to be, and if he were small before in the presence of the stars he is as nothing now! The faith that believes that God is guarding the days of such an infinitesimal life as his is a delusion of his fancy, the wild creature of his overwrought egotism! It is easy to be faithless when man reasons thus.

But is this reason, or is it imagination? Is it not a distinction of reason that it considers all the factors of a problem before it draws its conclusions? And the factor the shepherd forgot, the factors that every man forgets who thinking thus watches the stars grow cold until the chill gets into his heart and into his faith, is that God is a personality. And among the essential elements of personality is affection—is love. Love is always individual. You cannot love a mass of men. You cannot even love your own family, as a family. Your love goes out to the single members of the family, as individuals, as William and Mary and John. And you love them because they are individuals, because William is William and John is John. Can any other rule apply to God's personality? Can God when he loves love any other way than individually? And when we stop to think about it we find Jesus' love was always individual. In many striking ways the gospels set this forth. How carefully the evangelist describes this trait—"and Jesus loved," not the Bethany family, but "Jesus loved Mary and Martha and Lazarus." "He must needs go through Samaria," the harder, more perilous way, because a woman who was a sinner needed his care. And the one thing that stands out on the day of the cross was his care for individuals, from his morning's anxiety for Pilate to the last thought for his mother. Not the cross, not even the sacrifice he was offering, could cut him off from his care for the individual.

Surely this is a revelation of the mind of God. Jesus is God. That he wore the fleshly robe did not change his nature. Today I wear my study coat, on Sunday I will wear my Sunday coat. But I am the same man. The mind which was in Christ is God's mind, the love that shone forth in Christ is God's love. The same care that Christ had for the individual God has. My life is of infinite value to him; not a hair can fall from my head without his knowledge. So the reason answers imagination's fears.

To question the care of the Father for the lowest of his children is to question the whole revelation that Christ has given unto men. For that revelation is nothing if it is not a revelation of a personality, a great personality truly, and with all the attributes of a personality, among which is love, which cannot be any other than individual. This is the factor the shepherd forgot. This is the factor imagination is ever likely to forget.

And if God's supreme care is for the individual the fathers were not far wrong when they put in the place of emphasis the word that "man's chief end is to glorify God."

THE WAYFARER

One Young Woman's Friends

THE RUSSIAN pilgrims who throng Jerusalem at Easter are keen to visit all sites connected with the earthly life of our Lord. They want to walk, as literally as may be, in his footsteps. In their creed it is a point of peculiar merit to have traced the earthly walk of the Man of Galilee. An American traveler in the East comes gradually to a comprehension of this pilgrimage idea. It is one form of literal obedience to religious convictions.

Now, the Wayfarer thinks he has discovered a somewhat similar idea at work in the case of an American young woman. Reading the principle in the practice, the Wayfarer believes that the conceit of this young woman—who, by the way, is of the sort who do not advertise their emotions—is nothing less than to fulfill in exact obedience the teaching of Jesus concerning "the lame, the blind, the halt."

* * * * *

All this is surmise, but it is based upon evidence that any court would likely accept. For one may scarcely visit this young woman's home without meeting some of her interesting friends, nearly all of whom, one gradually realizes, are crippled in some way. This does not mean the maintenance of a labeled eleemosynary institution. So far from it that it would be a real affront to intimate, even in friendliest fashion, that this attractive home is other than the hospitable abode of a young woman of culture and fine spirit. Whose affair is it that the guest chambers are never empty, and that, by an extraordinary coincidence, the ever flowing stream of visitors show a remarkable proportion of the blind, the lame, and the otherwise afflicted? May not a hostess choose her own guests, according to her personal taste? And if she does not speak of the limitations of her friends, what right has even an inquisitive journalist to analyze them?

* * * * *

The ice is thin here, so the Wayfarer skates off with the digression that if our friends were to remark only upon folks' peculiarities, what talk of freakishness there would be! Why should we note one guest's blindness, rather than another's pigheadedness? Or this one's short leg, and not that one's limping ideas or lame breeding? Brave men, accomplished, cheerful and useful, doing a noble work in the world, has the Wayfarer met under this rooftree; why should he mention the incidental fact of their physical blindness? He would not exchange their company for that of—there we go again on to the thin ice! Why not try to tell the story straight, in all its simplicity, and let the reader do his own moralizing?

* * * * *

Miss Rich has no near relatives. She is a college graduate, and she has a limited income. Like most of the rest of the world, she has to consider the cost of all her enterprises. She is unable to afford an automobile or extensive travel, although she has been abroad. She has two homes, one in the outlying section of a great city, and the other a simple, roomy cottage at the seashore. The latter she lets to a tenant for half the season, for an obvious reason.

There you have the woman and her equipment. Add to the latter her many friends—remembering always the Scripture's prescription for having friends. Scores of the latter are blind; others are lame and crippled. Many are women toilers; some are tired teachers. A host of the lonely, in which every city abounds, and to whom a few days of real home life would be happiness, are included in Miss Rich's friends. It goes without saying that the self-centered, the pleasure-seeking, and the snobbish do not build up this sort of visiting list. But this young woman, a devout Episcopalian, would not for an instant talk about the religious motive underlying her choice of house guests. The fact that every Sunday evening they all gather for a "sing" from the hymn book might be suggestive, if one were real astute. Taxed with being a philanthropist, Miss Rich would doubtless bridle up, and with wide and disconcerting eyes would aver, "Why, these are my friends! Is there any more reason why they should not visit me than why your friends should not visit you?"

* * * * *

There you have the secret of the story. These folks are real friends. Their afflictions are ignored, just as any well-bred person would ignore a wart on the nose of Cromwell, if he chanced to meet him in a drawing room. It takes the tact of a gentle-souled woman to accomplish this; and a hospitality that is as cunning as it is generous. Yet Miss Rich accomplishes it. Her friends do not feel that they have been invited to share her home, in city or by the sea, for any other reason than that they are her friends. She cherishes them too sincerely to wound them in their most sensitive spot. After all, wasn't it in quite this natural, unprofessional way that Jesus cared for the folk who needed him? He gave his friendship to the spirit beneath the need or the suffering.

Let no unthinking person regard Miss Rich as a heroine or a martyr to good works. She is wealthy beyond the power of money to make rich. Her days are crowded with life. She shares the experiences of a great company of rare spirits. Of ennui she knows not the meaning. The hearty fun of wholesome play and the quieter delights of communion with congenial spirits and the avocations of cultivated folk who live by the spirit—these are hers in full abundance. Along the wayside of modest ministry, the beautiful flowers of happiness have bloomed. She has learned the deep joy of being loved.

* * * * *

Whimsical though the idea may be, Miss Rich has followed the footprints of the Blessed Feet more closely than even the pilgrims in Palestine.

Testing the Degree to Which Smoking Has Affected a Boy's Heart Action

"NO MORE FOR ME"

How a "Clinic" Under Anti-Cigarette League Auspices Is Doing Practical Service in Destroying the Liking for Tobacco-Filled Tubes

BY HERBERT H. SMITH

HE WAS over 50 years old, with a flourishing Chicago business — a man accustomed to doing large things in a big way—but he didn't have will power to stop smoking. Almost with tears in his eyes he asked for help to overcome his mastering habit. This man was one of thirty who on a recent day attended the clinic of the Anti-Cigarette League of Chicago.

Cigarette users — men and women—find their way by the dozen each day to the eleventh floor of the Woman's Temple and come away with a positive dislike for tobacco. Messenger boys of the loop district, school boys as young as 4½ years found by their parents to have the tobacco habit, young business and professional men, and women from the stage are all in the growing throng which has been seeking the assistance of the Anti-Cigarette League to cure themselves of the desire to smoke. They are cured — and so far as reports have been received by the officers of the league the cure appears permanent.

Simple as the cure is, its effectiveness is said to be wonderful. Its base is the chemical reaction of silver nitrate solution with nicotine. This creates an unpleasant taste. The smoker who has previously rinsed his mouth with a diluted solution of silver nitrate might go far enough to put a match to a cigarette, but he is almost certain to say "Bah!" and throw it away after the first puff or two. "No more for me." The effect is immediate. Dr. D. H. Kress, general secretary of the Anti-Cigarette League, who has forsaken his practice to devote a large share of his attention to this newly established work, does not claim credit for the discovery of this cure. The details of the mouth wash were in fact published in 1908, but attracted little attention. Through the treatment of the cancerous mouth of a patient a number of years ago the attention of Dr. Kress was focused upon this chemical solution as an aid in taking away the desire for tobacco. He already had observed that habitual smokers are large consumers of tea, coffee, meats and highly seasoned foods. He found that when a man limits his diet to milk, baked cereals and fruits, desire for tobacco is very much lessened. Combination of attention to diet with the silver nitrate mouth wash constitutes the basis of the cure.

Effect of Tobacco on the Heart Action

Because his son surreptitiously became a smoker when very young Dr. Kress has always taken a lively interest in the work of the Anti-Cigarette League and for a number of years has been a volunteer lecturer before the Y. M. C. A. and young people's societies. In these lectures he describes the cure which he had been using in private practice and explains the deleterious effect of smoking upon the heart action of men and boys. By means of a delicate instrument adjusted to the wrist of a smoker he can almost invariably tell from the pulse beats as traced on a smoked paper to what extent an individual is addicted to the use of tobacco.

Following his lectures many young men have consulted the doctor and asked for more information regarding the cure. This fact prompted Dr. Kress last summer to suggest to Lucy Page Gaston, superintendent of the Anti-Cigarette League of America, that there should be established a clinic for those who desire to relieve themselves of the cigarette habit. Space was found in the offices of the league and, from the first, applications for help were very large. Men prominent in business who had been smokers for twenty or even thirty years have come to the office for assistance. Women who were afraid to confess the habit to their husbands have been given the assistance which has helped them to regain their former self-respect.

The opening of this clinic last August and the announcement that cigarette smoking could be cured by a mouth wash attracted the attention of daily newspapers and an account of the newly organized work of the league was published in hundreds of papers. These news articles have inspired letters from every state in the union and from foreign countries, bringing requests for details of the cure. To all of these inquirers instructions have been sent without cost, although many who have thus found unexpected assistance have gratefully joined with the league in furthering its work.

This campaign which has begun so auspiciously in Chicago is to be carried to other cities of the country through clinics and special meetings. A number of cities in Indiana already have arranged for assistance from the league's officers. At the same time the organization is assisting in enforcing the state law of Illinois in regard to smoking by minors, and in six weeks after prosecutions were brought it is said that cigarette sales of one chain of stores in the loop district of Chicago fell off 10 per cent, which is the same as saying that sales decreased an average of 8,500 cigarettes a day. Practically all of these previously had been sold to minors and contrary to law. The use of tobacco among school boys is also being diminished through special officers employed by the league who may arrest any one under 18 years of age seen smoking in a public place.

Miss Gaston is making an effort through the young people's societies of the country to enlist members in the "Million Club," an organization of young people who promise to abstain from the use of liquor and cigarettes. An ingenious part of this scheme, the organization of circles of ten which will assist in extending the membership of the league, has already been adopted by the Christian Endeavor Union of Illinois.

Recent scientific investigation and examination of the smoke produced by the burning of a cigarette show that the nicotine of the cigarette is far less virulent than are the carbonic oxide and other products of its combustion. The loose structure of the cigarette is said to cause the production of this poisonous gas. Carbonic oxide thus enters the blood through the lungs and the damage done is in direct proportion to the quantities inhaled. Acrolein is another of the drugs produced by the burning of cigarette paper. It is this that makes the smoke irritating. Acrolein in considerable quantities is extremely dangerous. It is said by doctors that the constant irritation of the nervous system of the young especially by cigarettes causes restlessness and inability to concentrate thought.

If You Want to Stop Smoking—

1. Determine that you want to stop.
2. Wash your mouth after each meal for three days with a silver nitrate solution, one-eighth of 1 per cent.
3. When a desire for smoking appears chew gentian root. Five cents' worth will last a long while.
4. For the first two weeks after beginning treatment make your meals of fruits, well-baked cereal foods, and milk. Buttermilk or malted milk may be used in place of tea or coffee.
5. The typical city man's lunch of a ham sandwich, liberally covered with mustard, and a cup of coffee must be abolished in favor of a more nourishing and less stimulating meal.
6. Turkish baths assist in getting rid of stored up nicotine.

People Who Are Not "Worth While"

BY MARION HARLAND

THE PHRASE IS IDIOMATIC. Perhaps it is not quite grammatical. It is surely expressive of what comes into our minds and falls from our lips every day. It stands for our fellow beings who cannot contribute to our pleasure or advance our material interests as far as we can see. It does not of necessity mean the poor relation or the social bore, nor yet the nonentity the purpose of whose being we have never been able to fathom.

I heard it used only last week by a man who is beloved and revered by the community blessed by his indwelling. He is charming in personality; he is tender of heart and bountiful of hand. Those who know him best account his friendship an honor.

He was speaking of certain young folk to whom he is related, if somewhat distantly, by blood.

"I should like to know them better," he said, regretfully, "and to this end I have made advances more than once. They have never responded to my overtures of friendship. They evidently do not consider me worth while."

It was but natural that his young daughter should retort indignantly, "You are a thousand times 'worth-whiler' than any of them!"

I surmised shrewdly that the apparent neglect of the young relatives arose from sheer selfish absorption in their own affairs. Yet more shrewdly I said to myself that each one of them would have hastened to pay his respects if assured that the elder man could further the young person's own wishes in the matter of pecuniary gain or social position.

Charles II. of England is credited with a saying worthy of a more astute diplomat:

"Treat every man as if you knew you might some time have use for him."

None but the exceptionally cold-blooded and far-seeing lay the injunction to heart in the heyday of youth. It is quite safe to venture the computation that 50 per cent of those who neglect the practice live to regret it.

Finding Something Interesting in Every One

A higher principle is to accept each new acquaintance as a possible opportunity of doing good in some way or manner to be determined in the progress of our association. It is contrary to the genius of our holy religion to "cultivate" our fellows for what we may make out of them. That is reading the golden rule backward. Daily life is full of such reading.

"I believe that you find something interesting in everyone you meet!" was the impatient exclamation of a woman eminent in her circle for erudition and accomplishments.

The woman addressed was not a whit her inferior in personal gifts, and the speech had the ring of impatient wonder. The other met the attack smilingly:

"Of course I do! Don't you?"

"Indeed, I do not! Nor do I feign interest or even patience when I know the person I am talking to has not one idea or aim in common with me. Life is too short to be wasted upon bores. Half of the people I meet are not worth while!"

"You are singularly unfortunate!" rejoined the other quietly. "My experience has been very different. When I was a child I read in 'Display'—one of Miss Kennedy's books—a sentence that has stuck in my memory ever since. I think there is not a day in which I do not prove the truth of it:

> "'No human being is absolutely uninteresting.'

Nobody reads Miss Kennedy nowadays. I shall be eternally grateful to her for writing that golden saying."

"'Eternally' is a long word!" Had the objector been less refined the retort would have been a sneer.

"I use it advisedly!" as seriously as before. "My gains from the practice of the great truth laid down by the forgotten novelist are not to be calculated fully in this life."

The brilliant woman brushed aside the topic with an airy gesture:

"As I said, life is too short and things of real importance are too many for me to squander minutes and hours upon people who are not worth while!"

The same dogmatic phrase would seem to be of universal application.

It fell trippingly from the lips of a college girl to whose kindly notice I had commended a shy youth, a stranger in her circle, as "a nice boy whose mother was my early friend."

"Certainly, if it would please you, I will try to brighten him up a little—if I can! He looks very unlikely and, as you know, there are so few young men in the twentieth century who are worth while!"

She had no sordid subthought in the flippant phrase. Her mind is bent upon self-improvement, not upon making a "good match." The youth who does not promise diversion, entertainment or mental stimulus has no appeal to her sympathies or tastes. It would be a waste of time (her time!) to attempt to put the boy at ease in unfamiliar surroundings and to draw out what is best worth his thinking and seeking.

Our grandmothers never heard of "functions" as applied to social life. The word had a dozen other meanings in their schooldays, most of them pertaining to bodily exercises. It was reserved for our utilitarian age to supersede "amusement" and "hospitality" by the bisyllabic term. "Extended in recent use to cover social entertainments, such as operas, balls and receptions." Thus modern editions of the lexicons from which we used to learn the use of language.

How much has the cardinal consideration of asking to our homes people who are "worth while" to do with the aforesaid "extension," I wonder? How few of us in arranging lists of guests that are to furnish feasts, small and great, contemplate the pleasure we may give, and how many the advantages to ourselves from the attendance of people "who are worth while."

At a certain feast planned ages ago the latter class of guests declined to come for reasons at which we can now but guess. Perhaps the host was personally unpopular to the man who had bought a yoke of oxen, or politically obnoxious to the "ring" represented by the bridegroom whose devotion to his newly wedded spouse kept him away.

Some of us may not think in this connection of another feast —not allegorical—of which we read in the same book.

"One of the Pharisees desired him that he would eat with him. And he went into the Pharisee's house and sat down."

Passing over the immortal episode of the fallen woman and the box of ointment, we come upon a significant passage:

"He said unto Simon: 'Seest thou this woman? I entered into thine house; thou gavest me no water for my feet; but she hath washed my feet with tears, and wiped them with the hairs of her head.

"'Thou gavest me no kiss; but this woman since the time I came in, hath not ceased to kiss my feet.

"'My head with oil thou didst not anoint; but this woman hath anointed my feet with ointment.'"

Simon the Pharisee and His Guest

Simon was thoroughly conversant with the etiquette of hospitality and the nice observances pertaining to even family meals. The Pharisees ate not except they had first washed the hands and arms up to the elbow, and water was ready for the travel-stained feet after the sandals were removed by obsequious servants, or, if the guest were a person of distinction, by the host himself. He girded himself with a towel and, kneeling, performed the gracious office. Ointment for the head was then proffered—still by the head of the house.

The conclusion is unavoidable: Clearly, our Lord was in the eyes of the Pharisaical host a guest who was "not worth while."

Hearing, as he could not help hearing, of the traveling Teacher whom the common people accounted a prophet, he had asked him to supper in an easy, informal way, thinking perhaps to see some miracle performed by him or to provoke a discussion upon certain weighty matters of the law, or it may have been out of good nature and compassion for the homeless wanderer. He rated his social consequence so low as to omit the simplest forms of common politeness. Every incident confirms the impression that to his way of thinking he had no reason to "cultivate" the itinerant evangelist.

Read with me the story and lay the lesson to heart, ye whose prime object in life is "self-improvement."

Who is to judge who is "worth while"?

"Those from whom, like Pharisees, we shrink
With Christ may eat and drink."

But for the woman who was a sinner, we should never have heard of Simon the Pharisee.

THE HOME COUNCIL

The Girls' Club a Factor in Homemaking

BY MARIAN CHURCHILL GRAVES

SOMETIMES a mother feels that she must expend earnest thought and effort in making home attractive to her boy during the formative period of his life, without realizing that his sister, at the same period, needs equal consideration. This mother takes it for granted that her daughter's interests lie in the home, since long ages of precedent have proved that home is the woman's proper sphere and that therefore she is safe; but she fears that the many outside attractions will lure her boy away unless home holds a stronger counter attraction for him. Yet many girls regard home simply as a place of imprisonment because they have never been shown its possibilities.

Home Duties Must Be Related to Girls' Interests

One mother who perceived this attitude in her daughter has found a means of making the duties and privileges of home a vital interest in her girl's life. This mother studied the matter from all sides and she finally decided that home failed to appeal to her daughter for two reasons. First, because the home duties and interests had never been made attractive to her, or related in any way to her own interests. Secondly, there had never been any attempt in the home to satisfy the "gang" instinct which is so prominent in most boys and many girls from 14 to 18 years of age.

She concluded that the best way to eliminate these causes of dissatisfaction was to organize a club of her daughter's friends, this club to concern itself with making home activities attractive. The mothers of the various girls were consulted and most of them gladly gave their support and cooperation. As for the girls themselves, so eager were they when the plan was outlined to them that they chose the mother organizer for their president and took up her ideas with a heartiness that made her feel she had reckoned wisely in basing her efforts on gang enthusiasm.

The club met one evening each week, at the home of the president or other members. The first meeting night of each month was called "instruction night." On this night the president gave lessons in cooking and the proper care of the home. She strove to make these lessons both instructive and entertaining, allowing the girls to do the work, while she merely supervised.

Members of Club Devote Different Weeks to Different Pursuits

The second meeting night of the month was "entertainment night." On this night the club met at different members' homes and entertainment was provided by a committee of two members, who kept their plans a secret from all other members except the president. The girls were permitted to ask any boy friends to be present on entertainment night if they chose.

The third night was "sewing night." On this night the girls sewed on garments designed for their own use or they joined in sewing on clothing for some unfortunate family in the town.

The fourth meeting night was known as "study night." As most of the girls were high school students, the leader did not start them on any formal course in literature, choosing rather to help them become acquainted with the life, aims and accomplishments of such workers for social uplift as Jane Addams of Hull House, Judge Ben Lindsay of the Denver juvenile court and others.

Mutual Interests of Mother and Daughter Make Happy Home

Of course all this took time and effort, like every other undertaking that is in the least worth while. The results, however, have more than justified all the energy expended, for every girl has received a new insight into the real meaning of homemaking and homekeeping. She has grown to see that the beautifying and making happy of her present home is the first step toward the making of that future home of which every womanly girl dreams. And further, through the club the girls and their mothers have been drawn closer together in a mutual interest, and whatever promotes mutuality makes for the solidarity of the home.

BITS BY THE WAY

FILTH IN CHEWING GUM

The habitual gum-chewer thinks he gets a lot of fun out of a 1-cent stick of this popular jaw exercise. But his enjoyment would be somewhat tempered if he could but know that he is expending his enegry on a questionable mixture composed of gum and various defunct inhabitants of tropical forests and other kinds of filth.

The majority of chewing gums, according to statements in Collier's, are contaminated with dirt and debris of insects. Their basis is a gummy substance obtained by coagulating the sap of certain tropical trees. "The process of gathering the sap," the magazine goes on to say, "is as follows: The trunk of the tree is scored in zigzag fashion, from the first branch to the ground, thus making a trough fully seventy to 100 feet in actual length. Now the sap flowing into this cut is pure and white, but what happens?

"The sap as it flows down the tree, being sweet and sticky, attracts and holds many things that move, walk, fly or are blown. The native gatherer is not a dainty person. He is paid by the pound, and even a fly weighs something.

"Now the sap is collected in buckets and taken to a central station and boiled, with all its collection of natural history specimens, there made into cakes and exported to the states.

"It would be natural to suppose that this crude gum, so pure and white when it came from the tree, and now so otherwise, would be put through a drastic filtration and refining before being used. Far from it, the only process is to break it into small pieces the size of cracked corn and hand pick. Try picking a fly out of lump of putty! Enough said—this hand picking is sometimes supplemented by a crude washing with water.

"This gum is then melted and sugar and flavor added, cooled and rolled out as desired, packed and sold to 90,000,000 men, women and children, carrying on its face the bar sinister of dirt, for the muddy color is dirt and the specks you see are—well, there is no guaranty given as to the exact nature.

"But why, you ask, do not the manufacturers cleanse the crude gum of these foreign substances? Can it not be done? It can be done, but it takes lots of money and time, to say nothing of the plant and machinery, so why bother, as long as you and I cheerfully chew and say nothing?"

It seems strange that in this day of pure food agitation chewing gum has not been haled before the bar and condemned. But "you and I" can at least try to keep our children free from the contamination of it. Pure white gums are a clean product. All others are unfit for use.

HIS IDEA OF A GOOD WIFE

There was recently discovered in a fur-covered, musty trunk in a New England attic a letter giving directions to a young man, presumably about to embark on the sea of matrimony, for choosing a woman who would make a good wife. "She will be like three things," it says, "and she will not be like three things. She will be like a snail; and she will not be like a snail, who carries all it has on its back. She will be like an echo that speaks when spoken to; and she will not be like the echo, which always has the last word. She will be like the town clock that speaks at the right time, and she will not be like the town clock, heard all over town."

The letter was dated 1863 and seems to voice pretty fairly the masculine attitude toward women at that time. The writer, however, if he is living today is having an opportunity to remold his sentiments. Our "emancipated" women have little in common with the modest violet of his ideals.

LIGHT THAT CANNOT DIE

It is said that when John Keats, the poet, lay dying in Rome the most faithful watcher at his bedside was his friend, Joseph Severn. During the hours of darkness a solitary candle illuminated the room and in case, overcome by weariness, he should drop asleep and allow this candle to burn out, Severn devised a plan by which it would light others automatically. At the base of the burning candle he tied a piece of thin twine, the other end of which he attached to the wick of a new candle some yards away. As the old end died out the expiring flame caught the twine, flickering up it like a fairy star and set light to the second candle. A third and a fourth was added, and the invalid's eyes never looked in vain for the cheering light.

So it is that the life brightly lived kindles the flame of brave living in other lives which, in turn, pass on the brightness. And so does the spirit remain immortal—"on earth as it is in heaven." S. C. R.

Rhymes to Remember

A NOVEMBER DAISY

Afterthought of summer's bloom!
Late arrival at the feast,
Coming when the songs have ceased
And the merry guests departed,
Leaving but an empty room,
Silence, solitude, and gloom!
Are you lonely, heavy-hearted;
You, the last of all your kind,
Nodding in the autumn wind;
Now that all your friends are flown,
Blooming late and all alone?

Nay, I wrong you, little flower.
Reading mournful mood of mine
In your looks, that give no sign
Of a spirit dark and cheerless!
You possess the heavenly power
That rejoices in the hour.
Glad, contented, free, and fearless,
Lift a sunny face to heaven
When a sunny day is given!
Make a summer of your own,
Blooming late and all alone!

Once the daisies gold and white
Sea-like through the meadow rolled:
Once my heart could hardly hold
All its pleasures. I remember
In the flood of youth's delight
Separate joys were lost to sight.
That was summer! Now November
Sets the perfect flower apart;
Gives each blossom of the heart
Meaning, beauty, grace unknown—
Blooming late and all alone.

Little Brother Gray-Brown

BROTHER GRAY-BROWN is not so very beautiful to look at, but he's a rather friendly little chap and quite easily tamed, and so he seems more like a brother than most of his wild four-footed brethren of field and forest.

His long, coarse, grayish brown hair answers his purpose very well, even if it is not pretty, and though he is quite a fat person, makes him look even stouter than he is. His sharp, pointed muzzle is very useful for smelling out honey and other things Brother Gray-Brown loves; his short ears can quickly tell when boys and dogs are on his trail; his somewhat long, bushy tail, with its black rings and white, he finds a most comfortable blanket for his face when he curls up into a ball for his winter nap. And so why should Brother Gray-Brown care if he is not beautiful?

Brother Gray-Brown's own name is a rather undignified one—that is, his nickname, for most folks call him a coon instead of a raccoon. And somehow coon seems better to fit Little Brother Gray-Brown's mischievous and funny ways than does the more dignified name. For instance, he is very curious. It is much easier to fancy a curious coon than a curious raccoon. If Brother Gray-Brown were a pet of yours and you gave him the freedom of the house he would quickly ransack it, investigate the pantry, sample everything in it, particularly the preserves, molasses, sugar, pies and cakes—for he has an astonishing sweet tooth. He would learn to work latches and turn doorknobs and no place or room would be safe from his invasion. He would remove covers from dishes and corks from bottles and if you happened to have a cornfield he would have the time of his life in it, pulling down the stalks, stripping down husks with his paws and gnawing off the kernels. Because next to sweets, Brother Gray-Brown loves corn best of all goodies, and when he has a field to himself, eats all he can and wastes more.

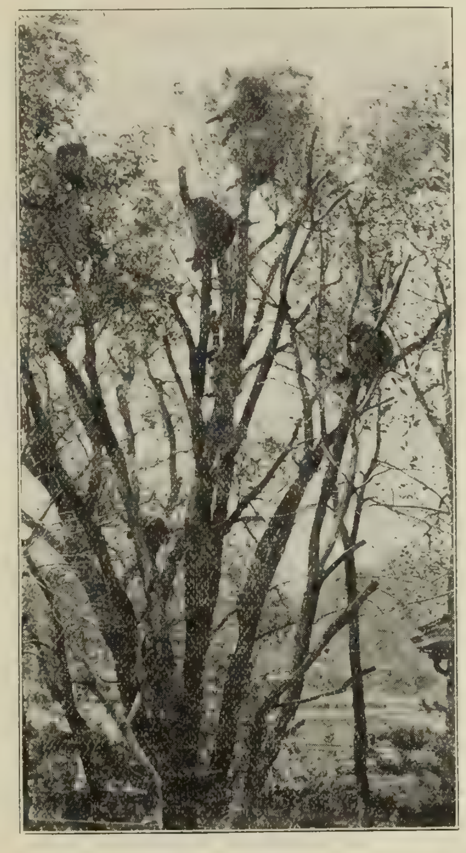
He is willing, however, to eat almost anything. He likes mice, small birds, eggs, insects, fruits, nuts, crawfish, frogs and even chickens. He is a very naughty little brother when he gets chicken hungry, for when night comes he makes for the nearest henhouse and when he once gets inside he slaughters the poor fowl right and left and then gorges himself. And that isn't enough; Brother Gray-Brown must needs return the next night for more—often to his sorrow, for Mr. Farmer is likely to be waiting for him with his gun.

Brother Gray-Brown also likes fish. He enjoys playing in shallow water, turning over stones in search of crawfish and lying in wait at the edge of the stream, ready to hook out any fish within reach by a sharp stroke of a forepaw and extended claws. Indeed he prefers wet places to any others, and prowls about the borders of swamps and brooks, often following the path made by sheep and cattle when they go down to drink.

This gray-brown brother has one funny little trick—he always insists on washing his food before he eats it. He washes it very thoroughly, too, holding it in both forepaws and sousing it about in the water. If there is no water at hand he rubs it vigorously with a paw.

Brother Gray-Brown is a great stay-at-home. Wherever he may prowl at night in search of sleeping birds or any other game, he always returns to his bedroom to sleep through the day, unless it is cloudy, when he may venture forth for a while. Coons are not particular about making cozy sleeping places. Occasionally they steal a nap in a crow's nest, but usually they flatten themselves along the thick branches of trees or else curl themselves tight about the trunk near the top, supported by surrounding small branches, as you see them in this picture taken at the zoo. Their coats are so near the color of the bark that they easily escape detection from below. A hollow log or tree sometimes furnishes a house for Brother Gray-Brown, but usually he prefers the treetops.

He sleeps during the severest part of the winter, perhaps venturing to the ground when there's a thaw, but scurrying back home at the next cold wave. He may creep out and steal some grain from a near-by corn crib, but he spends most of his time napping. When warm spring days come, however, he goes once more to the hen yard or burrows in the haystack for mice or searches among the sodden leaves for newly awakened snakes and beetles.



Asleep in the Treetops, Safe from Boys and Dogs

Baby Gray-Browns are born in families of three to six, in April or May, and are blind and helpless as kittens. They stay with their parents the first year, all curling up together to keep warm, if a hollow tree happens to be their home. Sometimes several families live in the same tree. No raccoon was ever known to dig a hole of any kind for himself, though he is clever with his feet in other ways and his forepaws are never still, always reaching out to examine anything that may be within reach.

SADIE SWUNG, SALLY SUNG

Sally Simon saw Sadie Slee
Slowly, sadly swinging.
"She seems sorrowful," said she,
So she started singing.
Sadie smiled; soon swiftly swung;
Sitting straight, steered stiffly.
"So!" said Sally, "something sung
Scatters sunshine swiftly!"

No Wonder He Wouldn't Go

The janitor of the primary school was a fierce-looking man with drooping mustaches. The sight of him awed the children.

Willie Purcell had spent his very first day in school and surprised his mother on coming home by being very silent and moody. The next morning he refused to go to school. When she tried to take him there he kicked and squirmed until she finally allowed him to stay home.

At noon his father was told the strange news.

"What's the matter with school, dear?" asked father. "Why won't you go if mamma takes you?"

"No, no, daddy! No-o-o! I'm afraid," came out between sobs. "Yeth'day a big—big—man came into school—with a ladder—and he looked around—and he said—'We won't hang them today—we'll hang them—tomorrow!'"

A writer in Suburban Life has some interesting things to tell of her own pet coon, Rastus Sorghum Washington, who was sent to her from Kentucky in a strawberry crate.

When I opened the crate, she says, he pulled himself slowly out and, in the most dignified manner possible, climbed into my lap, then upon my shoulder, ran his little paws through my hair and, when he had finished his tour of inspection of my person, got down and inspected with equal thoroughness the room in which he had been set at liberty. From that moment Rastus and I became the closest of friends.

At first I had some anxiety lest Rastus should not get on with our other pets, a large tomcat, an Irish setter and a black and tan terrier, who had a family of small puppies. Whenever Rastus and Shere Kahn, the cat, met, each arched his back, each hissed, but it was always Shere Kahn who retreated from the scene of action.

With the dogs the story was different. Leda, the old setter, had a good disposition, was lazy and in the summer at least had a regular army of fleas in her silky red hair. Now Rastus had a perfect passion for running his little paws over everything that came in his way. In fact, he seemed to get much more pleasure out of feeling things with his hands than he did out of seeing them, for he almost never looked at anything he was playing with. For hours at a time he would lie in the sun with Leda on the piazza, running his paws through her hair, while each face wore an expression of perfect satisfaction.

Leda had never had such thorough scratching in her life, and Rastus had never had such an interesting field to explore. All these little massage treatments sooner or later ended in the same way. He might resist for a long time, but in the end Rastus always succumbed to an overpowering temptation to explore her fascinating ears. This was more than she could stand and Leda would feel obliged to rise and seek a sleeping place beyond the reach of Rustus's inquisitive little paws.

Poor Rastus hated to be alone. I kept him in the house whenever I could, but I could not trust him there when I was away. He had a little house out on the lawn, to which he was tied with a long rope. It was in a sunny place, and, when they were

November 16, 1913—Death of Moses

By J. L. Scott

Lesson Text: Deuteronomy 31:1-8; 32:48-52; 34:1-12. Golden Text, Psalm 116:15: Precious in the sight of Jehovah is the death of his saints.

The time came for Moses to die. His sun was touching the west and there remained nothing further for him to do. It is an old saying that man is immortal until his work is done. Moses was born to live. The edicts of Pharaoh failed to touch him. His little ark was sailed by a compass unerring as the finger of God. He was now an old man and knew it, but his years sat lightly upon him. Friends noted his strength and declared that his natural force remained unabated. But the old man knew better. He recalled the former days and he realized that he was no longer what he had been.

One day he assembled the people and rehearsed in their hearing the history of Israel for the past forty years. Together they retraced their steps, under the cliffs of Horeb and by the shores of the sea. Nothing was omitted. Every chapter held the same old story of ingratitude and sin. Sinai flamed anew and the thunders once more voiced the law of God. It was a resurrection of the past and a foreshadowing of what was to come.

Farewell Address of Moses an Outburst of Praise and Hope

That address holds a place unrivaled in literature. It was delivered at the very brink of the grave and yet contains nothing gloomy, nothing sad. Instead of sentiment peculiar to farewells in general, there is an outburst of hope clear as the chorus of the stars. "And Israel dwelleth in safety . . . in a land of grain and new wine; yea, his heavens drop down dew. Happy art thou, O Israel."

From the beginning Moses had followed the assurance of God. No promise was ever permitted to fall by the wayside. His achievements were the expression of faith. He lived as if he saw the invisible. The past is the best earnest of one's future. The Almighty had been with him on the desert and the sea, and to his care Moses commended the people. That was faith.

We have all to a lesser degree experienced the same thing. Who at times has not felt himself hedged in by walls that reached to the very skies? Our Canaan remained as a promise whose realization lay in the far distance. In the walls of the present there were no gates in sight and yet we plodded on. By and by the walls receded or gates were opened in the most unexpected way. Such, we believe, has been the experience of every earnest Christian. The age of Moses is never past.

Not Alone Sin at Kadesh That Barred Moses from Canaan

The heart of every Israelite must have thrilled as he listened for the last time to his leader. "I am an old man," he said, "one hundred and twenty years old this day, and can no longer go in and out." And then, lowering his voice, he added, "Also the Lord hath said to me, Thou shalt not go over this Jordan." The sin at Kadesh came back to disturb him. There he had smitten the rock and failed to sanctify God.

But this was not the only obstruction to the promised land. That God should have so punished his servant for a single mistake is an idea hard to accept. Moses himself did not so regard it. His 120 years and his inability to do his work had much to do with it. Kadesh was more a symptom than a sin. Meekness had been Moses's reigning virtue. This he lost when he smote the rock. Impatience is an evidence of irresponsible age. The scepter of self-control was no longer held with a certain hand. Moses had outlived his power, and with it his usefulness.

God never leaves himself without a witness or a workman. Joshua had been the understudy of his master for over forty years, and the time had come for him to assume his place. There was no envy on the part of Moses. In the presence of priest and people he placed his mantle upon the shoulders of his successor and in the name of God bade him be strong.

Twice did God meet his servant by the shores of a river—once for service and once for reward. From the Nile to the Jordan—what leagues of history lie between! The writer recalls once hearing the late Dr. John Hall pray, "May we so live that when we come to die we shall have nothing to do but to die." Moses had so lived, and he died under the direction of God. The biblical account is simple. He went up from the plains of Moab to the mountain of Nebo, where God met him and pointed out the land promised his ancestors centuries before. And there he died, and God buried him in the valley, but no man knoweth of his sepulcher unto this day. Some scenes transcend art, and this is one.

Tradition and Legend Busy Themselves with Death of Moses

But tradition and legend have not hesitated to invade the sanctity of that mountain and dissipate the halo that gathers about it. According to Jewish history, he made the ascent in sight of the people, whose demonstrations of grief evidenced the deepest sorrow. The elders who accompanied him were finally dismissed and when he was about to embrace Eleazar and Joshua a cloud swept by and he vanished from sight. Another legend represents the highest angels in heaven as having been summoned to receive his soul, but they hesitated through fear. Finally the angel Death approached with his drawn sword, but he saw engraved upon the lawgiver's staff the ineffable name of Jehovah. Sparks issued from his lips and his face shone like the morning. Death fled in terror and Moses was left alone. But the destroyer returned and Moses prayed to be delivered from his power. God heard his prayer and sent three angels to receive his spirit. They prepared a couch and Moses was laid upon it. An angel lay on either side and one at his feet. Moses clasped his hand and God with a divine kiss removed his soul. His grave also remained as a fruitful source of legend and story.

It may seem strange that no mention is made of immortality in connection with the lawgiver's death. But that was reserved for another mountain and a later day. For he was to appear again.

The Lesson Verse by Verse

By Hermon D. Jenkins

ANALYSIS—The farewell address of Moses was worthy of the occasion and the man. It was permitted to Moses to die as dramatically as he had lived. The promised land was from the dawn of history reserved for God's revelation of himself to a chosen people. The greatness of Joshua is seen in that he was not jealous of one greater than himself.

Moses's theological creed, his moral convictions and his democratic polity as a statesman still rule the world.

As he drew nearer to the close of his long, unselfish and laborious career, the purposes of God seemed more clear and the duty of man more imperative than ever. He realized (in outline at least) how truly the future of the world hung upon the conduct of his followers. It is not to be wondered at that he should prepare with care a farewell discourse, and hand it down to posterity with a desire that it be preserved. The whole of his address supplemented by editorial notes is contained in Deuteronomy. There is an introduction (ch. 1:1-5) and interspersed comments, such as we would today put in footnotes (ch. 4:41-49)

Farewell Address of Moses Prepared with View to Preservation

No fragment of equal age which can be compared with it for dignity, rhetorical beauty or spiritual insight has come down to us. The modern view that this was the product of unknown and unscrupulous authors in Israel's degenerate days seems most improbable when we meditate upon its sustained grandeur, its lofty conceptions and its faultless expression. We can readily believe it was prepared with great care by Moses, written out in full and intended for preservation.

This concluded, the task of Moses was done. He was ready to go.

Verse 1—When General Grant drew near to his death the place where he should be buried was of such importance in the eyes of the nation that, delicate as the question was, the officials of the government went to him to decide it. We all felt it to be signally appropriate that the commander in chief of our armies, since he could not die in battle, should die on the heights of Mount McGregor—above the clouds.

Verse 2—The exact location of Moses's grave is not known (v. 6). The elevation from which with prophetic eye the great leader looked out over the promised land, a height variously called Nebo (a Babylonian name, given doubtless during some Oriental occupation of the land) and Pisgah (a Hebrew name signifying "the hill") and one of "the mountains of Abarim" (Num. 33:47). A great many of our western mountains have a variety of names—the local, the popular and the official one recognized by the federal government on its maps.

From one or more of the points of view on this ridge nearly all Palestine can actually be seen. The highest peak is 3,500 feet above the Jordan and nine miles east of the northern end of the Dead sea.

Palestine Was Reserved as the Stage of Redemption

Verse 4—The great geographer Richter said that the best book on natural religion was a geography. He saw in the distribution of nations and even of tribes the hand of God, the overruling of Providence. The situation of Palestine was early recognized as of supreme importance (Deut. 32:8). It was the bone of contention for ages between East and West. It was of strategic importance viewed from a military point of view and not less from a religious point of view. When Paul set out on his missionary enterprises he attacked the centers of diffusion first — Antioch, Athens, Rome.

The decease of Moses was, as is so often the case, at once a penalty and a reward. Many a minister keeps tottering to his pulpit though his work was done years ago. God knew better when Moses's career was closed than he did himself. His death outside the land of promise was to mark his one wrong deed (Deut. 32:51), but it was also to remove him from the arduous campaigns upon which Caleb and Joshua were about to enter.

Verse 5—Moses, the ruler of men, was buried as the "servant of the Lord." But it is to be noted that wherever a true follower of the Lord closes his eyes for the last time, he dies, as did Wolfe on the plains of Abraham when Quebec was taken, satisfied because he knew the victory of his country's flag was assured. Some of the most helpful songs ever sung have been raised by martyrs at the stake.

Worship of God Leaves No Room for Worship of Graves

Verse 6—Thomas Fuller, one of the most celebrated divines of Cromwell's time, says that God not only buried Moses, but buried his grave. This was probably for the same reason God has never permitted men to discover (beyond controversy) the holy sepulcher. The worship of God leaves no room for the worship of graves.

Verse 7—A godly youth is the surest guaranty we can have of a ripe and vigorous old age.

"Though I look old, yet I am strong and lusty;
For in my youth I never did apply
Hot and rebellious liquors in my blood;
Nor did not with unbashful forehead woo
The means of weakness and debility;
Therefore my age is as a lusty winter,
Frosty, but kindly."

Verse 9—It is a difficult thing to succeed such a man as Moses. But Joshua was not one of those little souls forever irritated by the eulogies of their predecessors. He never aped Moses. He never envied Moses. He simply had his own work to do and he did it in a manly fashion, and God nobly rewarded him with a victory not permitted his heroic leader. Probably no one was more ready to acknowledge the superiority of Moses than he (v. 10), and yet he was a good second to the world's greatest man, the church's greatest prophet.

BY EDWARD ARTHUR WICHER

Week Beginning November 9, 1913

Topic—The drawnet. Matthew 13:47-48.

This parable is the companion of that of the tares. Not that the teaching is entirely identical, but it has a large extent of likeness to the other. Both parables point to the mottled character of the church in its membership, as it exists in this world. Both declare that the intermixture of the evil and the good is so inevitable, so complete as to make impossible of attainment any effort to separate them in this present life. Both show that the separation is destined to be accomplished at the end of the world.

But there is a distinct motive in each of the parables. In the tares the emphasis lies upon the impossibility of separating the evil from the good here and now. In the dragnet the emphasis falls upon the certainty of this separation being effected "at the end of the age." Whatever present conditions exist, the good will not always be mixed up with and thwarted by the evil. They shall be divided one from another, completely and finally; and each shall be consigned to its place.

We have then three points to consider. First, the kingdom of heaven is a net. Second, it gathers into it of every kind, both good and bad. Third, the separation is to be made at the end of the world.

The kingdom is a net. The nets of the Sea of Galilee were of two kinds. There was the small hand net, circular and leaded about the edge, which was thrown by a single fisherman standing knee-deep in the water. There was also the dragnet, or seine, which was let down from the boats into the sea. It is the later net that enters into the present parable. It could be used in either of two ways. It might be let down into the water and drawn together by two ends in a narrowing circle until it was finally gathered into the boat (Luke 5:4-9); or it might be drawn in a semicircle to the shore, where its contents were at length deposited upon the beach. The latter is the method of the fishermen of our parable.

We find in early youth that each new decision we make limits the possible range of all future decisions. Life is a progress of limitation. And the church, which in this respect is identical with the kingdom of God, is itself the chief limitation for every man who enters it. He has no longer the freedom of the world. He is forbidden to engage in many trades and kinds of business which the world holds to be perfectly legal, because he is a member of the church. He is separated from many comradeships which he might have had in the world outside. He is denied many pleasures and activities which the world does not refuse. He is shut up to certain practices of religion, certain rules of conduct, certain views of God and life and the human soul, certain obligations of service toward his fellow members. And with the passing of the years the net grows narrower and narrower. His conscience becomes more exacting and acute, his separation from the world more emphatic, his intercourse with his fellow believers more compelling.

There is of course another side to all of this. It is the true liberty which man gains in the apparent limitation of the church of Christ. But that teaching, while true and precious, is not included in the present parable. For the fish does not always rejoice to be taken in the net.

The net is drawn to land. Irresistibly, without haste and without cessation, with a steadily increasing insistence, the net is brought nearer to the shore. Soon shall we all be in that land whence no man ever returns.

The net gathers into itself fish of every kind, good and poisonous. It contains also seaweed, shells and refuse from the land or wrecks of the deep. There are jellyfish that are valueless; and big, ugly fish that prey on others. There may even be a devilfish or a stingray. In the company of the twelve there was a Judas Iscariot. In the apostolic church there were an Ananias and a Sapphira—and we know not how many more besides. There were men who desired to enjoy a reputation for generosity, while in their hearts they were deceitful and greedy. Such men endangered by their presence the very life of the early church. There was among the companions of Paul a Demas, who, having been taken into the inner secrets of the heart of the great apostle, afterwards refused the fellowship of his teacher and the indwelling Spirit of his Lord, and preferred the visible promotion and creature comfort of the world.

The church has always been of a sadly mixed composition. Sometimes the promiscuous crowd, gathered up out of the world, seems to have brought with it all the greed and vice of the world and to have lacked every grace of the kingdom. And again, the run has been of a different kind, and the catch has been made up of the good and generous and brave, of those who were able to contend valiantly against evil and at the same time preserve the sweetness of their own faith.

In the parable of the tares the servants might think of rooting out the tares from among the wheat; but no fisherman would ever dream of leaping into the sea in order to cast out the bad fish that are in the net from among the good. There is a proper time for the separation. It is when the net has been brought to the shore. Then the separation is certain, perfect and final.

But we must not press the parable too far. The work of separation is not effected by the men who have let down the nets, but by the angels of God, who, having a perfection of moral nature undimmed by any taint of sin, execute the bidding of their Lord.

We may flatter ourselves that all is well with us because we are in the church. We may forget that the judgment is still ahead of us. But no words could show us more conclusively than do these the insufficiency of being merely enrolled upon the list of members of the church. We must also be possessed of the inherent qualities of the kingdom, its goodness, soundness of soul and beauty of holiness. We must be possessed of those qualities that will make us serviceable in the life that is to come. Only the good can endure the test of the angels. Only the worthy can be preserved unto life eternal.

The full significance of the terrible words with which the Master closes this parable we cannot attempt to fathom here. They are the awful symbols of the anguish of a conscience that has been too long neglected, of the torment of sins unrepented of and unforgiven. The wicked shall be cast into the furnace of fire, where there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth.

The evil may here press closely upon the good and threaten its extinction; but it shall not forever be permitted to do so. The good shall be delivered from the burden of the presence of evil and set free unto holy uses. For into the kingdom in its final form there shall not enter anything that defileth, neither whatsoever maketh a lie; but only they that are enrolled in the Lamb's book of life.

TIGHTENING THE BATTLE LINES

Topic—Temperance facts and figures. I. Kings 20:1-21.

This has been a bad year for the friends of strong drink. In certain subtle, general ways that are powerful in shaping popular opinion they have been hard hit. The National Liquor Dealers' Journal in a lugubrious article on the present outlook laments: "The moral and religious forces of the nation are against the liquor business. Unify these forces in support of a definite policy, and the end is here."

In some parts of the land greasy, indigestible fried potatoes are a common item in the daily bill of fare in the small hotels. Evidently some persons like them. But the doctors advise against the use of them. Now, shall we have a campaign in behalf of every man's inalienable personal liberty to wreck his stomach with badly cooked potatoes? The suggestion is absurd. Everybody grants at once that a mere detail of food is not worth quarreling over; man has more important interests; he would not demean himself so. Then why should grown men agitate in behalf of a mere article of drink, even though they do like the taste of it? Doubtless some persons can eat fried potatoes without hurt to their digestion, even as some men drink liquor with no discernible ill results. But it is established beyond any man's denial that the net result of the drinking of liquor is injurious to mankind. Then why let a small matter of taste interfere with the public welfare? The principle of governmental supervision of food has been thoroughly established by the pure food laws; it would take but a slight extension of the same power to abolish in the interest of public health the manufacture, importation or sale of intoxicating liquors.

One form of temperance propaganda that will never grow old is the recruiting of pledge signers among the young. A "Lincoln-Lee Legion Pledge," celebrating two of the great total abstainers of the civil war period, is now being circulated by the Anti-Saloon League. The aim is to link the spirit of patriotism with that of total abstinence.

New forms of temperance literature are springing up day by day. The Philadelphia North American recently published an editorial, "Something's the Matter with Kansas," which was a most brilliant and unanswerable presentation of the success of prohibition in that state. It is now being circulated all over the land as a tract. Out in Iowa some member of the W. C. T. U. likewise produced a contribution to temperance arguments that is doing nationwide service. The Iowa Retail Liquor Dealers' Association had been welcomed to Cedar Rapids by the mayor. Scandalized, the good women issued a keen supplementary address to the convention, in which it analyzed the character of the business represented and why it was not welcome to the city. From every direction new weapons are pouring a deadly fire into the business of the saloons.

This is the era of statistics. Our scientific day demands exact data upon every given subject. Surveys and investigations are the rule. Hundreds of trained experts are at work in analyzing social, commercial and religious situations. The result is that a mass of accurate evidence, simply overwhelming in its character, is being massed against the saloon. From disinterested and irrefutable sources we are learning that the baleful effects of the saloon are more widely distributed than even the most earnest temperance advocate had imagined.

"John Barleycorn makes the trouble; Father Penn settles the bills." That is the conclusion reached by a Pennsylvania temperance circular, which reported that in 1911 the state had paid out for eleemosynary and penal institutions $7,693,968, more than 80 per cent of which is shown to have been made necessary by the ravages of intemperance. In exchange for this bill the saloons put $1,825,887 into the state treasury. That is to say, the liquor business does not even pay its own repair bills. Yet there be those who talk about the "revenue" to the state from liquor business!

The past year has been rich in revelations of the relations which exist between the liquor interest and the political parties. This menace to our legislatures, and especially to our judiciary, touches the basic patriotism of the people. Let a passion of pure and intelligent patriotism possess the hearts of the citizens, and the liquor traffic will quickly end.

Some Late Works in the Field of Fiction

The selection of fiction is perhaps the most difficult of all choices for the reader who seeks to give his attention only to what is worth while. The pages of this issue that are devoted to books of fiction provide, with the comments to be given in The Continent of Nov. 13, a practically complete conspectus of the readable novels of the season. All of the important publishers are represented, and all of the books named have received careful consideration by qualified reviewers of The Continent's staff. Therefore our readers may well value these pages as a comprehensive and trustworthy guide in their selections.

Outstanding Novels

Otherwise Phyllis, by Meredith Nicholson. Though it may be merely a matter of taste, one feels eager to say that this is Mr. Nicholson's best novel. It is, emphatically, to the reviewer; and for several reasons. In the first place Mr. Nicholson has chosen more interesting material than before; and in the second, the material is more elaborately embroidered with ideas. Since Mr. Nicholson voluntarily stopped being merely a best-seller he has become the kind of novelist who ought to be a best-seller if buyers were intelligent instead of sentimental. But to get to the story: Phyllis is an original, highly charming girl—oh, a genius of a girl!—who lives in an Indiana town (Crawfordsville in reality) and does such stunts as writing an essay on "The Dogs of Main Street" for a commencement address. Her various female relatives, whom she and her father always refer to irreverently as "one's aunts," are the pest of her life because they urge upon her a conventionality she doesn't know how to assume. But a deeper note comes into her life through her mother, who serves as one of the most interesting characters in the book. Lois had deserted Phyllis's father years before for another man; but she comes back after "Phil" has grown up and the two become the most adoring friends. There are readers who may have no use for Lois; they will call her "immoral." But Mr. Nicholson doesn't think so, and he paints her in strong contrast to the hypocritical aunts. She gives him his opportunity to inveigh against the shallowness and narrowness of the village gossips, though he keeps the whole issue free from the cheap modern tendency to sexual discussion. Altogether this is a story of manifold delights, fine in spirit, entertaining in situation and written with the zest that betrays the author's keen enjoyment of his own creation. Fortitude, by Hugh Walpole, is a book of splendid strength and significance. It is done with much care for workmanship and with a large understanding of the meaning of life, so proving doubly worth while. In itself the story is very simple: A small lad with an unhappy ancestry grows up through miserable home surroundings, experiences a bitter school life, spends his youth in dull labors; all this time his soul is alive to adventure, he knows a few choice spirits among men and he lives in the world of books and imaginings. He writes a book, too, which wins him much distinction, and fast on the heels of this success he wins the girl he has chosen, who is utterly unsuited to him. After a mad year of happiness a shadow comes between them; the girl cannot enter into his life and she demands that he leave his to come into hers; she mocks his writing and denies him his old friends. And then she flings him off and goes away, leaving him broken, desiring to do nothing but yield himself to the curse of his inheritance. But another woman saves him from himself and sends him back to a bigger life of usefulness. The latter part of the book is especially strong, where we come in touch with a sacrifice of almost inconceivable magnitude, yet the kind that hundreds of women are constantly making. Throughout, however, the book is marked by this same penetrating knowledge of humanity, so that it brings one continually into touch with real people and real human crises. It is a long story and rather slow reading, but it is well worth the time required. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.40 net.

The Joy of Youth, by Eden Phillpotts. It is difficult to imagine Mr. Phillpotts attempting anything further removed from his Dartmoor stories than his latest novel, which has art for its theme. But whatever disappointment one may feel at first with this change is quickly forgotten, for "The Joy of Youth" is a story of scholarly interests, revealing a wide grasp of present problems and profound thought on the vital issues of the day. The opening scene is in London, but the action is later transferred to Florence and its wealth of art treasures. The hero is a rather arrogant young artist, iconoclastic, egotistical, but splendidly enthusiastic. He has little patience with the trend of modern art, seeking his inspiration in the Greek; and he finds his ideal of feminine beauty in a charming English girl who "has hungered for all art meant," and whom he likens to Phryne. Complications arise through the girl's engagement to a young baron, whose ideas are absolutely at variance with those of the artist. This is a book rich in ideas, but its chief interest is found in its discussions of art and philosophy rather than in its story. The hero makes an efficacious plea for the survival of Greek traditions, but one wishes Mr. Phillpotts might have permitted him to do this without feeling impelled to attribute the beginning of art decadence to Christianity. [Little, Brown and Company, Boston. $1.30 net.

Westways, by Dr. S. Weir Mitchell, is not only a notable contribution to the fiction of the year but its clever and accurate delineations of men and events furnish as illuminating a commentary on the civil war period as did "Hugh Wynne" on that of the revolution. Westways is a little Pennsylvania village closely reflecting in the lives and changing opinions of its residents the sectional animosities of the times. Dr. Mitchell has discreetly refrained from permitting any of the great historic characters more than a brief appearance, but nevertheless has given vivid and intimate portraits of Lincoln, Grant and Stanton. The plot, which is too simple to protrude itself, calls into play the material generally used in civil war themes. Grey Pines, the Penhallow homestead, is the scene of the usual domestic tragedy arising from a difference of political sentiment. The most fascinating pages chronicle the youthful years of the young prig, John Penhallow, and the tomboyish Leila Gray. Clean and wholesome in sentiment, pure in tone and strong in ideals, this book can safely be placed in the hands of any young person and will be an acquisition to the library of any home. [Century Company, New York. $1.40 net.

Round the Corner, by Gilbert Cannan. Mr. Cannan attacks those who live life aimlessly and unthinkingly in a novel that contains much food for thought. "Life for modern men and women," he says, "is forever round the corner because they attempt to tackle their affairs with the minds of children—children who believe everything they are told and examine nothing. . . . Unfortunately life is a serious business which yields its reward of joy only to simplicity, sincerity and purity, or, if you like the old trinity better—faith, hope and charity." The novel built upon this platform is genuine, thoughtful, skillfully written; one's only quarrel with it is a rather vague discontent because a good deal of the author's charm —so conspicuous in "Peter Homunculus," for example—is missing. This will not be a popular book; there's too much of the polemic about it. But it's splendid stuff nevertheless. [D. Appleton and Company, New York. $1.35.

The Morning's War, by C. E. Montague. This romance's chief claim to consideration lies in its psychological features. The principal characters are two young Anglo-Irish people who fall in love with one another during a dangerous Alpine expedition. The hero, a journalist of the rather unconventional pagan type, is a man of intense vitality. The girl, however, is an introspective and somewhat narrow-minded Roman Catholic. Shortly after their betrothal he learns that he is the son of a Catholic priest who abjured his vows in order to marry the woman he loved. From this discovery arise the complications which lead up to the climax. It is an unusually well-written story, somewhat in the style of George Meredith, but lacking the finished artistry of that master of fiction. [Henry Holt and Company, New York. $1.35 net.

John Barleycorn, by Jack London, describes the author's experiences with the liquor problem in vigorous, interesting fashion that carries conviction to the reader. While the book is autobiographical and does considerable justice to the achievements of the author, it says a number of sane things that might serve temperance workers as forceful arguments, for a credible document of such frankness and sound sense with so personal a basis is rare. The alcoholic effects are arrived at through a narration of Jack London's life, showing how he was forced into contact with alcohol, though he felt no desire for it, and how it influenced his body and his mind, coming finally to have a mastership over him. He asserts that no normal person feels any alcoholic hunger, but that every live young person is forced into contact with it, through the demands of fellowship. Civilization which permits easy access to alcohol is accused of barbaric cruelty. Moreover the author expresses the opinion that when women have the vote they will straightway sweep out the liquor problem. The book is really a sort of vitalized tract and though some of it is not very appealing, it is a profitable thing to read. [Century Company, New York. $1.30 net.

Youth's Encounter, by Compton Mackenzie. The main interest in this fascinating romance of youth centers in the unfolding of an English boy's inner life and the development of his higher nature. From a lonely, imaginative chap he develops into a youth with high ideals, romantic fancies and a normal boy's healthy curiosity about the mysteries of life. The story of the awakening of his emotional nature is told with rare skill and sympathetic comprehension. Mr. Mackenzie deals with the verities of life in a straightforward manner; he mentions conditions—commonly existent—imperiling our youths, but there is nothing in the least objectionable or offensive in his book. It has been written for thoughtful men and women by one who is pleading for a higher, cleaner and purer moral standard. "Youth's Encounter" lays claim to our consideration not only because of unusual literary merit, but as a psychological study of the problems of youth it will especially appeal to every adult interested in the adolescent boy. [D. Appleton and Company, New York. $1.35 net.

The Way of Ambition, by Robert Hichens, is one of the most significantly interesting things Mr. Hichens has done lately. The theme is not new, being simply a variation of the old axiom that the artist, if he is to achieve, must serve his own gods and not follow false ones; but the manner of its working out is elaborately engrossing. Perhaps this is because the scenes shift from London to Algeria and New York, giving Mr. Hichens a glorious opportunity of contrasting his beloved East with a Western world about which he's enthusiastic; or perhaps it's simply a matter of method, proving again that this author, in spite of a lapse or two into the commonplace in less well-done stories, has at his finger tips the art of writing dialogue that's singularly vital and absorbing. Claude Heath, composer, has a talent for setting to music such poems as "The Hound of Heaven," which he allows to be distorted by an ambitious wife into an attempt at opera. It takes a big failure to make him attain a real selfhood, but he does it. [Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. $1.35.

Inspirational

Laddie: A True Blue Story, by Gene Stratton-Porter. There's no use pretending that "Laddie" is literature. It isn't; but to those hosts of readers who have helped it in becoming so extravagantly popular it has qualities that count more than mere literary ones. They seem to be right about it, too, for it's a really beautiful story. Laddie is one of the handsomest, cheerfulest, strongest youths who ever graced a book, and he falls in love with a fairy princess in the enchanted woods back of the farm. His little sister, who tells the story so deliciously, helps him to win her; for the princess's father makes difficulties, and though Laddie is audacious enough to break into Galahad's Castle of the Maidens he's not averse to letting "little sister" use some of her own magic. Indeed "little sister" is as well worth knowing as her brother, and some people think more so. No reader of sophistication will open the book without a keen interest in discovering the secret of its wide appeal, and he will close it convinced that it's not exclusively a matter of sentiment, humor, delicate optimism or the nature element that pervades all of Mrs. Stratton-Porter's stories, but a combination of all these qualities woven into a philosophy whose keynote is: "God's in his heaven, all's right with the world." [Doubleday, Page and Company, New York. $1.35 net.

The Jackknife Man, by Ellis Parker Butler, reveals that jovial humorist in a modified light; for in this charming story, with all its frolicsome fun, he runs a deeper note always full of tenderness and sometimes running into pathos that almost stings one to tears. The story is about those two most pathetic things in the world—a kindly, cheery, homeless little old bachelor and a motherless little boy, who start off an impromptu family on an old shanty boat. Peter Lane squeezes out a living by doing odd jobs and between times whittling out utensils with his jackknife. He makes a most entertaining companion and the small boy whom he adopts is an unusually successful small boy. This is a sweet, human bit of fiction that anyone will feel the fresher and happier for having read. [Century Company, New York. $1.25.

The Ffolliotts of Redmarley, by L. Allen Harker. Those who enjoy stories founded on the everyday doings of a delightful family will read every page of this novel of English country life with keen pleasure. It is largely concerned with the career of a tradesman's son and shows him coming into close touch with the Ffolliotts, a family of aristocrats whom he discovers to be simple, unfailingly courteous and considerate of others. The most delightful feature of the book is the description of the home life of this family, which, despite a disagreeable father, is kept bright and cheerful through the efforts of a mother who is all the name implies. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $1.25 net.

The Taste of Apples, by Jennette Lee, chronicles the experiences of a lovable old shoemaker and his wife bidden to go abroad by their son in order that they might have the vacation which they would never take themselves. Their life in London, where they set up housekeeping for a time, and all the strange "foreign" things they come in contact with provide the theme of the narrative, which is pleasant in its effect, but not comparable with the charm of the "Uncle William" stories the author once gave us. [Dodd, Mead and Company, New York. $1.25 net.

Aunt Olive in Bohemia, by Leslie Moore, radiates a sunny, wholesome atmosphere, though it is made up of too many plot threads for any effect of unity. Aunt Olive lived for many years a starved existence, but when she was quite an elderly woman was freed from restraint and given a liberal fortune. Always desirous of painting, she determined at least to have a studio, so she rented one in a building where six artists lived and immediately became enmeshed in their various life problems, helping them all out of difficulties—chiefly romantic ones—with the ready lubricants of money and sympathy. It is a pleasant story of "Bohemia," fairly well told, and no one need hesitate about putting it into the hands of young people. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.25.

My Lady of the Chimney Corner, by Alexander Irvine, author of "From the Bottom Up," cannot be too warmly recommended. It is the author's beautiful tribute to his mother, an Irish peasant woman of fine personality, relating the character of her life, its disappointments and hardships and the spirit in which she met them. As Mr. Irvine says, the family lived in the "social subcellar," so poverty and hardships were the absorbing features of life; yet the mother, who came voluntarily into this by marrying a poor man because she loved him, never regretted her choice, never grew bitter, but always saved any situation by her sunny humor and her strong philosophy. The book is beautiful. [Century Company, New York. $1.20 net.

David Malcolm, by Nelson Lloyd, makes a quiet but very interesting study in the development of personality, starting with the hero as a small boy on his first fishing trip. The author has made a minutely analytical study of the emotions and ideas that gradually unfold in the process of maturing consciousness and his study possesses a vital quality that gives it value. To follow David through his boyhood, his education, his foolish engagement and his final happy marriage is an interesting experience. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $1.35 net.

Happy-Go-Lucky, by Ian Hay, refreshes the reader with as sprightly a tale of merry love-making as has been written for a long time. It is a thoroughly sweet and wholesome adventure in romance, with a smile on nearly every page, and it recounts the experiences of a genial, quixotic young man, his managing mother, his managed father, the various girls his mother led out, and the plucky little dress designer he won for himself over his mother's head. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1.25 net.

A Garden of Spices, by A. Keith Fraser, is a tender story full of subdued charm about a little girl who has very few to understand her. She is constantly in the care of a dragonlike nurse person who knows nothing about children and has implicit faith in Solomon's adage concerning the rod. There is dream mother who is always with the child, but she finds it a very big and difficult world. It is a touchingly exquisite little book. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.25 net.

Simpson, by Elinor Mordaunt, is a genuine love story. It opens at a bachelor club, where desperate efforts are being made to escape the women, and it concludes with the happy marriage of every bachelor. The club had an important use, however, for it took the men out of the artificial city surroundings and in the more normal country life set their warped visions straight, restoring them to a wholesome attitude toward life. The characters are developed with a great deal of individuality and there is much strength and insight shown in the treatment of the different love themes. Humor flourishes and common sense, and there is a place of pathos that stands out like a star. It is really a most satisfying and enjoyable story—wholesome and fine and true as life and quite unhackneyed. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1.35 net.

Because of Jane, by J. E. Buckrose, disappoints when one knows what exquisite work the author is capable of. It is a crude and hurried story of a little girl who held an important thread in weaving the life fabric of her father and mother, her maiden aunt and the aunt's lover. The very ordinary plot moves along to the finish without arousing much sympathy in the reader who remembers those delightful books, "Down Our Street" and "Love in a Little Town." [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.25 net.

The Golden Road, by L. M. Montgomery, continues the delightful experiences of "The Story Girl." In this volume the young people spend a happy year together before the Story Girl joins her father in Europe, and many a jolly, laughable time do they have, making a magazine, celebrating holidays, entertaining visitors, with a constant play of clever, natural talk that keeps the reader on the qui vive in sympathetic enjoyment of their young spirits. [L. C. Page Company, Boston. $1.25 net.

The Supplanter, by Grace Duffie Boylan, is a somewhat unique story dealing with the love and devotion of a stranger, a professional nurse, for a child which she helps bring into the world and which, owing to peculiar circumstances, she must needs mother. She gives her life to the bringing up of "her child" and finds her reward in his fine development as well as in the love he bears her. [Lothrop, Lee and Shepard Company, Boston. $1.25 net.

Romance, Adventure, Mystery

The Iron Trail, by Rex Beach, is a red-blooded story of struggle and achievement in Alaska. A man of parts sets out in the face of every obstacle—grinding glaciers, rough mountains, lack of money, trust opposition and scoundrelly underhanded warfare—to build a railway to open up Alaska. He has brains and courage and loyal helpers and the tale of his winning fight is one that stirs the blood and sets one's nerves atingle. The characters have a charm of individuality, the details of the plot have an unhackneyed strength, and there is such a quantity of rugged spontaneous humor and bulldog purpose that the book proves a healthy stimulant. [Harper and Brothers, New York. $1.35 net.

Gold, by Stewart Edward White, is a story of the '49-ers and the rush to the gold fields of California in which some young fellows from the East took part. Mr. White has done a remarkable piece of work in bringing up to present-day understanding those long-ago scenes and thrills and excitements and reproducing them with a vividness and truth of detail which show exhaustive study and research. Special interest attaches itself to the book at this time, since the young gold-seekers took the Panama route to California. The isthmus of those days and the "canal zone" of today present a striking contrast. [Doubleday, Page and Company, New York. $1.35.

The Honourable Mr. Tawnish, by Jeffery Farnol. A spirited romance of the eighteenth century with a winsome maid, persistent lover, irascible father and two of his cronies for the chief characters. The situations are cleverly planned, there is an abundance of action and it is written in Mr. Farnol's characteristically romantic style. [Little, Brown and Company, Boston. $1 net.

The Lady and the Pirate, by Emerson Hough, reveals that author in a quite new light—in a jolly, rollicking, youthful, adventurous light that will give great joy to many readers. For this is the whimsical tale of a grown-up man boy enough at heart to go a-pirating with two small boys, in the truest pirate fashion that ever boys devised. The adventure grows beyond mere play piracy, too, when these bold buccaneers carry off a private yacht steaming down the Mississippi, ignoring all irate protests from the captured "lady fair" and her stern aunt. That the yacht was the man's own, that the girl was his sweetheart and aunt to one of the villainous young pirates only adds to the delightful irony. Much cleverness, much romance and much of the spirit of boyhood make this very delectable reading. [Bobbs-Merrill, Indianapolis. $1.25 net.

The Law-Bringers, by G. B. Lancaster. The wilds of the Canadian Northwest provide the background for this story, with two of its mounted police, a half-breed Indian girl and a magnificent type of loyal Christian womanhood for the chief characters. They are depicted in a series of dramatic situations which have in them a big throb of primitiveness. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.35.

The Heart of the Desert, by Honore Willsie, is laid in Arizona. Rhoda Tuttle, a beautiful invalid, wins the love of Charley Cartwell, Yale man, civil engineer, but Indian and known as Kut-le. Kut-le determines to cure and win her, so he kidnaps Rhoda and flies with her to the desert. The story of their wanderings is fascinating; unconsciously she succumbs to the spell of the desert, and with recovered health finds that her loathing of her captor has turned to love. Mrs. Willsie knows the desert thoroughly and to read her description is the next best thing to hearing her talk of her wonderful experiences there. [Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. $1.25 net.

JENNETTE LEE, Author of "The Taste of Apples"

The Unafraid, by Eleanor M. Ingram. Montenegro provides the setting for this romance of modern life, the chief characters being two noblemen of that country, an American heiress and an automobile agent from New York. It abounds in political intrigue and sheds enough blood to satisfy the most sanguinary. [J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia. $1.25 net.

The Outlaw, by David Hennessey. Australia during the '40s—in the days of convict labor when the country was infested with bushrangers—furnishes a rich field for the adventure writer. Much of this material has been skillfully used, but the author fails to make his hero convincing and paints outlawry in rather too alluring colors. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.25 net.

The Remarkable Adventures of Christopher Poe, by Robert Carlton Brown, introduces a new detective person who has wonderful power of detecting any kind of crime anywhere. The crimes in this book have to do with money in various forms, for Mr. Poe is a bank detective. [F. G. Browne and Company, Chicago. $1.25 net.

His Great Adventure, by Robert Herrick, must call forth what has already come to be a bromidiom—that it is "so strange" to find Mr. Herrick writing an adventure story. It is strange, truly, to discover no analyses of "ye women" and no solutions of matrimonial tangles; and Mr. Herrick's great adventure of doing a completely different thing is not hilariously successful. Arizona, New York and Europe are included in the scene shiftings, and the action ranges from ranching to theatrical productions. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.35 net.

Aladdin from Broadway, by Frederic S. Isham, is based on the system of divorce outlined by the Koran—where a man may dispose of his wife by saying to her three times before witnesses, "I divorce you," and may not take her back until she has been married and divorced again in the same way. The hero involved in this situation is an American adventuring in the Orient; the "Oriental" heroine is discovered to be English and of course they fall deeply in love. It's a wild story, but really makes interesting reading of its sort. [Bobbs-Merrill Company, Indianapolis. $1.25 net.

The Sea Captain, by H. C. Bailey. The son of a Saxon swineherd becomes lord of the manor through a series of dazzling deeds of bravado, in which he shows himself a robber with a nice moral discrimination, a lover with a deep sense of devotion and a brave man who comes back from his rollicking high sea adventures to claim the girl he loves. It is a lively, well-told romance that will freshen the problem-jaded reader. George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.25 net.

Susette, by Dion Clayton Calthrop. A rather inane romance, woven around a series of poorly-conceived episodes of which a young English nobleman is the hero. While yachting he is shipwrecked on a South sea island and rescued by its only inhabitants, a gallant old Frenchman and his beautiful daughter. [Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. $1.25 net.

Prescott of Saskatchewan, by Harold Bindloss, recounts the adventures of a young ranchman in Canada who impersonates an English friend in difficulties and is later suspected of of this friend's murder. But the friend appears at the psychological moment, saving the hero's reputation and romance. [Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. $1.30 net.

The Gringos, by B. M. Bower. An adventure story of California in '49 in the days of the vigilantes, when the Americans (gringos) first began squatting on the Spanish holdings. The spirit of the times is very well suggested, but the plot elements are scattered and poorly developed. [Little, Brown and Company, Boston. $1.25 net.

Diamond Cut Diamond, by Jane Bunker, narrates a conservative old maid's stirring adventure among a band of swindlers and thieves. The plot is worked out in interesting and unusual fashion and offers thrills in plenty for the lover of mysteries. [Bobbs-Merrill Company, Indianapolis. $1.25 net.

The Red Colonel, by George Edgar, is a tale of modern adventure enacted in London and the rural village of Missingham, the dramatis personæ being all sorts and conditions of men. The mystery element is well worked out. [D. Appleton Company, New York. $1.30.

Vital Social Problems

The Main Road, by Maude Radford Warren, deals with many of the vital questions of the day, including the labor problem, social issues and the feminist movement. The heroine is a sentimental young person whose knowledge of life has been acquired largely from novels. Her awakening comes through a misplaced love, which arouses her to consciousness of the pain and suffering all about her. Deciding to devote herself to the service of others, she takes up her residence in a model tenement in Chicago's west side settlement district. There she is brought into contact with the great elemental facts of existence, and learns that life demands more of us than personal pleasure. It is by far the best work Mrs. Warren has yet done, revealing a finer perception and keener insight into the facts of life. [Harper and Brothers, New York. $1.35 net.

The Friendly Enemy, by T. P. Cameron Wilson, is a vivid portrayal of life in London's great East End. It tells of poverty and misery, crime and degeneration; but through it all is felt the blind, instinctive groping after better things; an inarticulate effort to learn the secret of life, to know its purpose and meaning. The story's chief claim to distinction is the author's unbiased attitude on the social problem. Mr. Wilson's keen penetration has led him to a logical analysis of conditions, his ready sympathy enabling him to see in all mankind the divine spark that unites humanity in a bond of brotherhood. The book has been written with the zeal of the humanitarian and reformer, though it does not possess the qualities which win popularity. But it is well worth the reading and reveals powers that give promise of better and stronger work. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $1.25 net.

Amanda of the Mill, by Marie Van Vorst, depicts the evils of child labor and mill work in the great cotton mills of the south. These evils are not alone of overwork and poor pay; they extend into wretched housing conditions, the deadening of personality and moral wreckage due to such conditions and also to the power the overseers hold in regard to the girls. The opening chapters show two mountain girls of innate refinement and charm who are later transplanted to the mill town, ignorant of the conditions they are to face. It is a vivid story of unwholesome conditions which we sometimes forget about in our anxiety over tenements, foreigners and so on. [Bobbs-Merrill Company, Indianapolis. $1.35 net.

Rue and Roses, by Angela Langer, will appeal to all women, especially the unmarried wage earner. It tells the story of a German girl of refined instincts who is early compelled to become self-supporting; but the problems she meets, her trials and mistakes are such as might readily come within the experience of any woman who is earning her living. There is just enough romance to save the story from becoming gray and sordid, and it may be read with profit by the well-poised as well as the discouraged, dissatisfied or selfish young woman. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.20 net.

The New Man, by Jane Stone. This romance of present-day life in New York simply serves as a medium for a discussion of white slavery and the social evil, treating the subject frankly but not sensationally. The book can lay claim to no special literary value, however. [Thomas Y. Crowell and Company, New York. 75 cents net.

The Call of the Hills, by Marshall Benjamin Van Leer, is laid in the mountains of Missouri and tells of a young man who, compelled to give up his college course, became a rural school teacher in the Ozarks. His courage and fearlessness no less than his learning won him the respect of the community, where he exercised a highly beneficent influence. The plot, characterization and style are commonplace, but are in a way redeemed by the story's big lesson, that God's purpose is not always ours. [Jennings and Graham, Cincinnati. $1.

Stories of Law and Finance

The Thirteenth Juror, by Frederick Trevor Hill. It is seldom that a book primarily designed to deliver a message affords its readers as many good laughs as are to be found here. The fact that Mr. Hill has for twenty-three years been a member of the New York bar enables him to write authoritatively on the subject of "the thirteenth juror." Although he treats the subject in a humorous and somewhat satirical vein, he never misses the bull's-eye, and he shows very clearly how the law, designed to protect the innocent, is too often diverted to safeguard the interests of the unscrupulous. His book is a tract with a message to every thoughtful citizen and it's far too interesting a story to miss. [Century Company, New York. $1.20.

Merrilie Dawes, by Frank H. Spearman. A young engineer from the Middle West, who has accumulated a fortune through railroad speculations, is caught in a Wall street panic. Unknown to him, Merrilie Dawes expends her vast fortune in an effort to save him from bankruptcy. For a time both think themselves penniless, but when her affairs are adjusted she finds she has more than doubled her fortune. The love motif is complicated by his engagement to a foster cousin of Merrilie, who accepts his release at the time of his failure. The first part of the story lacks interest, but the climax, coming in the financial struggle, is done with vividness and strength. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $1.35.

The Whistling Man, by Maximilian Foster. Here is a story full of incident, but inconsistent as to development and weak in characterization. The central field of action is Wall street and the principal character one Leonard Craig, the son of a former New York banker, who some twenty years before had been unjustly involved in an embezzlement case. The plot reveals latent possibilities that give promise of stronger and better work from Mr. Foster, whose stories are always clean, wholesome and entertaining. [D. Appleton and Company, New York. $1.30 net.

Wallingford and Blackie Daw, by George Randolph Chester. We believe we are not alone in the desire that Mr. Chester turn his talents to better use than the writing of more Wallingford stories. The latter gentleman's audacious business escapades no longer cause us to marvel at his craftiness and temerity. [Bobbs-Merrill Company, Indianapolis. $1.

Orientalism

Marama, by Ralph Stock, has for heroine the daughter of a low grade white man and a high grade Fiji woman, a half caste with the coloring and outer racial characteristics of her father and the temperament of her mother. Not knowing her heritage, she returns to her home island from a girls' boarding school in England to discover that her home is a hovel, her father a driveling idot, her sister a low type of native. The development from this point has a big interest. [Little, Brown and Company, Boston. $1.25 net.

The Lady Elect, by Norman Hinsdall Pitman. A Chinese romance in which the escapades of a revolutionary young hero, Ching Li, and the girl he loves furnish some thrilling reading. But the interesting thing about the book is that it is essentially Chinese; there are no white characters in it, not even any missionaries; and the author knows the Chinaman thoroughly. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1.25 net.

Toya, the Unlike, by Eleanor Mercein Kelly. Toya is a little Japanese girl whose father, an American artist, was disinherited by his wealthy father upon his marriage to a Japanese geisha girl. After her parents die Toya is taken to America. She has a difficult time growing up and being educated, but she's a dear to read about. [Small, Maynard and Company, Boston. $1 net.

The Romance of Ali, by Eleanor Stuart, has a curious and refreshing atmosphere of transplanted Orientalism. An English lad, born in Arabia and left an orphan, brought up in the Oriental king's harem, is rescued at 18 and taken back to European civilization. The story is concerned with this great change in his life, and is clean-cut, rich in consistent atmosphere, pleasantly written and thoroughly wholesome. [Harper and Brothers, New York. $1.25 net.

Fatima, by Rowland Thomas. It has been many a day since we have read a story possessing the fascinating charm, imaginative power and poetic fancy to be found in this pretty tale of the East. Written in the allegorical style befitting an Oriental setting, relieved here and there by flashes of wit and satire, it is as alluring as Fatima, who was "dark of eye, satiny of skin and plumply slender, and oh! so beautiful." This pretty little widow of 16 required a large field in which to display her charms, so she went to Cairo, where she had many strange adventures and incidentally learned life's great lesson—the wisdom of being satsified with her own lot. Village Characters

Squire Phin, by Holman Day. A happily humorous "down east" story where village types with their quaint matter-of-factness, their alert interest in everybody's affairs and their constant shrewd comments thereon keep the reader chuckling continually. Squire Phin is the kindly old lawyer who straightens out all the financial, marital and temperamental tangles of the villagers, ably assisted by his strenuous brother Hiram, a retired showman, who comes back to his old home with his circus elephant. Altogether a very readable book of a sympathetic, humorous type. [Harper and Brothers, New York. $1.25 net.

A Little Green World, by J. E. Buckrose, pictures a simple, charming village romance in its building and flowering, well seasoned with that refreshing philosophy of which Mrs. Buckrose is a master. The book is not particularly original, but it is wholesomely sweet, handling human little themes of which so many people never tire in a happily sympathetic way. [G. P. THAT COLLEGE OF OURS

Being the Story, in Part, of a Kansas Contribution to World Betterment—the School at Emporia

BY WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE

Looking Toward Stuart Hall

We went to Emporia to write about what we saw there. Now, no one goes to Emporia without wanting to meet William Allen White, and no one on our errand could have gone away without discovering the famous journalist's enthusiasm for the College of Emporia—not a mere local-pride enthusiasm, but a feeling based on his keen observation of the ideals of the institution and its service to Christian America and a Christian world. No interview with Mr. White could have expressed this feeling adequately, so we persuaded him to put aside other important articles and prepare this. An Emporia man remarked, "William Allen White works more purposefully at practical Christian things than any other man I know," and in such a spirit this article has been written.
O. R. W.

A YEAR AGO THEODORE ROOSEVELT was driving behind a good old family horse around the town of Emporia talking to a friend about the advantages of life in a small country town. They passed the buildings of the College of Emporia, four in number, and Colonel Roosevelt said:

"Now, what is the use of a college like that? My idea is that these small colleges are mistakes. What excuse has this one for competing with the state university and the colleges of the East?"

To which the friend spoke up and made reply:

The Answer to Colonel Roosevelt

"Two or three hundred boys and girls from Kansas go to this school every year. If they did not go to this school most of them would not go to any school, for it is near to the homes of their parents, it is under the auspices of the church which their parents trust and believe in, and after these boys and girls have graduated from this school they have received such intellectual stimulus and such moral purpose that they are not satisfied to live useless, humdrum lives. The alumni record of the college shows that nearly 75 per cent of the College of Emporia graduates either go immediately into some social service work like preaching or missionary work, or they go to other schools for broader equipment and higher education and then enter the field of social service.

"This school is a tower of moral strength in this community and in this state," continued the friend of the colonel, "and while I believe in the regulation and control and perhaps the encouragement of monopoly in business, I am satisfied that in education the monopoly theory is wrong. I am convinced that the small college, the college that you easterners call the 'fresh water' college, is throwing its weight into the social and intellectual world with more efficiency according to its size than larger ones."

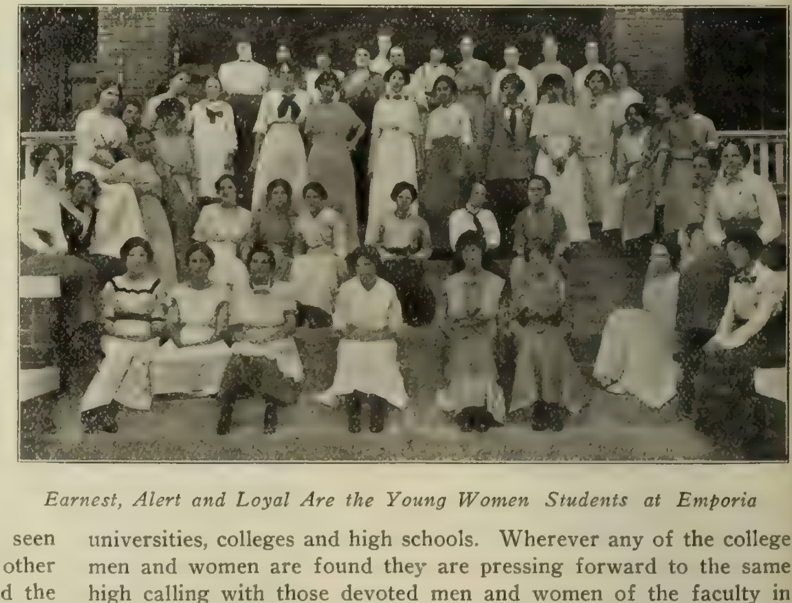
It so happened that one year after Colonel Roosevelt had seen the College of Emporia the Kansas Presbyterian Synod, with other representative Presbyterians, numbering in all 500 men, visited the College of Emporia and sat down to a banquet in its new gymnasium. At the synod meeting resolutions were adopted by which the whole educational support of the synod is to be concentrated upon the College of Emporia. Every church in the synod is urged to give at least an average of 50 cents per member to this cause. According to the report of the Presbyterian College Board this college has been more successful than any other Presbyterian college in the United States in securing gifts from the average sized churches and average givers of its own state.

This gives the College of Emporia the backing of the Presbyterians of the state. Last year the town of Emporia raised $75,000 for the College of Emporia and the money was put into a gymnasium and a girls' dormitory and endowment. This year the contract is let for a science hall and the money is in the bank to pay for it, and also a heating plant is under contract, which indicates that the support of the College of Emporia from Kansas and Kansas people is hearty and practical. It has proved its worth and in so far as the state has money to show its appreciation of that work, the people of Kansas are giving it. Presbyterian churches of Kansas contribute nearly $30,000 every year to the maintenance of the college, and the faculty salaries rank well with those of any other institution in the state, which means that the very best Christian men and women who can be employed are gathered into the faculty of this college. Their personal influence and their intellectual and moral guidance are a considerable part of the thing called education as it applies to the graduates and students of this school.

Students with Higher Aims than Money-Making

For nearly thirty years I have known the College of Emporia and always it has gathered about it as a faculty men and women of deep purpose, unusual mental and moral grasp and of profound and abiding faith. Time was when the College of Emporia had but one building and the faculty was from one to two and three years behind in salary. There was a time when the college did not have money to buy coal and the credit of the college at the stores and banks was bad, and yet so deep was the faith and devotion of the faculty that they stayed on, kept the college doors open and graduated their classes and let their light shine in the world. The example of such men and women made its deep impression on the young people, and so we find the graduates of the college, in greater numbers perhaps than of any other institution in the West, foregoing money-making pursuits and entering lives of devotion and consecration to great causes.

Forty-three per cent of the boys who have graduated from the College of Emporia are in the ministry or missionary service, and 32 per cent of all the graduates, men and women, are teachers in universities, colleges and high schools. Wherever any of the college men and women are found they are pressing forward to the same high calling with those devoted men and women of the faculty in the '80s and '90s whom they knew when they were youths in their plastic days. That is why the College of Emporia is built not of brick and mortar. That is why its men and women go out into the world with an equipment worth more than all the new fads and isms that education could give them, and that is why the Synod of Kansas and the people of this community believe in the college and with all their ability demonstrate their faith by their works.



Earnest, Alert and Loyal Are the Young Women Students at Emporia

Not Dwarfed by Large State Schools

In Emporia besides the college stands the state normal school, an institution that has over 2,000 students, yet there is in the student body of the college a spirit that has made them for years the victors in all sorts of intercollegiate games over that larger student body. In football, baseball and basketball the 200 college students have defeated the 2,000 normal students. There is something in the atmosphere of the college, something fine and beautiful that escapes definition, yet which persists year after year, something which is not muscle and brawn, something which may be called the evidence of things not seen but the substance of things hoped for, that makes these college boys and girls as undergraduates and graduates strong, effective and purposeful, something that makes them aim straight but at the same time aim high.

Kansas has just come through a hard year, in which there has been a failure of one of her principal crops. The failure of corn means a shortage of feed for cattle, and cattle is the main industry of Kansas, and so it is almost impossible for Kansas people to maintain their average of generosity toward those institutions which depend for their maintenance and growth upon private munificence. The state institutions—the Kansas University, the Agricultural College and the state normal school—are running on appropriations made a year ago, so they do not feel the hard times as a school like the College of Emporia must feel them.

Time to Go Forward—or Backward

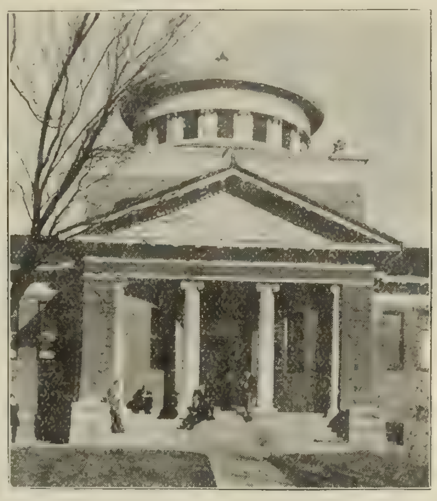
Now it so happens that with six buildings, either on the campus or under contract, and with a constantly growing student body, the college has met a crisis at this peculiar time. While it has few debts and its buildings are all paid for and it has a fairly good maintenance fund, it lacks endowment. Heretofore the scholarship has been of the very best and its standing now is of the highest. The college is one of the nineteen Kansas colleges and universities which are fully accredited by the State Board of Education. It is one of only four Kansas colleges and universities which are on the fully accredited list of the North Central Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools. Last year one College of Emporia student won the Rhodes scholarship for Kansas and another won the state oratorical contest.

Notwithstanding this actual educational efficiency, the college is facing the demand of the North Central Association, the State Board of Education, the Presbyterian College Board and all the other standardizing and classifying agencies, that its endowment be raised from $100,000 to $200,000 because this sum is a requirement for all colleges which are ranked in the first class and fully accredited, so that their degrees and credits are transferable everywhere. This the College of Emporia can hardly hope to raise from Kansas people now. The members of the Kansas Synod are nobly hoping to do what they can. They raised about $20,000 in a few minutes during synod and it is hoped that this sum will be materially increased.

Here is this institution built upon the sacrifices of thirty years endangered for the lack of money, for unless the high educational rating of the College of Emporia can be maintained it cannot draw the ambitious boys and girls which its supporters desire to train for Christian service and moral leadership. These boys and girls know that life today requires a broad equipment, hence many of them go to professional schools and universities for special work which cannot be done at the College of Emporia; but on the other hand the larger school cannot give what the College of Emporia can in character building. Under the leadership of the heroically fine-spirited president, Dr. Henry Coe Culbertson, the institution has been brought within sight of a "promised land" of even greater usefulness. The College of Emporia should not lose what it has so splendidly won.

No Question as to Value of Investments

I know of no other place where a dollar invested in the cause of righteousness will yield such large returns as it does in the College of Emporia. We Emporia people have put our money in and seen it yield ten and a hundred fold in the things that go to make life better, broader and deeper. We Kansas people have done the same thing, but it happens that the need now is greater than our ability to serve, and the need is critical, with time a large element in the equation.



The Charming Library Is a Popular Resort for the Students

The alumni records of the College of Emporia afford some facts of exceptional interest. The distinctive Christian character is illustrated by the evidence that 43 per cent of its men graduates have devoted their lives to religious work: Ministers, 52; missionaries, 16; theological students, 7; Y. M. C. A. secretaries, 7.

Others of the 190 men who received their training or inspiration at Emporia are engaged as follows:

College and university professors	17
High school principals and teachers	23
Doctors and medical students	12
Lawyers and law students	11
Forestry service	5
Other professions	9
Business	20
Farming	11

The 146 women graduates are employed in life as follows: Teachers, 65; wives of ministers and missionaries, 15; other home makers, 66.

What the influence of such a body of men and women may be no one can measure; but it must mean much to America and to the world.

Plenty of Brawn, but No Lack of Brains and Purpose

MISSIONARY WORK

An Appropriate Day to Pray for Islam

This year the great Moslem feast of Bairam falls on Sunday, Nov. 9. This is the most important and universal of all the religious festivals prescribed by the Moslem faith. Those who are on pilgrimage to Mecca celebrate it most elaborately, but no Moslem community anywhere in the world overlooks it. It is at least as significant as Christmas is to Christians. It is supposed to commemorate the deliverance of Isaac from being sacrificed by his father, and accordingly takes on a character of great jubilation and delight.

Since this year this outstanding day for the Moslems coincides with the Christian Sabbath, it is proposed by Dr. Zwemer of Cairo, and his associates on the executive committee representing Christian workers among the Mohammedans, that the date should be made an occasion of especial intercession in all Christian churches throughout the English speaking world, for the conversion of the Mohammedans. Assuredly it is singularly appropriate that the Moslem world should be remembered at the throne of grace on a day when it is itself seeking to approach divinity through the most sacred religious rites that it knows.

Particularly prayer is besought in this intercession for the Albanians, a people numbering two million souls, who are by a vast majority nominally adherents of the prophet of Islam. But many of them feel that Mohammedanism has been imposed upon them by the authority of the Turk, and being now free from Turkish domination, it is to be expected that many of them will turn speedily to Christianity. Prayer should be offered therefore that they may choose a form of Christianity which has in it vital power of godliness. Prayer is also asked that God may be pleased to turn back, by adequate forces which he may raise up, the enormous tide of Mohammedanism which is engulfing central Africa.

The points where Moslem missionary work is today most encouraging are Persia and India. There has been a wonderful influx of Moslem pupils into the higher mission schools in Persia, and in some places these young people are being taught by former Mohammedans who have embraced Christianity in India and have come to Persia as mission workers. Contact with these examples who have shaken off the supposedly invincible yoke of Islam cannot fail to be impressive to the Persian youths under their influence, and a very remarkable consecration of Persian young manhood to the cause of Christ is reasonably anticipated. In India the danger of persecution for a Moslem who becomes Christian has completely disappeared, and not a few heretofore too timid to make the change are now proclaiming their allegiance to Christ. All in all, it may fairly be said that though Islam is more aggressive than it has been at any time since the old days when it was propagated by fire and sword, nevertheless it is weaker than it ever was before, since the fading out of its ancient truculence has removed the spell of its terror from many who have been held subservient to it only by force of political tyranny or the bigoted prejudice of their neighbors.

It is suggested that Americans ought most keenly and quickly of all to respond to the summons for intercession, since practically all the mission work which is being done anywhere in the world for Moslems is carried on now by representatives of the American churches. The principal exceptions to this are in China. In Turkey, in Bulgaria and Albania it is the American Congregationalists who conduct missions to the Moslems; in Syria and Persia, the American Presbyterians; in Egypt, the American United Presbyterians, and in India the American Presbyterians, United Presbyterians and Methodists.

Refuges for Defenseless in Nanking

Rev. John E. Williams, vice president of the University of Nanking, who has returned from the United States to direct the university while President Bowen is on furlough at home, writes that in the early part of the autumn the work of the university has been much demoralized and the work of the different evangelical missions in the city practically suspended on account of the terrors of the recent siege and subsequent events. The revolting southern army within Nanking was obliged to surrender on the first of November to General Chang Hsuin, representing the government at Peking. General Chang in the service of the Manchus had unsuccessfully tried to defend Nanking from the revolutionists soon after the outbreak of the republican revolution in 1911, and this victory, in which many patriots succumbed to him to whom he had succumbed two years ago, was in the nature of a great personal triumph.

Nevertheless Chang, entering Nanking, immediately proclaimed that he would not suffer a single citizen to be robbed of property nor any person injured. But this brave promise went sadly unfulfilled, for his troops were no sooner inside the city than they subjected Nanking to such a reign of terror as has scarcely been seen before even in China's bloody history. For a whole week, without let or hindrance, the soldiers went carousing through the town, robbing not only all the shops and the homes of wealth, but even the hovels of the poor. Any who opposed them were killed without mercy. So horrified were the people by this savage onslaught that for weeks after they did not try to resume business, and only with the utmost timidity did they re-enter their devastated homes.

Nevertheless, Mr. Williams is strongly of the opinion that the missionary cause has made a great gain through this terrible period, in spite of the impossibility of keeping up ordinary religious activity, for instead of holding meetings, the missionaries, when the looting and rioting began, immediately devoted their attention to affording refuge to the terror-stricken citizens, and all missionary compounds, including the hospitals, residences and schools, were thrown open to the populace, and not less than 5,000, mainly women and children, were sheltered within these havens of refuge until the city was quiet again. A deep sense of gratitude pervades the whole population, who regard the missionaries as their only sure defenders in a time of such unsettlement and change.

Lectures Free on Mormonism

Dr. J. A. Livingston Smith of York, Pa., who preached as a Presbyterian home missionary in four typical Mormon towns of Utah from 1881 to 1896, is in the latter days of his ministry devoting himself with singular unselfishness to the furtherance of home mission zeal and activity in behalf of the Mormon population of the West. Out of his Utah experience and out of wide reading and correspondence since, Dr. Smith has accumulated the materials of an authoritative and highly interesting lecture on Mormonism, and this he is prepared to deliver in any church that may invite him on the sole condition that a voluntary offering for home missions will be taken at the close of his lecture and forwarded to the home mission board of the denomination with which the church is connected. Dr. Smith's personal expenses in this work are his own contribution to the cause.

Besides the extension of public interest in Mormon missions in the West, Dr. Smith's lecture will fortify any community against the insidious influences of the Mormon missionaries who in their constant travels are now likely to visit at any time any city or town of the eastern states.

Chinese Official Again College Dean

Professor W. K. Chung, who has been serving since since the Chinese revolution as the commissioner of education for Kwantung province in China, has resigned his public office and will once more give his whole time to his duties as dean of Canton Christian College. Dr. Chung expresses his personal satisfaction in being once more able to center all his efforts on his work in this beloved institution, but undoubtedly this feeling is not altogether without some admixture of regret for his inability to accomplish his great projects for popular education in the province.

Professor Chung's resignation is undoubtedly due primarily to the appointment in Canton of unsympathetic officials under the new governor (until recently a brigand chief). The governor was sent there by President Yuan to crush the rebellion of the radical republicans who, like Dr. Sun, tried to cause a secession of the southern from the northern provinces of China. It does not appear that Professor Chung took any part in this rebellion, but he evidently considers its failure a victory for reaction. Professor Chung had done some very practical work in checking the eagerness of a bombastic element among the Chinese for a fictitious show of activity in the higher education. He ruthlessly killed off a lot of institutions in his province which were claiming to be colleges, and devoted the public revenue which he took away from them to setting up primary schools in the villages.

Canton Christian College, to which Dr. Chung has now returned as dean, is enjoying an epoch of interesting and encouraging building development. The administration building, donated with its furnishings by Mrs. Kennedy and Mrs. Schauffler of New York City, will soon be begun. The materials are now being rapidly assembled. The Y. M. C. A. building, provided for by Ambrose Swazey of Cleveland, is in process of erection, as are also two residences, one for the dean given by Mrs. Blackstone of Chicago, and the other for the vice president, given by Dr. J. Ackerman Coles of Newark. The fourth of the dormitories, for which the Chinese friends of the school have themselves collected the money, is now up to the second floor, and under a temporary roof is being used in the basement and on the first floor. The Chinese are also busy raising funds for a primary school building, for which they have already secured about $5,000 gold.

Do Not Want "Only Pleasantries"

During the July vacation, Miss Verna Eick of Africa wrote: "I am out forty-six miles from Elat and expect to leave for an itinerating trip with Miss Mackenzie tomorrow. The people are as eager as ever for the gospel. Today after the services ten women followed me to the tent, and supposing they had come from the meeting, I began a social conversation with them. Soon one woman looked toward the sinking sun and said, 'We came to hear the words of God, and do you give us only pleasantries?' I asked if they had not been at my meeting and they replied that they had been to another town and had just returned. Of course they had their 'words' before they left. Truly our opportunities are measured only by the limit of our endurance."

Board Notes and Announcements

—Mrs. Edwin R. Worrell of Brookline Park church was the leader Friday morning at the meeting of the Board of the Northwest, Chicago. The president of the Chicago presbyterial society gratefully acknowledged the faithfulness of pastors' wives in leading the devotions for two years past. The first missionary who spoke, Mrs. Graham of Beirut, asked if Dr. Mary Eddy had all the buildings she wanted for her hospital patients, replied with a smile, "I don't think 'Dr. Mary' will ever get all she wants." Miss Margaret Faris of Ichowfu, spending two months of her furlough at the Presbyterian Training School, brought welcome news from her associates and gave cheering instances of the diligence and devotion of Chinese Christians.

—Miss Anna M. Matthews, mission study secretary of the Chicago presbyterial societies, will be glad to visit any local society to organize a class and will give a lecture on the first chapter of the textbook.

The Open Hearth

Home Versus Foreign Field

The fields white for the harvest, but laborers too many, is not what Jesus said when he was here in the flesh. Think of 167,000 ministers, plus the thousands of priests, lecturers, evangelists, singers, choirs, Sunday schools and missionaries. One minister for every 450, to say nothing about the rest of the Lord's army of servants. Think of one minister in our foreign fields for every 1,000,000. We wonder why young men don't take to the ministry. You need not expect a strong man in mind and body to engage in any vocation when he knows there is no chance for expansion. We have on the home field one minister for one church of about 110 members. That is an average for all denominations, I believe. Think of a 2½ per cent gain in the United States while on the foreign field it is 14 per cent.

Brethren, the people here at home have had a chance under the best of circumstances to receive the gospel for centuries. If the people of Sodom and Gomorrah had been told what the folks at home have been told they would have repented, doubtless. As Paul said when he quit offering the gospel to the Jews, so ought we to say regarding the heathen, "Lo, we turn to the heathen." H. W. EWART.

Another Distinction for Owego

Mr. Ellis's inspiring account of the union of the Owego churches reminds me of another distinction of that remarkable town. It has an excellent high school, one whose work is quite as admirable as the Christian spirit of its people. That school has been pointed to by the highest authority as an example for those of like grade in California, and they also are good.

A wise law gives the University of California a strict supervision over the high schools of the state, most of which are small and young. President Wheeler, an eminent linguist, formerly a professor in Cornell, was several years ago pointing out to the California teachers the avenues to usefulness and honor that lie through small schools, and he said that the sound preparation of students from the school at Owego had for years attracted notice at Cornell.

I mention this partly to encourage the good teachers of Owego, but mainly to hold up to parents and teachers an example of what a high school ought to be. The success of its pupils at college is a sure test of a school's work and worth. Princeton used to publish the names of schools which prepared the best students in each of its classes—a most important service to sound education. JOHN GAMBLE.

Supply Equaling the Demand

It seems to me that in current discussions of supply and demand for the ministry several important factors are left out of account. It is true that in the past twenty years the number of ministers has not increased as rapidly as the number of communicants, but the communicants in each church have grown more rapidly than the number of churches. Each pastor cares, on the average, for a larger number. In other words, just as the average business man does a larger business and handles a larger force of men today than twenty years ago, so in the church—the average membership today is 137 against 115 in 1892.

Again, the number of ministers has grown faster than the number of churches. With 6,331 ministers in 1892 we had then 877 more churches than ministers. While the number of ministers has increased by half in the twenty years, this difference has not increased, but decreased absolutely as well as relatively. The number of churches today is only 756 more than the number of ministers. The supply of ministers is then in both these ways more adequate than twenty years ago, and the improvement has been rather steadily maintained, if we allow for the change due to the union with the Cumberland Church in 1907. That church had many small country churches and a wholly inadequate force of ministers.

"But," say those who write regarding the supply of ministerial candidates, "the number of students for the ministry is smaller than before." This is true only if we disregard the Presbyterian students in Union Theological Seminary. If these be considered, as they certainly must be since no other seminary save Princeton and McCormick contributes as many men to the ministry of our church as does Union, the disparity disappears.

Again, while the Board of Education states the number of candidates applying for financial help is not increasing, they overlook the fact that an increasing number of men, preferring to make their own way at least in college, do not declare themselves as candidates for the ministry till they enter seminary. And a larger number of students from non-Presbyterian churches are studying in our seminaries than before. In the same way, a larger number of students, who propose to enter the Presbyterian ministry, are studying in seminaries not under the care of the Assembly. Many of them temporarily enter other ministries, but eventually come back to us. These are not a few of the 118 ministers "received" in 1912.

"Pray ye the Lord of the harvest that he send forth laborers into his harvest," but do not fail to recognize the facts as they exist. Men are needed, but there is no need for pessimism. J. H. FREEMAN.

"Taking Fees for Funerals"

The article under the above caption in The Continent of Sept. 25 is a remarkable example of straining at a gnat. I can say that, as "Elder" fears, ministers do generally accept fees for funerals when such are tendered. It is rare to actually present a bill for the same, a thing which I think should not be done. But there is no sort of objection to accepting money voluntarily offered in such cases. How could this possibly put the minister "on the plane of the flunky"? The physician, undertaker and liveryman, all of whom have ministered to the deceased, are paid and often extravagantly because of their demands, and are not therefore considered flunkies. Why should a minister be so considered if, having rendered services just as real and necessary, and still making no charges, he should nevertheless esteem it right to accept money voluntarily offered? Yet, "Elder" says, in so doing he "earns the merited contempt of worldling and Christian alike." This is positively not true, unless the worldlings and Christians known to "Elder" are of an entirely different type from those with whom I am familiar. I have frequently heard both these classes of people without any suggestion from me or any other minister, emphatically express the opinion diametrically opposed to that of "Elder" on this point.

I have probably conducted more funerals for which I received nothing than otherwise. Some of these have been very taxing upon time and strength. But I have as freely and willingly spent of strength and time in the one class of cases as in the other. The comparatively small amount of money I have received for conducting funerals has neither hurt the cause of Christ nor my own reputation. I have in a few instances tried to keep people from giving me money for such services, fearing that their circumstances would not justify it. But, finding that they would be offended if I refused to accept, I gracefully did so. If any one can demonstrate how the principles I have laid down as the basis of my action, and which are quite general among ministers, are either positively wrong or lacking in the Christian spirit, I will gladly change my procedure. But lacking this I will stick to it.

If the church wishes to adopt a radical change of policy by paying all the ministers adequate salaries and then requiring them to turn into the treasury of the church all fees and other perquisites received, the rank and file of the ministry will cheerfully accede to it. W. O. HARPER.

More About Funeral Fees

"Elder" asks if it is the common custom for ministers to accept funeral fees. I should say that in some denominations the practice seems to be quite general, but where Presbyterian ministers are concerned such cases are exceptional. My own practice during more than half a century of ministerial service has usually been to decline such fees when offered from families in my own congregation and never to ask or expect them from strangers.

But on the other hand, there have been occasions when a different course, whether taken or not, would have been entirely proper and right. For instance, I recall cases during my early ministry as a home missionary on a meager salary when I was asked to go out of town ten or fifteen miles at my own expense by private conveyance to help bury strangers whose families could have well afforded to offer remuneration for the services rendered. They did not do so, or even pay my bill at the livery stable. There have been rare instances in later years in which strangers or outsiders have given me what might be styled "funeral fees." Invariably the gift has been so evidently a token of gratitude on the part of survivors that my refusal to accept would have hurt their aching hearts.

Anyhow, the question seems to be one that belongs to the persons who are directly concerned. I should never think of criticising any minister for accepting the unsolicited gift of a willing donor. PASTOR.

Do Ministers Lack Courtesy?

The writer desired to gather some data for the preparation of a report to presbytery and sent a letter of inquiry to some sixty of his brethren in the ministry asking a few questions and soliciting a prompt reply. A majority of these same brethren failed to make any reply and thus proved themselves unwilling to grant this favor. To answer the questions would not have taken more than ten minutes of the time of any brother questioned. True, the writer did not inclose a stamped envelope, but since he had spent $2 in printing the letter and in cost of mailing it and since the information desired was for the good of the church of which these brethren are ministers he felt free to ask of them the donation of a 2-cent stamp and the time for writing the answers, particularly as all the brethren were personally known to the writer.

The result of so many failing to respond is that it invalidates to a considerable extent the labor of those who did, since it is unwise to draw any general conclusions from a comparatively few facts. It is because others tell me they have had a similar experience in seeking information for the good of the church that I write this communication with the hope that ministers may be stimulated to be somewhat more courteous in their relations to one another. SPEAKS FOR ITSELF
Experience of a Southern Man

"Please allow me to thank the originator of Postum, which in my case speaks for itself," writes a Florida man.

"I formerly drank so much coffee that my nervous system was almost a wreck." (Tea is just as injurious because it contain caffeine, the drug found in coffee.) "My physician told me to quit drinking it, but I had to have something, so I tried Postum.

"To my great surprise I saw quite a change in my nerves in about ten days. That was a year ago and now my nerves are steady and I don't have those bilious sick headaches which I regularly had while drinking coffee.

"Postum seems to have body-building properties and leaves the head clear. And I do not have the bad taste in my mouth when I get up mornings. When Postum is boiled good and strong, it is far better in taste than coffee. My advice to coffee drinkers is to try Postum and be convinced."

Name given by Postum Company, Battle Creek, Mich. Write for copy of the little book, "The Road to Wellville."

Postum comes in two forms:

Regular Postum—must be well boiled.

Instant Postum is a soluble powder. A teaspoonful dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. Grocers sell both kinds.

"There's a reason" for Postum.

Ways of Working

Supper Before Prayer Meeting

Second church, Knoxville, Tenn., has a splendid plan in operation which the pastor, Rev. Herbert B. Smith, says is not copyrighted. There is a club of women which meets on Wednesday afternoon to sew for benevolent institutions. Meanwhile some of the women are preparing supper, paid for by the church, supplemented by a collection at the table. The attendance runs from forty to seventy members of the church. Supper is followed by a half hour informal conference on church matters. At 7:30 o'clock the pastor conducts the prayer meeting, usually giving an illustrated address. The supper idea is used by many churches, specially where the church is nearer to the work of the members than are the homes.

Music Can Add to Sermon

The importance of planning music for a church service so that all parts of it shall unite in a harmonious whole is realized more by the organist or chorister and pastor than by the average attendant. H. M. Blossom, who for more than fifty years of practically continuous service has been in charge of the music of First church, St. Louis, has made that church famous for the consanguinity of the various portions of its service. The program each Sunday is carefully planned to emphasize the theme of the day.

Little Brother Gray-Brown

strong enough to walk, Cricket, the black and tan terrier, used to take her family there for a walk. This was a treat for Rastus. As soon as they came within reach, he would rush out, snatch up the nearest puppy and carry it off into the house. The first time I saw this happen I was alarmed and hurried out to rescue the tiny canine victim. A glance into the house, however, soon assured me that there was nothing to be feared. Rastus lay on his back, holding the wee puppy up in all four of his feet and tossing it around as gently as a father would his own baby boy.

For some part of every day I invited Rastus into the house to pay me a visit. This visit not infrequently happened when I was serving afternoon tea. When it came his turn to be served I gave Rastus a cup of cold water, a cracker and a lump of sugar. He would take the cracker in his hands, dip it in the cup of water and wash it until it had for the most part crumbled away into the bottom of the cup. When he thought it sufficiently clean he would eat what remained in his hands and then with the greatest care fish up and eat what had fallen to the bottom of the cup.

When it came to the sugar I used to blush for him, his manners were so very bad. He always took a seat in the middle of the tea table or as near to the middle as he could get, and then put the entire lump of sugar into his mouth at once, chewing it with his mouth opening almost back to his ears. The sound was for all the world like a stone crusher going at full speed. When I said to him, "Rastus, aren't you ashamed?" he never failed to duck his head and put his paws over his eyes in the most dejected manner. But I noticed that as soon as his head came up again he went on chewing just as fast and furiously as before, and when that lump of sugar was finished begged for more.

Rastus, like all of his kind, had a perfect mania for water. It required only about five minutes' practice for him to learn to turn on the water for himself. He seemed to have unending curiosity to find out where the water came from and would reach so far up the faucet in his explorations that water would fly in all directions.

Pears'

The public's choice since 1789.

"Your cheeks are peaches," he cried.
"No, they are Pears'," she replied.
Pears' Soap brings the color of health to the skin. It is the finest toilet soap in all the world.

We had in the middle of our lawn a faucet used for a hose attachment. One night I was awakened by what sounded like a veritable flood. When I got up and hurried out I found this faucet turned on, with no hose attached and the water spouting fully twelve feet in the air. How in the world had it been done? The water must be turned off. So clad in my dressing gown as I was I walked boldly under the fountain and turned the faucet, when, all curled up in a huge puddle of water, fastened down by his rope wound round and round the pipe, I saw poor Rastus, his eyes covered with his hands, drenched and shivering.

Rastus survived this and many other accidents caused by his unbounded curiosity. It was this curiosity which led him onto the public highway, where he was picked up by a local expressman and carried off never again to return to his happy home and devoted friends.

HOW FOREIGNERS OBSERVE SABBATH

Rev. George W. Shelton, pastor of Second church, Pittsburg, following his return from Europe summarized for his congregation his observations of the church going habits and Sunday observance in various foreign cities as follows:

Killarney—People all go to church. Good observance of the day except that travelers arriving in the city are allowed to buy liquor at the public houses. Home people, however, are not allowed to buy liquor.

Geneva—Everyone goes to church. No cafes open or public sports.

Florence—Some little church going. Cafes open all day and band concerts in the downtown squares in the evening.

Edinburgh—People go to church morning, afternoon and evening.

London—Fair observance for large city, but public houses open in afternoon.

Rome—Little church going. Cafes open in the afternoon and everyone at the band concerts in the evening.

Berlin—People go to church in the morning and to cafes in the afternoon. Especially good music in the churches.

Additional Book Reviews

Short Stories

THE HAND OF THE MIGHTY, by Vaughan Kester, collects some of this gifted writer's best magazine work. The thirteen stories which make up the book show his versatility, ranging as they do from simple romances, political tales, character sketches, to serious human studies, all of them related with a penetrating understanding and a subtle humor. "Mollie Darling" was finished shortly before the author's death and this is its initial publication. Admirers of Vaughan Kester will find this volume a very satisfactory expression of his work and its character. [Bobbs-Merrill Company, Indianapolis. $1.35 net.

THE HEADQUARTER RECRUIT, by Richard Dehan, is an interesting collection of short stories which will bring new laurels to the much-discussed author of "One Braver Thing." They treat of life from many angles, the scenes being laid variously in England, Africa, India and the South sea islands. All of them have a strong human quality, while the plot interests are orginal and consistently developed. There is a suggestion of Kipling in Mrs. "Dehan's" stories, but while they are as heart-gripping and human they lack something of that master's finesse. [Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. $1.25 net.

THE HAND OF PETRARCH, by T. R. Sullivan. Long short stories of careful workmanship, but of rather unsustained interest. The title tale is about a goldsmith devoted to his master Petrarch, whose hand he takes from the grave in order to inclose in a wonderful casket he has made. The others follow peculiar lines also, and none of them is very rich in human appeal. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1.30 net.

Various Themes

MARSH LIGHTS, by Helen Huntington, has a gripping human interest and reveals the inside of an ill-advised marriage. In order to marry the girl he loves a man sacrifices what promises to be a brilliant military career. Disillusionment quickly follows. He becomes absorbed in business, although he never rises above a minor clerkship, and his wife devotes herself to society with increasing success. The succeeding years bring the man humiliating failures, but despite his rather exasperating weakness one's sympathies are always with him, for he is clean and fine and tender. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $1.35.

THE QUEST OF A DREAM, by Edna Kingsley Wallace, aims alternately to be sparkingly humorous and touchingly tender, but somehow one can feel that the author is biting her pen and screwing her brow to arrive at the result; so that the book, while possessing a certain amount of cleverness and some depth of feeling, lacks spontaneity and the freedom that comes from a full heart. It is made up of the letters a girl writes to a man she has never seen, but who has been attracted by her picture. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $1.50 net.

DISCOVERING EVELINA, by F. Frankfort Moore, is what it purports to be—an old-fashioned romance. It centers around the early life of Madame d'Arblay, the talented daughter of Charles Burney, and numbers among its characters many of the notables of that period. The printing and publication of "Evelina," Madame d'Arblay's first novel, forms the incident on which the story is founded. Although the style is often faulty, one cannot help being interested. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.25 net.

THE ANGLO-INDIANS, by Alice Perrin. The scene is laid partly in India, partly in England, and the story deals principally with the lives of the Fleetwoods, people of great importance in India, who return to England and adjust their lives to meet changed social and financial conditions. The love affairs of the Fleetwood girls and the mutual devotion of the elder Fleetwoods make pleasant reading. [Duffield and Company, New York. $1.25.

A ONE-SIDED AUTOBIOGRAPHY, by Oscar Kuhns, is the story of the author's intellectual life. Born with an insatiable love of reading in boyhood he devoured every book which fell into his hands, regardless of its worth or influence. Fortunately he imbibed a discriminating literary taste from a line of book-loving ancestors which he began to exercise in early youth. When he entered college his reading was pursued with a definite purpose, but as the years passed that purpose became less and less apparent, until every piece of literature worthy of the name was perused with the keen delight known only to the scholarly mind. Professor Kuhns gives some very good suggestions on the development of literary taste and the study of the classics. [Eaton and Mains, New York. $1 net.

UNCLE'S ADVICE: A Novel in Letters, by William Hewlett, follows the rather unique device of revealing the event of a "cross section of life" by means of the various letters written to the hero—letters of all sorts from chorus girls' bills and billets to notes from his mother and his chummy old uncle, but with never a glimpse of the hero himself. The idea is to show what temptations an ordinary young man with leisure and a fair income is liable to in his first venture in the world, and his uncle's letters are supposed to be brimful of just the right kind of counsel, though they are not particularly pointed or clever. [Duffield and Company, New York. $1.25 net.

THE FIRE WITHIN, by Patricia Wentworth. The power of love is the theme of this unusual and rather clever story. While under deep emotional stress, a man jeopardizes his honor to save another from disgrace. The thought of what he has done preys upon his mind, his reason becomes imperiled, but the persistent outpouring of a woman's love brings him "into the light." The plot is most original—if not exactly convincing—and it is interestingly developed. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $1.35 net.

What Children Should Read

THE CHILDREN'S READING, by Frances Jenkins Olcott. There is no one in America better qualified to write on this theme than Miss Olcott, whose wide experience as librarian gives weight and authority to her opinions on literature for children. She first talks of the influence of books and the responsibility of parents and teachers in directing the child's reading; following which she takes up every department of literature from fables and myths to books on religious subjects, showing the part each plays in the child's mental development. A truly valuable book. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1.25 net.

MONTANA

The Sabbath school that was started last June at Gilman has developed a church organization. Rev. W. N. Sloan, pastor at large, organized it with sixteen members. A church edifice has been completed, furnished and all paid for without asking any help from the board.

The people in Glaston and Melville want preaching. The church at Glaston proposes to have it with the help of friends at Melville. One man has subscribed $400 for each of two years. Others, less able, are nevertheless doing their best.

UNDERFEED
FURNACE OR BOILER Cuts Your Coal Bill 1/2 to 2/3

BECAUSE the Underfeed successfully burns the cheaper grades of hard and soft coal, you can positively cut your coal bills 1/2 to 2/3. The Underfeed has lowered heat cost in over 25,000 homes and buildings—getting clean, even heat from pea, buckwheat or slack coal that costs from $2 to $3 a ton less than the more expensive grades required in ordinary heating plants. The Underfeed entirely consumes gases and smoke, and converts them into warmth, thus utilizing valuable heat units, which escape in topfeeds, wasted up chimneys. FURNACE

BOILER

Let us send you a lot of fac-simile letters from Underfeed users all over the country, telling their heating experiences.

You Can Figure the Difference Mr. L. C. McMillen, Fort Atkins, Wis., writes: "I enjoy taking care of the Underfeed far better than I did my old hard coal furnace. Just to think of the difference in price of coal! I pay $4 a ton and my brother's hard coal costs him $8.50 a ton. Best of all, you always have a fine bed of coals even if you have gone one, two or three days without looking after heater."

Wins Out in a Severe Test The Ideal Belt Co. of Detroit, Mich., has used an Underfeed Boiler in their factory five years and Mr. Frank C. Jansen writes: "It is entirely satisfactory not only as a great fuel saver, but it requires very little attention. The smoke-consuming qualities are excellent, as we burn a great deal of our scrap leather and this is giving it a severe test. Our new building will surely have an Underfeed in it."

The Underfeed has many exclusive advantages. All fire is on top. No heat-retarding, soot-covered, hard-to-clean heating surfaces. No clinkers, few ashes. Requires least attention.

CONVENTION SCARES LIQUOR DEALERS

Gathering at Columbus Used by Organs to Urge Combination of Saloonkeepers—Recent Temperance News.

"If there was ever a time when liquor dealers of the country needed organization it is now. Never before has the liquor business been threatened from so many directions." This is the prelude to an appeal in a liquor paper of Washington, D. C., for the saloonkeepers of that city to organize in opposition to the temperance folk. The coming convention of the Anti-Saloon League at Columbus has been pointed to by more than one liquor paper as a very potent argument for increased activity on the part of liquor dealers.

Synod Ready to Cooperate—Oregon synod at its recent meeting made it plain that it would enter enthusiastically into a campaign for prohibition either in 1914 or 1916, but insisted that all of the prohibition interests should be agreed as to the time of the campaign. A committee was appointed to cooperate on temperance with other bodies.

Crime and Drink in Germany—The recent announcement that Kaiser Wilhelm will hereafter drink nothing stronger than grape juice has called attention to statistics showing that drink in the German empire annually causes 1,600 suicides, 1,500 accidents, 30,000 cases of insanity and 200,000 crimes.

Want Better Manhood—Young men of Toronto and vicinity have formed the Ontario Young Manhood Association to work for the abolition of the liquor traffic in Ontario. The officers of the Y. M. C. A. are participating in the movement and a vigorous temperance work will be pushed.

Advance Among Students—"No wine at the senior banquet," is the recent dictum of the senior class of Cornell University by a vote of 295 to 213. By a second vote of 276 to 232 the class has voted to bar intoxicants from all the class functions save two—the senior boat ride and the senior night.—For the fourth year a course in the study of the liquor problem with college credit is offered by the economics department of Iowa Wesleyan University.—Sixty men at Michigan Agricultural College petitioned the faculty to offer a course in the study of the liquor problem.—A first-hand survey of saloon conditions, social forces supporting saloons, and of social results of drinking, a feature of Prohibition League work at Augustana College, Ill., last year is to be repeated this year. The laboratory composed the very "wet" cities of Rock Island, Moline and Davenport. The investigation will attempt to reduce to cold facts the effect of the liquor traffic on the finances of the cities.

COLUMBUS READY FOR ANTI-SALOONISTS

The capital of Ohio is anticipating several red-letter days next week when the twentieth anniversary of the Anti-Saloon League of America is to be followed by a general conference of all temperance organizations on a program for educating the whole country up to a sentiment for national prohibition secured by an amendment to the federal constitution. The league's meetings run from Monday evening until Thursday evening, and the union conference between the league and other temperance movements will occupy Friday. Moderator John Timothy Stone of Chicago is announced as one of the speakers on the first evening. During the days following, practically every important figure in the temperance movement is set down upon the program. There are expected five governors, three ex-governors, five senators and four congressmen.

PREPARE FOR ASSEMBLY MEETING

The executive committee in charge of arrangements at Chicago preliminary to the meeting of General Assembly there next year met last Saturday with Dr. W. H. Roberts, stated clerk of General Assembly, to discuss details. The executive committee under Dr. John Timothy Stone is: Chairman, Edward H. Smith; assistant chairman, Dr. Cleland B. McAfee; secretary, W. Holmes Forsythe; treasurer, referred to finance committee consisting of Thomas D. Jones, C. H. McCormick, H. P. Crowell. Subcommittees: Entertainment, Carroll H. Sudler, chairman, Dr. A. R. Craig, assistant; pulpit supply, Dr. J. G. K. McClure, chairman, Dr. A. C. Zenos, assistant chairman; public meetings, Rev. Norman B. Barr, chairman; reception, James B. Forgan, chairman, Moses J. Wentworth, assistant; outing and visitation, Dr. E. P. Hill, chairman; press, Oliver R. Williamson, chairman, Dr. W. C. Covert, assistant; presentation of gavel, Dr. W. C. Covert, chairman, Rev. Vaclav Vanek, assistant.

LAY PREACHERS HOLD CONVENTION

Teams from Twenty-Two Towns in Oklahoma and Texas Meet—One of the Results of Wichita Sunday Campaign.

Two hundred and fifty men representing twenty-two teams of lay gospel preachers paraded the streets of Woodward, Okla., several days ago during their first convention. These teams and six others had been organized by the team of Woodward, or by groups formed as a result of teams organized by it.

The laymen came from parts of Oklahoma and Texas and trace their interest in gospel meetings to the campaign of "Billy" Sunday in Wichita, Kan., over a year ago. It was following the meetings in Wichita that Tom Blodgett's team was formed, as related in The Continent several months ago. This lay preaching movement soon spread to Woodward. There are now over 100 teams organized in the Southwest and over 5,000 conversions are credited to the activities of the laymen.

The teams represented at the Woodward convention Oct. 21 to 23 have to their credit 1,000 conversions, and have in the past year made eighty-seven trips to other towns. The membership totals nearly 1,500 men, the Woodward team alone including 150. This team, of which C. E. Sharp, a lumberman, is leader, has visited eleven towns, traveling 563 miles, each man paying his own fare.

All of the teams at the convention took part in some way or another. Among the visitors were four of the strong gospel team workers from Wichita, E. H. Stranahan, secretary of the Wichita Federation of Churches; John Massey, president of the Massey Iron Works; George Massey, traveling representative for the Massey Iron Works, and C. Q. Chandler, president of the Kansas National Bank of Wichita. Rev. J. R. Abernathy of Guthrie, Okla., was in attendance during one day's session and talked to the men.

These Are Junior Camp Fire Girls and Junior Boy Scouts of Mount Sterling, Ky.

Buys Y. M. C. A. Memberships Wholesale

The business manager of the Washington, D. C., Star has purchased from the Y. M. C. A. of that city sixty-three memberships at $15 each in exchange for advertising space. Memberships have been offered to employes of the Star at $5 each. The money thus paid by the staff has been turned over to the welfare department of the paper. The Editor and Publisher, a newspaper publication, has editorially suggested that this plan could well be adopted by other newspapers over the country.

Camp Fire Girls Have Ponies

What is said to be the only mounted junior Camp Fire Girls in the United States have their homes in Mount Sterling, Ky. Twenty girls, each owning her own pony, compose the company. They were organized by Rev. A. H. Hibshman, pastor of the local Presbyferian church. There is also in the same town a small patrol of mounted junior Boy Scouts, although when the accompanying photograph was taken the boys gave precedence to the girls and are almost entirely concealed in the picture.

Sunday School Missionaries Meet

The annual conference of the missionaries of the lakes district of the American Sunday School Union is in progress at Moody Institute, Chicago. Meetings are held morning, afternoon and evening for the instruction and inspiration of the missionaries who are planting Sunday schools and increasing the efficiency of those already established.

MINISTER FILLS EDITORIAL CHAIR

Rev. W. O. Harper, pastor at Aurora, Neb., during the past summer has had two experiences as acting editor of local papers. The editor of The Register, a member of Mr. Harper's church, asked him to take charge of his paper during his absence at a convention. The practical editorials of the erstwhile editor in regard to the city's amusement problem and the relation of the lack of rain to the people's religion attracted considerable attention. Earlier in the summer Mr. Harper was at the head of a staff of all ministers in town when they took the place of the editor of The Republican, who attended the meeting of the state editorial association at Omaha and there occupied one of the Omaha pulpits as part of the program of the associaton meeting. In both cases the returning editors agreed that their substitutes had done excellent work.

WILL PLAN WORLD CONFERENCE

Dr. William Henry Roberts, stated clerk of General Assembly, was one of four ministers who met recently in New York City to complete arrangements for their tour later in the winter through Great Britain to confer with leaders in the Nonconformist denominations. This trip is to be made at the request of the world's conference on faith and order and the object to be attained is the interest and cooperation of Nonconformist churches for a world conference on church unity. Dr. Jowett was also chosen to go as one of the Presbyterian representatives, but has declined. The other members of the committee are Dr. Newman Smyth, Congregationalist; Bishop John W. Hamilton, Methodist; Dr. Peter Ainslie, Disciples church. The commission will sail some time in January.

ARE YOU READY FOR THE CHILLY DAYS?

The advent of cold weather brings new problems to the housewife—problems of domestic service—problems of provision for the wants of children who must be hustled off to school with proper clothing and warm, nourishing meals. Happy is the mother and housewife who knows the uses and nutritive value of shredded wheat. It not only contains all the material that is needed to build strong and sturdy bodies for the little ones, but it is rich in what the chemists call calories, or heat-making units. In other words, it not only supplies all the necessary elements for the growing bodies of children, but it supplies the warmth that is necessary to fortify them against the chilly mornings of autumn and the sudden changes of temperature that come with the approach of winter. One or two biscuits, toasted in the oven to make them crisp and eaten with hot milk and a little cream, is a complete, nourishing meal that will furnish all the strength and warmth needed for a half day's work or play.

The popular notion that the body is kept warm by piling on more clothing is a fallacy The real function of clothing is to retain th natural warmth of the body, but if there is n natural warmth to retain the body is easil affected by sudden changes of temperature. I will not withstand exposure to the rigors of winter climate. The natural source of bodil warmth is the food we eat. It must be ric in heat-making elements. All the clothing yo can pile onto a poorly nourished body will no keep it warm. Nourishing food that is easil digested, combined with rational exercise, wil supply the warmth that fortifies the bod against cold and exposure. In shredded whea biscuit we have a fuel food which supplie more heat and energy than meat or eggs and i much more easily digested. It is an ideal foo for children both for study and play becaus it not only supplies natural warmth in a natura way, but builds good bone, muscle and brai

The intelligent mother and housewife wh has to prepare children for school every morning will have a thoughtful regard for the kin and quality of food they eat and the manne in which they eat it. Many children like mush porridges for breakfast because they are always covered with plenty of cream and suga and are bolted down without chewing. As matter of fact the taste of the porridge i entirely covered up in the cream and suga The soft porridge does not encourage thoroug mastication, which is really the first proce in digestion and which is necessary to develo sound teeth and good gums.

WILL CAMPAIGN FOR BIBLE STUDENTS

Union Tabernacle Class to Lead—Dan Crawford Needs No Literature but the Bible—Italians Mark Progress.

PHILADELPHIA—A great Bible class membership campaign in the Kensington district is about to be inaugurated. The Union Tabernacle class, Dr. Robert Hunter pastor, which has 200 members and three teachers, will lead. Men will be buttonholed on the street, in the trolleys, in the barber shops and places of business. A huge clock will be set up in Union Tabernacle church to record the attendance during the seven weeks of the campaign. Scarfpins and gold watches will be awarded those bringing in the most members. Names and records will be posted on a blackboard each Sunday.

Program for Ministers—A sermon was preached to the ministers on Monday, Nov. 3, by Rev. J. A. MacCallum on "Our Most Fundamental Social Need." Nov. 10 J. Albert Haddock will give an illustrated travelogue on "London Streets."

Dan Crawford Speaks Twice—The October banquet of the Presbytrian Social Union at the Bellevue-Stratford was attended by about 300 laymen and invited ministerial guests. Walter F. Hagar presided and Dan Crawford told of his twenty-two years' experience in the heart of Africa in a manner which greatly interested his audience, although describing it as the "spoiled and petted children of a pampered civilization." Mr. Crawford also spoke at a meeting of the women's foreign missionary society which crowded Calvary church at midday. He deplored the many books and commentaries in use and "thanked God that he was shut off from that miserable thing called literature in Africa. He had only his Bible, the book with a million eyes."

Do Own Mission Work—The overtures of the two Philadelphia presbyteries to synod, asking that the agreement by which the Home Board was released from all operations within the bounds of synod be abrogated, were answered unanimously in the negative. The presbyteries of Philadelphia are hence left in their home mission enterprises as heretofore to depend upon the cooperation and support of synod.

Italians Celebrate Anniversary — First Italian church, considered among the most successful Protestant Italian churches of the country, celebrated recently its tenth anniversary. The pastor, Rev. Arnaldo Stasio, was assisted in services by Professor Clot of the Waldensian church of Italy, Editor Pietro of the Italian Presbyterian, Rev. Agide Pirrazzini, former pastor, and Doctors W. P. Fulton, J. A. Worden, J. Gray Bolton, E. Y. Hill and others. Over 800 have been received into the membership of the church and the Sunday school numbers over 500. Its property is valued at $60,000. Classes in industrial work, mothers' meetings, sewing school and kindergartens are maintained.

Personal Notes—On the last Sunday in October Dr. Thomas A. Fenton of Syracuse preached in Northminster church, Dr. G. A. Johnston Ross of Union Seminary in Calvary, R. H. M. Augustine of Hanover, N. J., in Holland Memorial and Dr. John A. Sutherland in Bethany. Rev. Alexander MacColl of Second church was in Washington, D. C., supplying the pulpit of his predecessor, Dr. Charles Wood.—Dr. R. E. L. Jarvis, having taken a rest of some weeks after his return from his enforced absence in the West on account of illness, was in his pulpit the first Sunday of November.—Rev. Edward S. Wolfe, for twenty-four years pastor of the Moravian church in this city, has accepted a call to the Moravian church of New York. —Dr. James B. Ely of Lemon Hill association opened the winter series of Sunday evening evangelistic services in Garrick theater on Nov. 2.—The Union Sunday School Association of the Main Line at its annual meeting in Bryn Mawr church elected Rev. J. C. Levingood of the Berwyn church president.

Link Church to Society—A movement to link church and social welfare will be inaugurated in Philadelphia this fall under the auspices of the Brotherhood of the Kingdom. Dr. Samuel Zane Batten is one of the leaders and is endeavoring to enlist others.—In line with this is the effort being made by William B. Patterson, secretary of the social service commission of the Federated Council of Churches of Christ, and also of the Interchurch Federation of this city, to determine what legislation is needed of a social and humanitarian kind and to inaugurate means and methods for the obtaining of it.

Dedicate Memorial Church—The dedication of the new and handsome Richardson Memorial church in West Philadelphia, built by a bequest of Lady Kortright, a former member of Calvary church, took place Nov. 2. Rev. J. Q. A. McDowell of Danville, Ky., a brother of the pastor, Dr. O. G. McDowell, preached the sermon in the morning. At a Sunday school rally in the afternoon addresses were made by Dr. J. A. Worden, Franklin S. Edmonds and Martin G. Brumbaugh. The evening sermon was by Dr. Joseph W. Cochran. Services were held on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, when members of presbytery and neighboring pastors took part. W. P. White.

A Favorite Song of the Great English Evangelist—GIPSY SMITH.

S. Edward Young, Pastor
Bedford Presbyterian Church,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

"For over a year our congregation have been using Hallowed Hymns. This book combines the choicest of the old, faithful melodious hymns with a large majority of the best of the new hymns. Of all hard tasks the publication of a hymn book that will suit every religious taste is about the most difficult, but you have succeeded. The book has hymns for every really Christian variety of preference, and it maintains a high musical and spiritual tone."

Herbert Ware Reherd,
Pastor First Presbyterian Church,
Waterloo, Iowa

"We have been using Hallowed Hymns in our Sunday School, Prayer Meeting and Sunday Evening service for several years and it has given us much satisfaction."

S. L. Hammond, Pastor
First Presbyterian Church,
Steele, N. Dak.

"Some time ago we ordered one hundred copies of Hallowed Hymns and we are much pleased with them."

WISCONSIN TO LOSE OVER 1,200 SALOONS

Decision Sustaining Baker Law Means Closing of Many Grogshops — Masons Lay Corner Stone of New Church.

MILWAUKEE—The state supreme court has recently sustained the Baker law, which limits saloons to one for each 250 of the population. The decision will close 270 saloons in Milwaukee alone, and it is estimated that about 1,000 others in the state will be forced out of existence if the law is enforced. When this decision was rendered Dr. J. S. Lean, state Anti-Saloon League superintendent, was in the hospital recovering from a broken leg and other injuries following collision with an automobile. He met with the accident on his way to address a meeting during synod's recent session.

New Building for Young Church—Saturday afternoon, Oct. 11, the corner stone of the new Washington Park church was laid. Rev. W. W. Perry, grand secretary of the Masons of Wisconsin, under whose auspices the corner stone laying took place, presided and over 500 Masons were in attendance. Dr. W. O. Carrier, president of Carroll College, and Rev. Robert S. Donaldson, pastor of Perseverance church, gave addresses. Others who took part were Rev. W. O. Wallace, Rev. Everett A. Cutler and Rev. Lyle Wilson Ewing, the pastor of the church. It is largely due to his energy and courage and faith that the project has been carried forward. The complete plans call for an expenditure of $20,000. The auditorium, costing $12,000, is all that will be built at present, while the "paper palace" in which the congregation has been worshiping will form a temporary wing. The church, after an existence of about three years, now has a membership of 120, and is rapidly growing.

Men Conduct Service—Sunday evening, Oct. 19, Westminster Men's Bible Class went in a body and took charge of the service at Washington Park church. Edward J. Quackenbush, an elder in Westminster, preached.

DEFINES POWER OF CHURCH COURTS

The far reaching effect of the decision of Judge Van Valkenburgh at Kansas City in the case involving the possession of Presbyterian property in Missouri was pointed out at the recent meeting of Missouri synod. The suit was fought by the church not for the property but to settle the points which will be an advantage to all denominations. Among the principles established, according to an analysis by Rev. A. D. Wolfe, permanent clerk of synod, were: Church courts speak with final authority in matters of theology; church property under a Presbyterian system belongs to and is by the local congregation held in trust for the entire denomination; a dissenting or recalcitrant minority cannot claim to be the church—majorities control and their action is valid; the Presbyterian system receives substantial recognition as an ecclesiastical polity. Determination of these principles opens the door for the cause of union and gives it impulse, say many pastors. It will be far more easy now, it is declared, than five years ago, for denominations so desiring to effect an organic merger.

BOY SCOUT ACTIVITIES

Boys Join Humane Society—Boy scouts of Elgin, Ill., have joined the humane society and will assist in preventing cruelty to animals.

Scouts Study the City—Twenty-five medals have been offered by the Buffalo, N. Y., Chamber of Commerce for boy scouts who pass certain required examinations in municipal affairs. The work of the principal city officials and names of councilmen and location of various public buildings are among the facts required.

Place for Former Scout Masters—A new class of scout masters to be known as Scout Master Unassigned has been created by the national officers of the Boy Scouts of America for those men who have served as scout masters but who for various reasons have had to give up the work. The new class will give them a part in the organization.

Says Churches Should Advertise

Rev. McElwee Ross, pastor of First U. P. church, McKeesport, Pa., in a recent paper before the U. P. ministers of that city strongly urged the necessity of church advertising. He expressed the opinion that it is as essential for a church to announce its merits as it is for a merchant to tell about the goods he has for sale.

Fined for Refusal to Join Catholic Parade

According to the Watchman-Examiner of Boston, seven athletic instructors of the park and recreation department of that city on their recent refusal to give exhibitions in a parade of the Knights of Columbus Oct. 13 were suspended for a week.

OLD CHURCH HAS NEW BUILDING

New Broadway Structure Architecturally Worthy of Surroundings—Have Union of Missions—Still Preaches Outdoors.

NEW YORK CITY—The beauty of the new Broadway church, dedicated Oct. 26, attracts a great deal of public attention in Manhattan because of its prominent location on Broadway, the city's principal thoroughfare, almost in juxtaposition to the famous buildings of Columbia University. The Broadway church is architecturally well worthy of its great neighbor, and indeed is not entirely dwarfed even by the vast Episcopalian cathedral a few blocks away. The interior is even more striking than the exterior. The great window over the entrance of the church is perhaps the largest, as it is certainly among the most artistic, work of stained glass in the whole city. The splendid organ is a particular pride, and the spacious auditorium with its 1,200 sittings is singularly churchly. The parish house attached has the completest possible facilities for Sunday school work and institutional service to the community. All in all, Dr. Buchanan and his people have made admirable use of the great sum of money which they received for their church, the old Fourth Avenue church at Fourth avenue and 22d street. The congregation was organized in Bleecker street in 1825 and remained there more than a quarter of a century before it moved up to the 22d street location, which was then far uptown.

Merchant Remembers Missions—By the will of the late Albert D. Smith of Orange, N. J., who had a large woolen business in New York, the Boards of Home and Foreign Missions will each receive $37,500 at the death of his widow. In case Mrs. Smith's direct heirs die before she does, the Board of Relief and Sustentation will also be one of several beneficiaries among whom $200,000 is to be equally divided.

Presbytery and Classis Meet—Nov. 10 at 2:30 p. m. there will be a joint devotional meeting of presbytery and classis of New York in the chapel of Collegiate Church of St. Nicholas. Dr. George Alexander of University Place church will preside. Pastors are requested to invite their elders, deacons and trustees. Brief addresses by representatives of both the classis and presbytery will be delivered on "Points of Emphasis in Our Message Today."

Will Federate Rescue Missions—Fifty leaders of practical mission work from New York and Brooklyn and the outlying districts of Mount Vernon, Bridgeport, Ossining, Newark, Jersey City and Morristown met at a dinner Oct. 28 in the Oriental restaurant in Pell street, Manhattan—the heart of Chinatown—to organize the Federation of Rescue Missions. This movement is to include all rescue missions within sixty miles of New York City.

Go to Saloons for Congregation—Rev. C. W. Welch at Yorkville church is continuing outdoor preaching later in the season than anyone else in the city. He expects to hold services on the church steps every Sunday night up to the first of December at least. Mr. Welch and a quartet of singers are planning to visit the saloons of the neighborhood and invite to church men found there.

Personal Items—Rev. Percival Campbell Morgan, eldest son of Dr. Campbell Morgan of London, was married to Miss Janet Kathleen Ross in Fifth Avenue church Oct. 29, Dr. Jowett officiating. Miss Ross is a daughter of Dr. William Ross, pastor of Devonshire Baptist church, London. Mr. and Mrs. Morgan have gone to Tryon, S. C., where Mr. Morgan has accepted a call.—Dr. Wilfred T. Grenfell has come to New York on his way to Washington, where he will act as best man at the marriage of Miss Jessie Wilson, the President's daughter, to Francis B. Sayre, who was for some time connected with Dr. Grenfell in the Labrador work.—Tonight, Nov. 6, William McQuere, superintendent of McAuley Cremorne mission, will celebrate the fifth anniversary of his conversion at Marble Collegiate church, where the monthly conference of the National Bible Institute's evening school for Christian workers is in session.

Pageant to Show Y. W. C. A. Work—Preparatory to the opening of the joint campaign of the Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations on Nov. 10 to raise $4,000,000 for association work in the city, the Y. W. C. A. will hold an elaborate pageant Friday evening, Nov. 7, in the Seventy-First Regiment Armory. Groups representing classes in cookery, dressmaking, millinery, art, nursing, work among foreigners and Camp Fire Girls will participate.

Provide Speakers on 142 Themes — The Laity League, department of the New York Federation of Churches, has organized at 200 Fifth avenue a speakers' bureau from which churches and men's clubs can obtain competent persons to address them on current social obligations of the church. The league offers a list of 150 speakers who are prepared to speak on one or more of 142 themes catalogued alphabetically.

Celebrate Anniversaries — Homecrest church, Brooklyn, celebrated the fourteenth anniversary of its Bible school Oct. 26. The morning service was devoted to addresses by former superintendents of the school and superintendents of neighboring schools, with Walter P. Longstreet, superintendent, presiding. At the evening service Charles E. Francis, president of the Brooklyn Sunday School Union, and Judge Lewis J. Fawcett delivered brief addresses. The Homecrest school was organized Oct. 29, 1899, by Edward L. Tibbals, pastor, then a student in Union Seminary. — South Third Street church, Brooklyn, Dr. Newell W. Wells pastor, helped celebrate last week the one hundredth birthday of one of its oldest members, Joseph DeLong. Mr. DeLong has been a member of South Third Street church for over fifty years and has been a regular attendant at the services until last year.

A Minister from the Home of Golf—Prominent members of New York Presbytery were afforded the opportunity last Thursday evening to meet (at a dinner given by his host, Gilbert Colgate), the Scotch minister who has been supplying the pulpit of Rutgers church for a month past, Dr. Patrick Playfair. He is pastor of the Church of Scotland in St. Andrew's.

Brief Items—Dr. T. Bayard Collins will address the ministers' association Nov. 10 on "The Promise of Socialism."—J. N. Farquhar of the Calcutta Y. M. C. A. will lecture in Union Seminary Nov. 10. —First church of Huntington, L. I., Dr. J. Jeffrey Johnstone pastor, is planning to enlarge its parish house. Women of the congregation have contributed over $1,000.—A memorial service was held recently at Central church in honor of Robert C. Ogden.—The new educational headquarters for the blind, opened the past summer at 78 Schermerhorn street, Brooklyn, are open to visitors daily from 9 to 5. The superintendent is Eben T. Morford.—The Union Missionary Training Institute of Brooklyn held its annual birthday reception Oct. 27. Dr. John H. Kerr, pastor of Arlington Avenue church, was one of the speakers.—The Christian Endeavorers of Brooklyn eighth division last week in Central church organized a class for those who desire to take the examination for the C. E. efficiency degree.

REPRODUCE CITIZENSHIP CONFERENCE

Participants in Portland Meeting to Speak—Socialists to Have Church of Their Own—Dr. Wycoff Retires from Pastorate.

PITTSBURG — The Pittsburg committee on Christian citizenship, in cooperation with local Christian organizations, is planning to reproduce in Pittsburg the salient features of the recent world's Christian citizenship conference held in Portland, Ore. The date has been set for Dec. 1 and 2. The meetings will be held in Exposition Hall and Second church. Among the speakers will be Ng Poon Chew of San Francisco, ~~Dr. William~~ M. Paden of Salt Lake City, Professor O. F. Davis of Richmond, Wis., Professor Von Kleinschmidt of Indiana state reformatory, Dr. C. W. Wylie and Dr. George Montgomery of Pittsburg.

Lutherans Out of Campaign—Sunday, Nov. 2, the Pittsburg evangelistic committee presented the pledge cards for subscriptions to cover the expense of the "Billy" Sunday evangelistic campaign. An effort is being made to get a guaranty fund of $100,000 from as many individuals as possible. The prayer meeting committee has been selected and is composed of one minister from each denomination taking part. The Lutheran churches of the city have announced that they will not take part in the campaign.

Socialists Start Church—On Sunday, Oct. 26, a mass meeting of socialists was held in Pittsburg for the purpose of starting a Christian socialist church. It was decided to call it the United People's church. A committee of fifteen men was appointed with instructions to prepare a constitution and creed.

Have Pledges of $90,000—The committee of fifty business men organized to raise a fund of $300,000 for the purpose of erecting a new administration building for Western Theological Seminary reported over $90,000 subscribed at noon Thursday, Oct. 30, and by a unanimous vote decided to continue the campaign until Monday, Nov. 3, so that an opportunity could be given to members of churches to contribute who had not been canvassed.

Celebrate Anniversary Nov. 7—The Pittsburg Association for the Improvement of the Poor has selected Nov. 7 as the date when the thirty-seventh anniversary will be observed. The meeting will be held in Carnegie Hall, North side, and admission will only be by ticket.

Oldest Preacher Retires—Several hundred friends of Cornelius Wycoff, D. D., gathered at the Wycoff home in the parsonage of old Bethel church to celebrate the seventy-sixth birthday of Dr. Wycoff, who closed a forty-year pastorate and retired from the ministry Oct. 26. Dr. Wycoff was not only the oldest preacher in presbytery in point of service, but Bethel church, over which he presided, is 135 years old and has had only four pastors. Addresses were made by Dr. Joseph Duff, Dr. Stephen A. Hunter and Rev. H. O. Gilson.

ENDEAVORERS TO AID LOCAL CHURCH

"Help Our Church" Campaign Is to Start Soon—Reach Many Italians at Small Expense—Mormons Grow in Chicago.

CHICAGO—During December and January the Christian Endeavorers of Chicago are to have a "help our church" campaign, when a special effort will be made to assist the church and denomination to which the individual society belongs. The plan has been outlined by the union officers and will at the same time be put into operation over Illinois through the state union. The standards of the campaign include attendance at the evening service of all the members in a body, and a systematic effort to invite others to that service. The prayer meeting committee is charged with obtaining attendance and participation at the midweek meeting. A series of talks on the boards of the denomination is to be given at the society prayer meeting and a mission study class formed with special reference to denominational work. Support of denominational finances and the Sunday school is included in the plan.

Pianos to Build Chapel—The recently started work among the Hollanders has progressed to the point that a building is needed. Services are conducted in Dutch and English. The audience of forty or more meets at the minister's home. The pastor, Rev. Peter VanWuerden, receives no salary and hopes to accumulate a considerable sum toward the building through commissions on sales of pianos, to which work he is devoting part of his time.

Reach 2,252 Persons for $170—The last report of the work at West Superior Street mission among the poorer Italians shows that a total of 2,252 persons were ministered to through the mission and its dozen classes and religious services. The work has been done at an expense through the Church Extension Board of only $170 a month, including salaries and rent. Larger quarters will be obtained soon, as the flat into which the mission is now crowded long ago failed to accommodate the crowds.

Mormons Dedicate Two Churches—Joseph Smith, head of the Mormons, and an elder and a bishop of the Utah church last Saturday and Sunday dedicated two new churches, one in South Perry avenue and the other in Wrightwood avenue. President Smith in the course of his address Sunday is reported to have defended his several wives.

Interesting Items Condensed—A Christian Endeavor society in which the language used is Bohemian has been organized at Bohemian settlement.—Class D of Third church, for thirty-nine years taught by the late Miss Anna E. Ewing, has elected A. G. Fegert, president of the City C. E. Union, as leader. — Of seventy-four C. E. union officers each holds an average of three official places in his local church.—The executive committee of 100 in charge of the preparations for the international Sunday school convention met last Monday. Meetings of superintendents have been held in various churches to plan for the big gathering.—The first meeting of the Social Union takes place Friday, Nov. 7, at the LaSalle. Dr. C. F. Wishart of Pittsburg Seminary will speak.—Rev. B. B. Sutcliffe, formerly pastor of Ridgeway Avenue church, has become assistant superintendent of the men's department in Moody Institute.—Dr. J. A. Macdonald of Toronto preached at the University of Chicago and at the Sunday Evening Club last Sunday.—Rev. N. Bosio, Waldensian pastor in Rome, Italy, preached twice in the First Italian church recently.

City Officials There—Community night in connection with the twenty-fifth anniversary of Olivet Institute brought out the aldermen and the police and fire officials of the district, and tied the institute to the community in a way which has never been done before.

Builds Parish House—A parish house to cost $2,500 has just been started at Harvey, Rev. F. A. Johnson pastor. The building will include gymnasium, shower baths and a stage for entertainments. Attendance at Sunday school and preaching services is growing rapidly.

Will Establish Home for Aged—Presbytery last Monday authorized the special committee which has been investigating a home for aged people to obtain property and take over the charter under which the home at Olivet Institute has been operated.

Ordain Dr. McClure's Son—The son of the president of McCormick Seminary, J. G. K. McClure, Jr., was ordained by presbytery last Monday evening in the chapel of McCormick Seminary. He goes to Iron River, Mich., as pastor.

Hear Plans of Extension Board—Nearly 150 ministers and laymen gathered at the church extension dinner Monday at the Great Northern. The plans of the board were presented briefly, Chairman George N. Luccock presiding. The speakers included Dr. W. S. Marquis, Assistant Superintendent W. E. Parker, Jr., Rev. F. L. Selden, Rev. W. Clyde Smith, in charge of immigrant work, and Superintendent E. P. Hill. Former Moderator Samuel J. Niccolls of St. Louis, Rev. J. T. Hood, chairman of synodical home missions, and Rev. R. R. Marquis, Illinois moderator, were guests.

RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS

Oklahoma—First church, Tahlequah, is conducting cottage prayer meetings preparatory to decision meetings.

Kansas — Revival meetings were recently conducted at Bern by Evangelist Nance of Atchison. —Dodge City has recently passed through a spiritual revival under the leadership of Lowry and Moody, which has resulted in large additions to churches. A number of church members have become tithers. All parts of the Presbyterian church, Dr. J. C. berger, pastor, have been strengthened.

Missouri—Faith church, South St. Joseph, is engaged in a series of evangelistic services in which the pastor is being assisted by Rev. James M. Walton of Trenton. Brookdale, Mo., church is also having revival services at which the preaching is being done by Rev. J. H. Weaver of Fairfax. Many other churches are planning such meetings.

Illinois—LeRoy church is in the midst of a spiritual revival under the able leadership of Evangelist Joseph C. Ludgate. Among the special features of the campaign was an automobile meeting on Saturday night. The evangelist used an automobile as a pulpit and a large number were present. —Meetings for fifteen days were held recently at Indian, a country church in Mattoon Presbytery, the mother of Presbyterianism in the county.

STATED CLERK IS MADE MODERATOR

California Synod Honors Dr. Young — Seminary Alumni Elect Officers—Oakland First Church Officers Resign.

SAN FRANCISCO—Great satisfaction is being expressed throughout the churches over the unanimous choice of William S. Young, D. D., of Los Angeles to be moderator of synod for the ensuing year. His fair rulings at the recent meeting of synod in Santa Rosa won him additional praise. He will continue to be stated clerk of synod, in which capacity he has already served faithfully for many years.

Alumni Elect Officers—At the recent meeting of the alumni association of San Francisco Seminary Rev. Alexander Eakin of St. John's church, San Francisco, was elected president, Rev. A. F. Freuling of Vacaville vice president, Rev. A. R. Willis of San Francisco secretary-treasurer, and Rev. G. G. Eldredge of Berkeley orator. The alumni traveling scholarship fund was resubscribed.

Protest on Murder Trial—Great unanimity of opinion was expressed by all branches of religious organizations at a mass meeting on Sunday, Oct. 26, to protest against the Kiev ritual murder trial.

Two Churches in Limelight — Two east shore churches in the limelight last week were St. James in the Fourth avenue terrace district, which was dedicated by presbytery and over which Rev. Charles Campbell, its indefatigable organizer, was installed as pastor, and First church, Oakland, where through presbytery's action in compelling the pastor, F. L. Goodspeed, D. D., to reconsider his resignation and return to his pulpit, a condition was brought about which resulted in the resignation of twelve of the fifteen officers of the church.

Brief Items—A committee of 100 has been selected to assist the federal council to prepare exhibits and a program to show Christian advance at the 1915 exposition.—William Rader, formerly pastor of Calvary church, on his request has been demitted from the ministry to engage in literary work.—Rev. W. K. Howe has been reelected chairman of synod's home mission committee.

Presbyterians have thirty churches and preaching stations in Alaska.

DR. W. S. HOLT LEAVES PACIFIC COAST

Long Service in Oregon Remembered by Friends —Joint Session of Two Synods Develops Fraternal Feeling.

PORTLAND, ORE.—The removal of Dr. W. S. Holt from this city to Philadelphia to take up the work of associate secretary of the Board of Ministerial Relief and Sustentation has been the occasion of a number of receptions tendered by various Presbyterian agencies. The Presbyterian Ministerial Association gave a reception to Dr. and Mrs. Holt and presented them with some handsome silver spoons and a carving set. Dr. Holt has been in the Synod of Oregon almost as long as any other minister now living. After twelve years of missionary work in China the Foreign Board sent him to the Pacific Northwest to secure a location and open up a mission to the Chinese in these parts. That was in 1885. The survey was made and the work started at Portland. After twelve years' service as a missionary to the Chinese he was made synodical superintendent under auspices of Home Board. In this capacity he served twelve years, as he had already done both in China and with the Chinese in Portland. Four years ago he became the Pacific coast field secretary of the Home Board. Now he goes to serve the Relief Board.

Two Synods Join—The recent meeting of the Synod of Oregon in Portland and the Synod of Washington at Vancouver, a few miles away across the Columbia, brought both bodies together for an all-day meeting of a fraternal and inspirational character at Vancouver and an evening meeting in Portland which was preceded by a banquet. At this meeting Mayor H. R. Albee, who is a member of the Presbyterian church, presided and addresses were made by Doctors W. S. Holt and Mark A. Matthews.

Four New Churches—Two churches have new houses of worship nearing completion. Westminster will have the finest and best equipped house of worship on the east side and one that will command attention anywhere. Piedmont's new church building is demanded by the growth of the beautiful community where it serves. Rose City Park is enlarging and remodeling to meet the larger demands of its growing work. Anabel has added greatly to the size and beauty of its auditorium. This church will be the first of the quartet to be ready for dedication, the date being set for Nov. 16.

HEAR THAT MORMONS ARE ACTIVE

OHIO—The women's presbyterial society of Cincinnati is investigating a report that a Mormon church holding regular services has recently located in Cincinnati.—A reception to members of the congregation followed the recent installation of Rev. T. L. Rynder as pastor of Plain City church.—Richard C. Hughes, D. D., secretary of state university work of the Board of Education, while in Youngstown Oct. 28 and 29 was given a luncheon by the Presbyterian ministers and other prominent Presbyterians of the city and adjacent territory.—Bryan church has recently been repaired and refrescoed at an expense of about $1,000. The pastor is Rev. Edgar S. Marshall.—During the past year a larger amount of money has been contributed for benevolence and more members received into Greenville church than during any year of the pastorate of Rev. C. C. McKinney.

Reopen Flooded Church—First church of Middletown was one of the churches that suffered serious damage by the flood in March. The interior of the church was almost totally wrecked. The pews, the floor and the carpet were destroyed and the pipe organ damaged. The cost of repairing the building was about $4,000. The reopening of the auditorium for worship was the occasion of great rejoicing and the day was marked by the largest Sunday offering that has been made for years. The congregation has decided to purchase a new manse. This step was necessary that the growing Sunday school might use the present manse for additional classrooms until a new Sunday school building can be erected. The work at Oakland chapel, a mission of the First church, is thriving under the leadership of J. M. Murchison of Lane Seminary.

IN AND ABOUT ST. LOUIS

ST. LOUIS—Lindenwood College will be presided over temporarily by John Fenton Hendy, D. D., of Jefferson City. Dr. Hendy was for many years president of Emporia College, later of Oswego College, and was for twelve years pastor of First church, Jefferson City. He took charge of Lindenwood Tuesday, Oct. 28, and will remain until the board of trustees elect a successor to the late Dr. George Frederick Ayres.

Women Study Missions—Women of the Interdenominational Missionary Social Union are in session every morning this week except Thursday for mission study. Mrs. Henry W. Hunter of Chicago is the teacher. Two textbooks, "The New America" and "The King's Business," will be studied for home and foreign missions respectively. The class participates Thursday in an annual all-day meeting of the Missionary Social Union at the Union Avenue church. Last year 1,000 women were present.

SUGGESTIVE ITEMS FROM SIX STATES

Put Their Organ to Good Use—A musical program is being given Monday afternoons by First church, Freeport, Ill. There is no admission charge and no collection and the public is cordially invited to take advantage of the opportunity to hear good music.

Any Longer Record?—W. R. Cowan is now completing his forty-fifth year as Sunday school superintendent of First church, Oskaloosa, Iowa. This record exceeds that of Miss Elizabeth Farrand of Trenton, N. J., who recently completed a service of forty-three years.

Build Addition Themselves—Members of Westminster Bible class of Washburn Street church, Scranton, Pa., are building for themselves an addition to the church. On a recent Saturday afternoon work was started under the direction of the president of the class. The pastor, Dr. Ebenezer Flack, assisted in mixing the concrete. The growth of the class demanded larger quarters.

Sermon in Moving Picture Theater — First church, Englewood, N. J., is to transfer its vesper service to one of the moving picture theaters of the city, where the quartet and minister, Rev. Robert Davis, will endeavor to reach a large unchurched population. There will be an address for adults, and an address for children, illustrated with action pictures.

Canvass Parish in Afternoon—A hundred members of Central church, Detroit, Mich., on a recent Sunday afternoon visited 3,500 homes and apartments and extended invitations to 11,000 men and women to attend services of that church. It is estimated that at least 3,000 of those called upon attend no church. The preference of each one visited was noted and names will be given to other denominations interested.

Take Church to Immigrants—Report has recently been made of a series of seventy services in eight centers among the coal miners of Southern Colorado during the summer. More than 8,000 hearers were reached in this special campaign which was undertaken at the direction of the immigration department of the Home Board. The party consisted of Rev. Howard V. Yergin and Mrs. Yergin, W. F. McDermott, a McCormick Seminary student, and Joseph Leska, an Americanized immigrant, a student at Dubuque German College and Seminary. At each of the points visited meetings were held for a week or ten days. Bibles or portions of them were sold in six languages and the audience was usually racially heterogeneous. No collection was taken and in most places the public school buildings were used for services, which were religious throughout.

HELPS WEAKER CHURCHES

MINNESOTA—The newly organized church extension board of Minneapolis recently gave Stewart Memorial chapel $6,000, which nearly wipes out the debt upon this church, which was erected several years ago. The pastor, Rev. C. D. Darling, led the movement to organize the board and was given a purse of $126 by the congregation. Rosedale church, Minneapolis, is to receive $4,000, Homewood church, $3,500. Rev. W. R. Harshaw is chairman of the board.—The beginning of the fortieth year of the ministry of Dr. M. P. Edwards at Dayton Avenue church, St. Paul, Minn., was observed Oct. 26. Dr. Edwards was called by this church six months after its organization upon his graduation from Auburn Seminary.

TRUSTEES PROVIDE A MANSE

IOWA—Dedication of the manse of Shellsburg church occurred Oct. 24. The building cost $3,400 and all but $600 was pledged before the structure was begun. A committee of the trustees solicited the funds and oversaw the construction of the building.—Rev. W. H. Sinclair, having received a call from the Colfax church, offered his resignation as pastor of Clarksville church. The congregation voted not to accept the resignation and raised the salary. Presbytery refused to dissolve the pastoral relation and Mr. Sinclair will remain on the field. —The Sidney congregation is urging its pastor to reconsider his resignation. The new church will be ready for dedication in a few weeks.

SAYS SOME SHOW NO GROWTH

PENNSYLVANIA—Dr. R. P. Daubenspeck, retiring moderator of Pennsylvania Synod, told delegates in his address that of the 1,100 churches in synod 202 did not add a single member during the year.—Jeffersonville, Pa., church celebrated its twentieth anniversary recently by special services participated in by former pastors. Among the speakers were Rev. William Tatlock of Woodstown, N. J., Dr. U. F. Smiley of Wilmington, Del., Rev. I. F. Wagner, Dr. T. R. Beeber and Dr. W. H. Reed.—At the first communion service

Every Week Is Home Mission Week at Dubuque

Every man who studies at Dubuque German College and Seminary is a potential home missionary. Young men from Turkey and Armenia, Spain and Mexico, Bohemia and Germany study with us. In addition there are many from the homes of foreign parents in this country. Scores of these young men go out as preachers to their fellows in America. All are imbued with Christian American ideals and trained for leadership.

During the summer vacation our students do home mission work in various foreign centers. One visited Mexican families in Texas. Another was interpreter and speaker to foreigners in Colorado coal camps. Some preached to groups in various large cities, and others ministered in country churches where large numbers of immigrants have settled.

We are helping to teach new Americans the Christian solution of all problems. We teach them a patriotism which makes the latest newcomer declare that he is an American.

Many of the young men at Dubuque are earning their way through school. Generous friends have provided college buildings. Many are asking to have a part in this "factory of home mission workers."

of the recently organized church of Krantz Creek, Hallam, Pa., there was but one absent member. The acting pastor is J. A. L. Smith.

NEWS OF SEVEN WESTERN STATES

Oregon—Twelve new Sunday schools have been organized recently in Grande Ronde Presbytery and all vacant churches supplied.

Wyoming—Laramie Presbytery at its recent meeting at Colorado Springs heartily indorsed the country life work of the Home Board.

Montana—A lot has been bought for Billings church, and it is hoped that a new building may be erected next year.—The Synod of Montana is making strenuous efforts to raise the $100,000 necessary to secure the promise of $50,000 by J. J. Hill to Deer Lodge College.

California—St. James church, Oakland, which was built by the manual labor of Dr. T. O. Hart, was recently dedicated. Dr. Hart officiated at these services.—A friend of Oxnard church has consented to give half the value of a new building to cost $20,000. Plans are being made to proceed with the work.

Washington—Westminster church of Everett, organized with fourteen members, has been enrolled by presbytery. Rev. C. A. Dolph, pastor, also serves the church at Clinton, which is now engaged in the erection of a church.—Westminster church of Anacortes is building a manse which is to be up to date in all respects. The pastor is Dr. E. M. Calvin.

Idaho—Officers and teachers of Boise First church Sabbath school, Dr. E. S. Owen superintendent, held their annual conference and supper Oct. 17. Addresses were delivered setting forth the plans for the future.—On Sunday evening, Oct. 19, the five Presbyterian churches of Boise held a union service in First church. The sermon was by Rev. G. William Barnum, new pastor of Second church.—John J. Dalton, D. D., pastor of Idaho Falls church, who a short time ago underwent a serious surgical operation, will be able to resume work in a few weeks.

Colorado—The new church at Otis dedicated recently is the fruition of long hopes in this semiarid district of the state. The church is a frame structure, seating 400 and costing $5,000. This was made possible by the liberality of one of the elders, a leading cattleman. It was dedicated free of debt by the pastor, Rev. W. G. White, Akron, assisted by Rev. W. L. Breckenridge, Yuma.—Rev. A. Wilbur Liggitt has taken up the work in Park county at Fairplay and Alma with a great sweep of country in between. Under the plan of denominational cooperation of the Colorado Home Missions Council, the Methodist Church withdrew its forces from the field and this leaves a county to be evangelized under a comprehensive plan to be made by the home missions committee of presbytery. Mr. Liggitt has been for some time an assistant secretary in the Denver Y. M. C. A.

ELDER IN CHARGE OF DISTRICT

NEW JERSEY—West Side church, Englewood, is arranging its parish into districts to be presided over by elders, assisted by the deacons. A large map showing all streets is studded with pins to show the location of members. The aim is to induce members in each district to assist the minister and elder to know every family in the community which has no church connection. Later in the season a census of the entire west side of the city is to be made.

Brief Items—Morning and evening congregations at Atlantic City, N. J., First church, under Rev. H. M. Mellen, are larger than at any time in the history of the church.—The new building of the Y. W. C. A. in Newark is being dedicated this week.—First church, Rutherford, Dr. Richard Earle Locke, pastor, had a fiftieth anniversary Nov. 2.

One Hundred Years Old—The one hundredth anniversary of First church, Paterson, was celebrated by the congregation and pastor, Rev. C. E. Macartney, with special services of Oct. 26. Old-time members held reunions throughout the day and the following week. The historical sermon in the morning was preached by the pastor, and in the afternoon the congregation and Sunday school united to unveil a tablet erected to the memory of Sarah Colt, who founded the Sunday school in 1793. The celebration began at 12 o'clock Saturday night, when the bell in the steeple was tolled 100 times to usher in the new century.

ASKS VOTES AGAINST SALOONS

ILLINOIS—Among the many individuals who are lending their aid to overthrow the liquor traffic is Louis F. Gumbart of Macomb, Ill., who has sent to the religious press an appeal to voters to cast their ballots for no public official who will not pledge himself to the enactment and enforcement of laws for the suppression of the saloon and its attendant evils.—A recent report of LaRose, Ill., Union Sunday school shows that the average attendance during the past year has increased twenty in an enrollment which now is only 146.—A new Sunday school of thirty-one members was organized at Columbiana, Ill., Oct. 12 by Sunday School Missionary E. A. Smith. Mr. Smith organized another Sunday school at Eldred Oct. 26. Neither of these schools is within four or five miles of any church.

ACTIVITIES OF LAYMEN

Open Season with Banquet—The opening of work of the men's club of First church, Richmond, Ind., was recently observed with a banquet.

Spokane Men Busy—Work for men under the direction of the evangelistic committee of the Spokane Interchurch Council has been planned. An aggressive campaign will be made to urge families to attend the church of their choice.

South Bend Men Meet—Five churches of South Bend, Ind., brought together 200 men on a recent Monday night to hear Dr. W. C. Covert and Dr. F. M. Fox of the National Brotherhood to tell of recent achievements among men in Chicago.

Urge Civic Advance—Under the lead of the federated brotherhood of Jackson, Mich., churches an effort is being made to have the commission form of government adopted.—Plans have been made to organize a men's club at Central church, Joliet, Ill.

Would Enlist All Men—Effort is being made by the brotherhood committee of Ewing Presbytery to enlist in some organization the 800 men and boys estimated to belong to churches of that presbytery. The committee recommends that special effort be made to obtain the services of laymen in connection with the every-member canvass.

Ohio Boosts Men's Work—Dr. J. T. Henderson, national brotherhood secretary, was one of the speakers at the conference on men's work in connection with the recent meeting of Ohio Synod. Others who took part were Dr. R. R. Bigger of Cleveland and Dr. W. F. Wier of Wooster.—Under the direction of the men's club, Edgerton, Ohio, church has been decorated and painted. Rev. R. P. Jones is pastor.

Banquet at College Celebration

Los Angeles Presbytery has authorized the moderator, Dr. William B. Gantz of Highland Park church, to appoint a special committee to arrange for a monster banquet Dec. 15. The banquet will be given in honor of the quarter-centennial of Occidental College. Among special guests will be Moderator John Timothy Stone and William Shaw of Boston, general secretary of the Christian Endeavor movement. This banquet is one feature of a three days' celebration of the quarter-centennial of the college. Besides having meetings and reviewing the history of the college, an important part of the program will be an afternoon devoted to dedicating the new buildings on the new campus.

Elders to Have Convention

A convention of elders will be held in Fourth church, Trenton, N. J., Dec. 5 under the auspices of presbytery. The elder in history and in modern church life will be considered by various speakers. Dr. A. T. Taylor has the convention in charge and a number of prominent speakers are expected, including Dr. Charles Erdman of Princeton.

Ohio Ministers Hold Retreat

Dayton Presbytery held a "retreat" at Camden, Ohio, Oct. 27-28 in which deep interest was taken. The following themes were considered:

NEWS FROM VARIOUS STATES

Texas—Rev. R. Thomsen, pastor of Central church, Amarillo, Tex., has been given two months' vacation on account of ill health.

Michigan—Plans are under way for the installation of a gymnasium apparatus in a vacant building by the Flint church.—A pipe organ is being installed in Deckerville church.

West Virginia—Exercises incident to the rededication of the church at New Martinsville were recently held. The church was damaged by flood last spring and has been redecorated throughout.

North Dakota—Home mission oversight in Bismarck Presbytery will be increased by the partition of the territory into six parts, each under the care of a member of the committee.—Rev. J. C. O'Connor has been demitted from the ministry.

Wisconsin—One of the series of schools of Sunday school methods being held under the direction of Dr. Gerritt Verkuyl was started at LaCrosse Nov. 2. Rev. F. A. Clarke of LaCrosse and Rev. Benjamin Thomas of Galesvile were among the assistants at the conference.

Kansas—Rev. H. C. Bradbury made the address at the laying of the corner stone of Lincoln, Kan., church Oct. 21. This event took place just thirty-eight years after the laying of the corner stone of the first Presbyterian church in that town. It was founded by Mr. Bradbury. Rev. Jay Hanna is pastor. It is hoped that the structure will be completed by Christmas.

Indiana—Evansville churches show healthy activity. The new building for Jefferson Avenue church, Rev. A. D. Light pastor, is progressing. Rev. John Kennedy, pastor of Walnut Street church, is giving strong sermons on vice. Plans are being perfected for repairs to First Avenue church which will cost $10,000. Committees have been appointed looking to the erection of a Sunday school hall to cost $10,000 as an addition to Parke Memorial church, Rev. W. B. Lile pastor.

Tennessee—An every-member canvass of the membership of Mary F. Pepper Memorial church, Springfield, brought a generous check made out to the ladies' aid society by the church's venerable benefactor, Thomas Pepper, Sr. The church now has ample funds to pay off all financial obligations due to the litigation over the church property in connection with the suit brought by the Cumberland Church and to renovate and repair the building extensively. Rev. Theron Alexander is minister.

Nebraska—Resolutions were adopted at the recent meeting of the state W. C. T. U. at Fremont urging the writing of personal letters to congressmen to favor the passing of the Hobson bill. The convention also favored the movement for equal suffrage, favored a law demanding a clean bill of health before the issuance of marriage licenses, remonstrated against Sunday theaters and sports and deplored the extreme styles of women's dresses. The convention condemned the state fair management for opening the grounds on Sunday.

Missouri—A Sunday school institute was recently held at Westminster church, St. Joseph, preceding the meeting of synod. Among the speakers were Dr. S. B. Ferguson, Dr. Gerritt Verkuyl, Dr. George C. Fracker, Rev. Charles A. Arnold and Dr. Harry C. Rogers.—A country life institute was held at New Providence church, Manon county, Oct. 23 and 24, which proved to be probably the most helpful event in the late history of this old church. Besides the talks on farm and school topics, there were two addresses of a religious nature, one by Rev. W. F. Rudolph of Clarksville, Mo., on "The Church and the Community," the other by Dr. J. H. Speer, Missouri's synodical superintendent, "Praying and Plowing."

New York—At the beginning of his tenth year the pastor of Fourth church, Syracuse, Rev. Thomas A. Fenton was presented with $500 by the ladies' aid society.—The church at Pleasantville, N. Y., has attained self-support and is using the rebuilt house of worship.—Under the auspices of Binghamton Christian Endeavor Union there will be held in that city a missionary pageant somewhat similar to the plan of the "World in Chicago" held last spring.—Ministers and elders of Utica presbytery heard Moderator John Timothy Stone at supper Oct. 21 by invitation of the officers of First church, Utica. He emphasized the importance of the every-member canvass and later addressed a congregation in the church.

TEMPERANCE MEN RALLY TO HOBSON

Led by ex-Governor J. Frank Hanly of Indiana a large number of conspicuous temperance leaders have united to appeal to opponents of the saloon in all the country to exercise what influence and aid they are able to persuade the citizens of Alabama that Congressman Richard P. Hobson should be elected senator from that state. The Alabama senatorial election is the first conducted under the new amendment to the national constitution which provides that senators shall be chosen by direct vote of the people. In view of Mr. Hobson's widely known sentiments in favor of prohibition and especially his authorship of a proposed amendment to prohibit the sale of liquors throughout the United States, the liquor interests have gone into Alabama to make a fierce fight against him. The object of the appeal which Governor Hanly is circulating is to balance these liquor influences with as determined a temperance influence in his favor.

Among those who join Mr. Hanly in signing the appeal are Dr. Francis E. Clark, president of the Christian Endeavor, Governor Haines of Maine, Evangelist William A. Sunday, General Superintendent P. A. Baker of the National Anti-Saloon League, and the superintendents of nearly all the denominational temperance committees and of the different state Anti-Saloon leagues.

MINISTERIAL OBITUARY

Rev. Stephen Taylor deKins, pastor of Richmond Heights church, St. Louis, died Oct. 20. He was born in New York in 1849 and had been a minister thirty-five years with pastorates in New York, Illinois, Indiana, Tennessee and Missouri. He went to St. Louis nine years ago.

Rev. T. Cummings Beattie of Pasadena died Sept. 22. Mr. Beattie was born in Scotchtown, N. Y., in 1854 and after studying in Princeton College and Union Seminary was ordained in Chester, N. Y., in 1888. His first pastorate was in that city and thereafter he labored in Las Animas, Colo., Albuquerque, N. M., Pasadena, Cal., where he assisted Rev. Malcolm James McLeod, and Garvalia, Cal.

Dr. George Frederic Ayres, president of Lindenwood College for Women, St. Charles, Mo., and moderator last year of St. Louis Presbytery, died Oct. 24 at his home. Dr. Ayres was born in Missouri in 1865 and was a graduate of Westminster College and of McCormick Seminary and studied in Germany. He was a professor for three years in Washington College, Tennessee, served as principal of the synodical college of Texas and was head of the Ladies' College of Kansas City. Following a pastorate at Poplar Bluff, Mo., he became president of Lindenwood in 1902 and had a highly successful career in that position. He had been in ill health for several months before his death. The funeral was conducted under the direction of Dr. S. J. Niccolls of St. Louis.

Dr. Elijah W. Stoddard, pastor of Succasunna church, New Jersey, died Oct. 30, and was buried after services in his own church last Sabbath morning. Excepting Dr. David Tully of Media, Pa., Dr. Stoddard was the oldest Presbyterian minister in active service anywhere in the country, having passed his ninety-fourth birthday last April. He had been a minister sixty-one years and after three other pastorates—one in Pennsylvania and two in New York state—came to Succasunna fifty years ago. He carried all the pastoral and preaching service in that parish until a year ago, when the congregation employed an assistant. Though Dr. Stoddard was a man of very patriarchial appearance, wearing a long white beard that flowed voluminously over his chest, he was more concerned in young people's work than any other feature of church organization. He made it a special point to attend with his young people all Christian Endeavor conventions within reach. Dr. Stoddard was a graduate of Amherst College and Union Seminary.

CLERGY AND LAITY

Moderator John Timothy Stone recently addressed the Presbyterian Union of Buffalo, N. Y.

Rev. James M. Bain, Sunday school missionary for Mankato Presbytery, recently fell and broke his arm while removing charts from the wall of Worthington, Minn., church.

Dr. Philip H. Mowry has recently closed forty years of pastorate of First Chester, Pa., church. He has been in the ministry fifty years and is still active as a pastor and preacher.

Dr. John Douglas Adam, former pastor of Munn Avenue church, East Orange, N. J., has returned from two years in England and will lecture this winter in Hartford Theological Seminary. He will supply Rutgers church, New York City, November and December.

Dr. Arthur J. Brown, secretary of the Foreign Board, sailed from New York Nov. 1 to Bremen, en route for The Hague, where he will attend the meeting of the continuation committee of the Edinburgh Conference. The chairman of the committee, John R. Mott, sailed three weeks ago.

Commander of Salvation Army Here

General Bramwell Booth, now the commander of the Salvation Army, landed in New York Friday, Oct. 31. General Booth, who is making his first visit to this country, will deliver a series of lectures on a tour which will take him as far north as Winnipeg.

Financial Situation

Many Problems Presented in Administering Income Tax Provisions—Bankers Differ on Merits of Currency Law.

Difficulties which have arisen in the interpretation of the recent income tax law and the details of the proposed currency measure are occupying a large amount of attention among business men and bankers. A committee of experts of the treasury department worked for several weeks on a set of rules interpreting the provisions of the income tax in order to make the intent as plain as possible to the thousands of people who are affected by it. Many of the larger banks have organized information bureaus to assist their customers in untangling their problems. Several of the larger newspapers of the country have also undertaken to answer inquiries in regard to the income tax. According to the principles laid down in the regulations issued by the treasury department, all employers are required to deduct from the salaries of employes the 1 per cent tax if the annual amount of salary is more than $3,000. If the employe is entitled to exemptions according to the provisions of the law, a certificate of this fact must be filed with the employer to be sent to the treasury department with the amount of the tax less the exemption. In the same way a tenant paying rent of $3,000 or more will send to the government the 1 per cent tax on this amount unless the landlord files with him a claim of exemption. In the case of an unmarried man with a salary of $5,000 and an income from bond interest of $300 he is advised to file his claim for exemption of $3,000, permitted by the law, with his employer and let the tax be paid upon the excess salary and upon the bond interest.

Experts Continue to Differ—The proposed national currency act and the substitute thereto suggested by F. A. Vanderlip, who is president of the largest national bank, were the subjects of considerable discussion by the delegates to the Investment Bankers' Association which held a convention recently in Chicago. Members of the association spoke vigorously both for and against the administration measure. Some of the city bankers protest that the framers of the bill have confused national banks with some of the private banking concerns which are large promoters of industrial corporations.

Parcel Post Brings Big Revenue—It is expected that parcel post receipts for the calendar year will increase the income of fourth class mail by $15,500,000. It is expected that at the end of the fiscal year, next July, the postoffice department will on account of the parcel post show a surplus of at least $10,000,000. Meanwhile railroad managers are appealing to the government for increased compensation. They say they have had to carry mail matter which has yielded these increased receipts without a cent of increased pay, and they were working for inadequate compensation before the parcel post packages were added to the mails. Railroad officials say that the limit on parcel post packages was increased to twenty pounds without warning from the postoffice department and that judging from the present state of affairs the roads will have to carry packages over eleven pounds for nothing.

Minister Stops Inventing—"A few years ago," said a successful pastor recently, "when fireless cookers first came on the market, it popped into my head that it would be a good idea to have a fireless cooker so arranged that by simply turning a button articles could be partly cooked right in the cooker without the waste attended by heating them on the stove and then putting them into the cooker. I talked the matter over with one of my elders and he wanted to finance a company to manufacture the article. I even went so far as to begin operations to take out a patent, and discovered that up to that time nobody had hit upon the same scheme. But I found this also, that the more I thought about my fireless cooker and the profits therefrom, the less I thought about my church work, and I said to myself, 'I am a minister and not an inventor and I'd better attend to the Lord's business.' So I dropped the whole matter. Next year a company in Michigan brought out an arrangement very similar to the one I had almost invented. But I wasn't sorry."

Paying Freight on Water Is Costly—In connection with the modern move toward efficiency in farming have come to the front better methods of caring for farm products and marketing them. Investigation has shown that the amount of moisture in corn shipped to principal grain markets in the West from July to October is about 13 per cent or less. From November to April the moisture in corn runs from 18 to 20 per cent of its weight. This means that on corn shipped soon after the harvest there is paid freight on nearly two and one-half pounds of water to each bushel of corn. Under the proposed regrading of grain No. 2 corn may contain only 15½ per cent of moisture. This means that most of the corn shipped to market immediately after harvest will under present conditions bring a much lower price than it would were the grain thoroughly dried before being sold.

Synods Plan Missionary Advance

Urge Credit for Bible Study—A conference on Sunday school work under the direction of Dr. H. M. Steidley of Fort Morgan preceded the meeting of Colorado Synod at Colorado Springs. Rev. C. K. Powell of Brighton was elected moderator. Synod indorsed a movement in the state for the granting of high school credits for Bible study. Rev. L. C. Hills, formerly assistant pastor of First church, Colorado Springs, who last summer conducted special services for automobilists on a mountain near Cheyenne, Wyo., led a conference on evangelistic work. Among the special speakers at synod were Doctors E. P. Hill of Chicago and C. H. French of Huron, S. D. Considerable attention was paid to the work for men in the state.

Elect "Dark Horse"—Pennsylvania Synod met in Waynesburg in the extreme southwestern corner of the state. It is the seat of Waynesburg College, which has done a good educational work and has sent out a number of distinguished graduates, including Dr. W. H. Black of Missouri Valley College and Senator Cummings of Iowa. It was received from the Cumberland body. The entire county of which Waynesburg is the county seat is without a saloon and as a result boasts of an empty jail most of the time. The Presbyterian church, a union of Presbyterian and Cumberland, has a membership of 620. Its pastor of D. J. Calvin Mead.

Synod's evening meetings were held in the church auditorium, its business sessions in the college hall. In the choice of a moderator the last General Assembly's action was reduplicated. Slated candidates nominated in extended eulogistic speeches were passed by for one not before mentioned and named in a few brief sentences—Dr. Lewis S. Mudge of Lancaster. Synod's time was mostly taken up with reports of education, evangelism and beneficence. Representatives of the boards and educational institutions were heard. One judicial case was disposed of. As usual the report of synod's home mission work awakened leading interest and two overtures asking that the Home Board be admitted to cooperation with it were unanimously negatived. Committees were appointed to cooperate with Wilson and Waynesburg Colleges in securing larger endowments.

Would Push Home Mission Work—Idaho Synod in Caldwell Oct. 14 elected Rev. H. W. Rankin moderator. R. M. Donaldson, D. D., gave an address on "Today's Task of the American Church." Synod heartily indorsed the plans and methods of the Home Board in prosecuting its work. J. H. Barton, D. D., was reelected superintendent of home missions and the board was requested to appoint two assistants with J. M. Anderson, D. D., as one. Mr. Rankin was reelected superintendent of Sunday school work.

Wednesday evening the synodical college board committee presented a program on Christian education. Addresses were delivered by Rev. C. E. Van der Maaten, Rev. George A. Wilberg, Rev. D. A. Clemens, J. F. Shepherd, D. D., and Rev. M. E. Lindsey. Synod attended chapel exercises of the college in a body. The college has a larger enrollment and better prospects than for several years past.

Churches of synod have added to their rolls 595 members during the year. Seven new churches have been organized. An overture to General Assembly was adopted asking that the northern part of the state, now part of the Synod of Washington, be included in the Synod of Idaho.

Plan Progressive Efforts—Washington Synod met Oct. 14 at Vancouver, adjacent to Portland, where Oregon Synod was in session at the same time. Rev. David H. Hare of Moscow, Idaho, was elected moderator. The features of the gathering were a joint session with the Synod of Oregon at Vancouver all day Wednesday and at Portland Thursday evening, at which practical themes were discussed and good fellowship enhanced; the unanimous vote of synod indorsing the removal of Whitworth College from Tacoma to Spokane, when certain conditions are met; the reorganization of the home missionary work of synod by adopting a plan providing for a synodical superintendent and six assistants, one of whom shall be commissioned for special work among the logging camps; the election of a synodical superintendent of Sunday school work for all his time and putting under his direction five Sunday school missionaries. These movements bring Washington into the list of the great progressive synods.

Will Meet at Southern Church—West Virginia Synod met Oct. 21 in Vance Memorial church, Wheeling. This splendid and beautiful building easily accommodated synod as well as the synodical societies. Henry T. McClelland, D. D., of Clarksburg was elected moderator. James Paull of Wellsburg was vice moderator. An earnest and aggressive spirit pervaded all the sessions, crystallizing in the conviction that the Presbyterian Church has no small part to play in this rapidly growing state. The fourth year of self-support in home missions showed an expenditure of $5,500, with a comfortable balance besides the banking fund, and new work opening up in mining camps and among peoples of foreign speech. Every committee was ready with a carefully prepared report when it was called for. The membership of synod has passed the 10,000 mark, and the Sabbath school enrollment about keeps pace with the church membership. All permanent officers and committees were reelected. To center the interest more strongly in Davis and Elkins College, which synod controls jointly with two presbyteries of the Southern Church, the Davis Memorial church at Elkins invited synod to be its guests for the next meeting.

Ready for Big Advance—Tennessee Synod met in ninety-sixth annual session with Greenfield church. Joseph P. Calhoun, D. D., of Knoxville was elected moderator. Reports of the various permanent committees indicated a gratifying advance. The days of litigation are practically over, and the way is clear for a development of work that will be a blessing to the field. The retiring moderator's sermon, an address by the moderator, reports by Associate Superintendents J. H. Miller, D. D., and Rev. W. T. Bartlett, the report of E. A. Elmore, D. D., on home missions, and an address by Field Secretary B. P. Fullerton, D. D., all dealt with the problems and opportunities before synod. Synod approved of the country life department of the Home Board and of the policy of the employment of field secretaries and associate superintendents in the Southwest. Interest in the foreign work is deepening, as was indicated by the enthusiasm in connection with the report on foreign missions by S. A. Coile, D. D., and by the meeting of the synodical woman's missionary society. In a joint program provided by the committees on education, the College Board and publication, religious and young people's work, addresses were delivered on Christian education by Associate Secretary J. E. Clarke, D. D., by T. A. Wigginton, D. D., and by W. P. Boone, D. D. Dr. Ira Landrith's report on temperance and his ringing address on law enforcement were optimistic in view of the recent triumph of these two causes in the legislature.

Synod united in a request to the Temperance Board to establish a Southern department with headquarters at Nashville, 'and suggested that John Royal Harris, D. D., of Pittsburg be appointed to the Southern secretaryship should it be established. Addresses were delivered by Rev. G. S. J. Browne and W. J. Darby, D. D. At the popular meeting Mrs. A. H. Dailey reported the women's work.

Attendance Was Large—Synod of East Tennessee convened in St. Mark's church, Rogersville, Thursday, Oct. 16. W. H. Franklin, D. D., president of Swift Memorial College, was elected moderator by acclamation. Synod was more largely attended than at any time during its existence. The business was disposed of with more ease, dispatch and thoroughness than usual, and more interest was manifested by the public. More time was given to the preaching of the gospel.

The Sabbath was a great day for the church and Presbyterianism. Short addresses were made to the Sabbath school by Messrs. Cooper and Murray, the Sunday school missionaries for Alabama and Mississipi. The morning sermon was preached by Dr. Riley of Knoxville, the afternoon by Mr. Cooper, followed by the celebration of the Lord's supper.

Friday morning the synod held its devotional exercises in the chapel of Swift Memorial College. At noon Saturday it took luncheon at the college. The ladies' synodical missionary society met in the lecture room of the church. The attendance was good and the interest considerable. On Friday night after a sermon by Dr. Ellerson of Birmingham the women made their report and several interesting papers were read by some of the members. Elder Patterson of the Synod of Missouri was present as the representative of the Foreign Board and delivered an address. Dr. Tucker spoke for the Freedmen's Board in explanation of the budget plan.

SCHOOL AND COLLEGE

Starts New Custom—Coe College is to have its first annual home coming day Nov. 14 with a special meeting of alumni previous to the big football game with Cornell College.

South Carolina Institution Prosperous—The Presbyterian College of South Carolina, both in the number of students and income, has increased about 100 per cent in the last three years.

New Chemical Laboratory — A thoroughly equipped chemical laboratory and a recreation room are among the improvements this fall at Porter Military Academy, Charleston, S. C.

Trustees Serve Long—Founders' day was observed at Illinois Woman's College Oct. 23. This institution was founded in 1846 and it has had the long continued service of a large number of trustees.

Spent $200,000 in Buildings—During the summer Ward-Belmont, Nashville, erected buildings at a cost aggregating $200,000. These buildings are an administration-academic hall and a residence hall. The former is in all respects a modern school building with thirty class rooms, automatic ventilation and other desirable up-to-date equipment. The residence hall is similarly built along present-day lines, accommodates 130 girls, every two rooms provided with bath room and two lavatories between. The attendance is 700.

Will Move College to Spokane—In accordance with action of Washington Synod, Whitworth College will be moved from Tacoma to Spokane in 1914. A campaign for $100,000 endowment is now in progress.

Oxford Lecturer at Oberlin—Dr. Hastings Rashdall of Oxford University will deliver a course of six lectures on the "Authority of Conscience and the Authority of Christ" at Oberlin Seminary Oct. 30 to Nov. 7.

Big Growth in Six Years—Macalester College, St. Paul, Minn., has a total attendance of 347. Of this number 245 are in the college classes. Six years ago the total attendance was 200, of which seventy-five only were in the college.

Same Basis as Other Seminaries—The action of California Synod at its recent meeting in Santa Rosa placing the San Francisco Theological Seminary under the sole control of General Assembly puts this seminary on the same basis as the other seminaries of the church.

Agnes Scott Grows—The enrollment at Agnes Scott College, Decatur, Ga., is now within five of the total enrollment of college and academy last year at this date. The academy has been abolished. The total enrollment of college students shows an increase of sixty over the total enrollment of college students last session.

Rearrange Courses—Two new members have been added to the faculty of Monticello Seminary, Godfrey, Ill. The rearrangement in teaching forces has led to a greater interest in outdoor life.—A new course in library economy has been opened this year at Ripon College.

Monument to Dr. Steffens—Professor H. E. Dosker of the Presbyterian Seminary at Louisville was the main mover in the undertaking which has resulted in the erection of a monument over the grave of Dr. Nicholas M. Steffens in Pilgrim cemetery, Holland, Mich. Dr. Steffens was Dr. Dosker's preceptor in theology and in his lifetime taught a host of ministers now or formerly con-

A LOOK AHEAD

WITH THE CONTINENT FAMILY

Edward A. Steiner says:

> "How long is it since we Americans have learned to think in terms of one nation? How short a time it seems since men thought in terms of half a nation and of states! To think internationally is a moral advance which we have not yet achieved, although over two thousand years removed from this man who possessed the large mind which President Butler calls the "International Mind."

Dr. Steiner, who is Professor of Applied Christianity at Iowa College, Grinnell, Iowa, contributes in a forthcoming issue of The Continent "The International Mind; the Interracial Heart." He writes with sympathy for all races and from a knowledge of immigrant conditions here and abroad equaled by few people.

nected with the Reformed Church in America. Dr. Steffens served also for several years as a professor in Dubuque College and Seminary, where his son, Dr. Cornelius M. Steffens, is now president.

From Fifteen Countries — A student census of Park College shows that twenty-nine states and fifteen foreign countries are represented in the present college enrollment of 411. Sixteen denominations and creeds are represented—the Presbyterians leading with 247 and the Methodists second with fifty.

May Hold Conference—Through the chairman of the Y. P. S. C. E. of synod, Rev. Rudolph Caughey of Lincoln, Hastings College has been voted the proper place for a young people's conference of the state next summer. If the national board will give proper support such a conference will be held.

Larger Registration than Ever—The College of Montana opened this year with a larger registration than ever. A new gymnasium is being erected at an expense of $15,000 to be completed in December. A campaign for a $300,000 endowment is under way. J. J. Hill has pledged $50,000. The city of Deer Lodge has raised $50,000.

Begin Endowment Campaign—Cumberland University, Lebanon, Tenn., opened this fall with an increase of 40 per cent in the number taking literary courses. Nine are candidates for the ministry. A campaign for $250,000 additional endowment has been begun. The management hopes to raise for all purposes within the next few years the sum of $500,000.

YOUR CHURCH AND ITS NEWS

"Of course the event represented by this item means more to us than anyone else, but I thought it might serve to interest the whole church. If you can make use of it or any part of it I should be pleased to have you do so."

This letter from an Iowa pastor concerning the cancellation of indebtedness on his church illustrates the spirit of cooperation which many pastors recognize as important if their church paper is to accomplish its highest mission. A few minutes and a postage stamp is the only enlistment fee necessary to join in this countrywide service to the church.

Dr. W. C. Burns of Monroe, Mich., has been confined to his home with illness since his return from Europe.

Dr. H. C. Rogers has dedicated to the people of his parish in Linwood church in Kansas City a beautiful little booklet entitled "Seven Candles of the Lord." It comprises seven sketches of anonymous friends to whom Mr. Rogers acknowledges indebtedness for inspiration in his ministry and Christian life.

Smuller—On Oct. 7 in the glow of the autumn sunlight was laid to rest in the peaceful cemetery of Kingston on the Hudson one whose noble and winsome life had been an inspiration to many—Adelaide M. Smuller of Lincoln University, daughter of the late Rev. Henry W. Smuller, organizer and honored pastor of two of the churches of the city, Second Reformed and First Presbyterian.

In her young girlhood she was received into her father's church and began a life of earnest, cheerful activity in Christian work. For a number of years in connection with her mother, a lady of rare Christian devotion, and a younger sister she conducted in her home in New York City a school for young girls, and many a beautiful young matron today traces her training with grateful love to the labors of these gifted and consecrated women. During the years devoted so faithfully and efficiently to this work they were constantly going out along lines of beneficent activity. They were among the earliest movers in what are today large and successful beneficent institutions, such as the Y. W. C. A. of Harlem, the day nursery there and the Clio Club of New York City.

In church and Sabbath school work they followed the footsteps of a long line of godly ancestry. "Miss Smuller's Sunday school class" was distinguished for its high esprit de corps and the "boys" who grew up under her training to the age of 21 stand today as Christian young men in leading positions in their professions.

In connection with missionary work the activity and interest of these sisters never flagged. In simple ways, but with sincere love to the Master and his workers, they exhibited a thoughtful kindness that called forth expressions of sweet gratitude from many a far away missionary's heart—from Dr. John Paton in the distant Hebrides, from Duncan in Metakahtla, from lonely workers on the Pacific coast, in South America, and many fields in the nearer and farther East.

Later, in connection with the church of her brother-in-law, Rev. James Carter, then a pastor in Williamsport, Pa., she founded a sewing school which proved to be a great blessing to many children of the city, gathered together and taught a large Bible class of young women and identified herself most helpfully and happily with social, literary and missionary interests.

In recent years Miss Smuller traveled much, visiting many mission fields, and accounted it her duty and privilege to bring back to the workers at home the inspiration of contact with live missionaries on the field. Endowed with a rare gift as a platform speaker, her services were much in demand for talks on her travels; but preference was always given to the missionary societies, even those of obscure country parishes. For this generously rendered service many a church of Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Maryland, which heard her appeals for the women of Moslem lands, delivered in the costume of a Mohammedan woman, will hold her in grateful remembrance.

The McAll mission work in France also had a warm place in her heart, and her knowledge of foreign languages enabled her to come in close contact with the people and their needs, especially in the Romance countries of Europe. But more persuasive, perhaps, than the language of the lips was the heart language, the sincere and simple language of love which spoke most winsomely to all who met her—the sweet and sunny graciousness which calls forth tributes of love today from a host of hearts in varied spheres of life on both sides of the sea.

The closing days of this useful life were an exultant testimony to the faithfulness of her divine Saviour by whose grace her passing from earth was a triumph joyous and serene.

Boyd—Mrs. Boyd, wife of Thomas Boyd, D. D., pastor of First Presbyterian church of Fresno, Cal., died Oct. 14 at the age of 56. She was taken ill in August at their summer home in Mount Hermon. She was removed to a sanitarium in Santa Cruz, where an operation was performed which revealed an incurable malady. After about two months of suffering she peacefully fell asleep. The remains were taken to Fresno for interment. The funeral services were conducted by Warren H. Landon, D. D., a long-time intimate friend of the family, assisted by Rev. Warren C. Sherman and several of the city pastors. Though they were held at a busy hour Saturday morning, they were attended by great throngs which completely filled the large auditorium of the church and the main floor of the adjoining Sunday school room. The hymns sung were of her own choosing. The entire services were conducted as she herself had arranged and were very impressive and of a triumphant character. There were many beautiful flowers, but all from the gardens of her friends. She requested all who felt moved to purchase flowers for the occasion to give the money instead to missionary work.

Mrs. Boyd led an unusually useful life. She was a worthy helpmeet of her husband in their three pastorates, in Warsaw, Ind., Portland, Ore., and Fresno, Cal. She was deeply interested in missionary work. Under her leadership the Fresno church became a model of woman's organized missionary activities. She was equally interested in the Sunday school, having been for a long time superintendent of the junior department. Her boys and girls filled a large section of the church at the funeral and together repeated the twenty-third psalm. She was an unwearying personal worker, improving frequent opportunities to talk with individuals about their personal relationship to Jesus Christ. Her final message to the people was an appeal to accept Jesus Christ, and to have him in the heart, saying there was nothing else in the world so important as this.

Besides her husband she left two daughters—Helen, who is married and has two children and whose home is in Los Angeles, and Julia, who is a teacher in the high school in Grass Valley, Cal.

Taggart—Grace church, Wichita, Kan., feels keenly the loss of its senior elder, Albert Taggart, who departed to be with the Lord Friday, Sept. 26, in his seventieth year. Singularly capable as clerk of the session, devoting himself to the good work of developing the new church, intelligent in his appreciation of missions, active in labors, modest and earnest, a courteous Christian gentleman, he will be long remembered for his godly character and labor of love.

He served in various localities as deacon and as elder. In the home, the community and the church he was always true, patriotic and faithful.

Mr. Taggart was born in Clark county, Indiana, March 4, 1844, of Scotch-Irish ancestry, and reared in a Christian home and early united with the church. He served his country loyally for three years in the union army, returning to Charlestown, Ind., at he close of the war. He married Miss Elizabeth Horr Oct. 25, 1866. In 1872 he engaged in a wholesale grocery business at Jeffersonville, Ind. His health obliged him to take up rural life in 1881. Moving to Kansas, he spent the following years to 1902 on farms near Parsons and Sterling. During the year last mentioned he located in Wichita, where he was associated with a machinery supply company until 1908, when he retired from business and with his wife went to reside in the hospitable home of their son, Dr. H. H. Taggart. He was an honored member of the G. A. R. He is survived by his widow, four sons and several grandchildren.

Hays—Mrs. Elizabeth Witherow Hays, widow of Isaac C. Hays of Indianapolis, died Oct. 17, 1913, at the home of her daughter, Mrs. H. G. Rice, in Seven Mile, Ohio, aged 89 years and 1 month. Burial in Crown Hill cemetery, Indianapolis.

Colorado Miners Hear Gospel

Thousands of immigrants are packed in close quarters in the large cities, but not all of the newcomers to this country are to be found there. Many are able to follow the agricultural pursuits of their homeland. Others are settled about industrial plants and mines of various sorts over America. One such considerable settlement is in Southern Colorado about the coal mines. Half of the 10,000 miners in a territory fifty miles square are immigrants.

The nationalities are many; on the pay roll of one company twenty nations are represented. Italians, Slavs, Austrians and Hungarians are most numerous. Among these workers there is little or no settled Protestant church work. During the summer a party under the direction of immigration department of the Home Board held seventy services in eight centers among these miners. The interpreter and cornetist of the party during the entire campaign was Joseph Leksa, a Bohemian who is a student at Dubuque German College and Seminary.

According to Rev. M. H. MacLeod, pastor evangelist, who accompanied the party, Mr. Leksa was "invaluable as an interpreter of the traditions, customs and languages of many of the people on the fields."

Evangelistic meetings were held for a week or ten days in each camp, homes were visited and portions of the Bible sold or given away in a number of different languages. Mr. Leksa did much of the speaking to the foreign audiences.

This is typical of the service our students are rendering the country by acting as spiritual leaders of their countrymen in America.

A postal will bring more information about the sort of work we are doing. Address C. M. Steffens, D.D., President, Dubuque German College and Seminary, Dubuque, Iowa.

Around the Shop

Ladies and Gentlemen: The Around-the-Shop Man has so much to say, and so small a space to say it in, that if he didn't put a brake on his own utterances occasionally no one else would get a word in edgewise. So he permits the office boy to play with the typewriter while he lifts the following from his pile of letters and pins them together for the printer.

REVELL'S NEW BOOKS—AT ALL BOOKSELLERS

RAY STRACHEY
From an English Woman's Viewpoint
Frances Willard: Her Life and Her Work
With an Introduction by Lady Henry Somerset
A notable new life of the great temperance advocate, Mrs. Strachey, the granddaughter of the author of "A Christian's Secret of a Happy Life," had immediate access to Miss Willard's letters, journals and papers. Israel Zangwill says of the book, "A masterpiece of condensation, an adequate biography of perhaps the greatest woman America has produced." Illustrated, net, $1.50

CHARLES G. TRUMBULL
Anthony Comstock, Fighter
An authorized biography of this great fighter for purity. The story is one of life-and-death adventure, moral and physical heroism, and incomparable achievement. The detailed account of how all this was done is a most thrilling and remarkable story. Illustrated, net $1.25

JOHN T. FARIS
Author of "Men Who Made Good"
The Alaskan Pathfinder
The Story of Sheldon Jackson for Boys
The story of Sheldon Jackson will appeal irresistibly to every boy. Mr. Faris, with a sure hand, tells the story of this apostle of the Western Indians in clear-cut, incisive chapters which will hold the boy's attention from first to last. Illustrated, net $1 00

RUFUS W. WEAVER, D.D.
The Religious Development of the Child
A very original and scholar work on the religious education of the child. His modern historical and psychological view point combined with a thoroughly evangelical interpretation will commend the book to a very wide circle of Christian educators. Net $1.25

CAROLINE ABBOT STANLEY
The Keeper of the Vineyard
A Tale of the Ozarks
This story of a "return to nature," like the author's "Master of the Ozarks," pulsates with real life. The scene lies in the Missouri Ozarks, a melting pot wherein those who seek the solace of nature and a living from the soil fuse their lives with the natives of the Hills in the common quest for liberty and education, love and life. Illustrated, net $1.25

CLARA E. LAUGHLIN
The Work-A-Day Girl
A Study of Present-Day Conditions
Few writers to-day have given more serious and sympathetic consideration to the difficulties which beset the American working girl. The book is frank and outspoken, but not too much so, for there is need of plain talk on a matter so vital to our social welfare. Illus., net $1.50

I. T. THURSTON
Author of "The Bishop's Shadow," etc.
The Torch Bearer
A Camp Fire Girls' Story
"A story of Camp Fire life both in the city meetings and in active camp in the country. An interesting tale for not only the initiated, but the uninitiated as well."—Washington Times. Illustrated, net $1.00

MARY STEWART
Author of "Tell Me a True Story."
The Shepherd of Us All
Stories of the Christ Retold for Children
There is touching beauty and clearness about Miss Stewart's pictures of the Christ life which will ineffaceably impress itself upon the child heart. Illustrated, net $1.25

HUGH BLACK
Author of "Friendship"
Happiness
"Only those who are constitutionally pessimistic and temperamentally incapable of optimism can fail to find something good in this."—Minneapolis Journal. Pocket edition. Gilt top, net $1.00

MALCOLM JAMES McLEOD, D.D.
Letters to Edward
The letters which make up this volume let the reader into the heart life of one of America's most popular preachers. Dr. McLeod has visualized the present day world in which a metropolitan pastor moves, in a delightfully realistic way. His letters are human and appealing. Net $1.00

PATTERSON DU BOIS
The Practice of Salvation
Trailing a Word to a World Ideal
Mr. Du Bois, who is so well known to Bible teachers and students as the author of "The Point of Contact in Teaching" and "The Natural Way in Moral Training," in this, his latest volume, interprets salvation in a way that appeals to "the man in the street." Net $1.00

JOHN HENRY JOWETT, D. D.
Things That Matter Most
Brief devotional messages of the great preacher, possessing the simplicity, the earnestness and directness which have made Dr. Jowett unfailingly helpful. Those who have come to look to him for spiritual uplift and comfort will find him here at his best. Net $1.25

The Publishers will be pleased to send their list of New Books—about one hundred titles—upon application.

You won't

Fall Asleep

Reading
This Book

It's a study of real life that will "grip" you.

It will hold your interest from the first to the last chapter.

You forget yourself when reading

Bradford Horton, Man

By RICHARD SILL HOLMES

The late corresponding editor of The Continent.

It is a simple tale, but with a plot which holds interest throughout; and the humor and pathos, comedy and heart tragedy that enter into it make it a story that will commend itself strongly to all who enjoy wholesome fiction. Bradford Horton is not a hero plucked from the romantic ages, nor an effeminate lover whom nobody in these days expects to find in real life. You want to shake hands with him and make friends right at the start.

The Christian Herald for 1914

will print approximately 2,562,560 words of reading matter alone—more than fourteen times the number of words in the 27 books of the New Testament. The entire Bible contains 774,692 words.

Mere quantity, however, constitutes the smallest part of the value THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will render back to its readers during 1914. Its high standard of quality and spirituality throughout—the one particular reason for its phenomenal popularity—will be even higher, and it will strive to merit in all respects the position it has so long maintained as the World's Greatest Family Religious Journal.

The coming numbers will embrace contributions by the men and women best qualified to write on subjects of religion and theology, history, art, poetry, and literature; travel and exploration; archeological discoveries and research; science and invention; problems of church and government, and all other topics of current and vital interest to those who would be well informed on the progress of the entire world and of the Kingdom.

Author of

It costs you just 12 1-2 cents per MONTH (less than 3 cents per WEEK) to bring into your home the Queen of American Religious Weeklies—containing the best sermons of all denominations, the latest doings from all the mission fields, and many other features not found in any other periodical in the entire world. For THE CHRISTIAN HERALD stands alone. The 52 magnificent art covers, generally in from two to four colors, 10½ by 14 inches, and each one suitable for framing, would be worth alone in any art store several times the price you pay. Think of it! all for a dollar and a half: 52 lavishly and beautifully illustrated numbers (not just 12, mind you, as with monthlies) and you get, complimentary with your subscription, a copy of the celebrated CHRISTIAN HERALD ALMANAC (see picture), a splendid investment in itself.

"JESUS IS HERE!" THE GREAT STORY OF THE CENTURY

When Pastor Sheldon wrote In His Steps, all Christendom was stirred as it had not been stirred before by a similar modern writing. Since then the book has been translated into fifteen languages and printed by more than one hundred publishers in the United States, Great Britain and Europe.

During all the years since In His Steps was written, Pastor Sheldon has been meditating a continuation of the story, which would include the person of Jesus Himself as the Central Figure—in actual daily contact with the men and women of today—facing our problems, comforting us in our trials and our sorrows, and entering into our earthly life.

"I did no other writing for two months, and seemed driven day and night to go on. As I look back upon that period, I sometimes have a strange feeling that someone else is the author—and I often felt, while writing in my study late at night, as if someone else were in the room."
—Charles M. Sheldon.

These lines recall the strange inspiration and unusual circumstances surrounding the conception and writing of the chapter on the crucifixion in General Lew Wallace's historic Ben Hur. General Wallace is said to have told a friend that he wrote the chapter all at one sitting by candle-light, in an abandoned monastery, feeling sure that Another stood beside him. In the morning what he had written seemed the work of a stranger. In fundamental respects, the two cases offer a perfect parallel.

In short, as he himself explains, he "conceived a visual fulfillment of the hope that Jesus might become a more real and vital Presence and that His disciples might have revealed to them a vision of real discipleship."

In "Jesus Is Here!" we meet Him in the homes of wealth and fashion and in the abodes of poverty, in Congress, in Wall Street, in church and theater, at one time the idol of the multitude and again the object of their bitter hatred as of old. In concluding arrangements for its publication in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Pastor Sheldon wrote: "I long for it to have a reading by the common people and by the rich and educated as well. Let us hope that our desire for it will be granted." "Jesus Is Here!" begins in the Anniversary Number; see our Special Anniversary coupon below.

MANY OTHER SPLENDID FEATURES:

DR. FRANCIS E. CLARK

Founder of the Christian Endeavor, will begin a new and intensely interesting series dealing with the cities of Scripture. The dusky veil of the years will be lifted and the dim past linked with the present in graphic visual imagery.

DR. J. H. JOWETT

Whose "Daily Meditations" have proved one of the most popular and helpful features ever introduced into our pages, will contribute a new series of spiritually inspiring articles on various vital topics. The "Meditations" will be carried on through 1914 by Professor W. H. T. Dau.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.,

Space does not permit even the names of those who will supply the lesser features for 1914 and the remainder of 1913. Such a list might fill two pages and still be incomplete. The following personalities in the realm of religion and letters are, however, fairly indicative of the depth and scope of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as projected for the coming months:

Changing and Changeless

IN RELIGION WHAT CHANGES? WHAT IS FIXED?

Anybody who aims to keep in the middle of the road theologically must marvel greatly at the extraordinary number of thinkers who prefer the rougher going either side.

Not all, to be sure, but a vast deal of theological controversy is simply wearisome disputing between partisans who argue that one shelving roadside is better than the other.

If each party would only forego its sidelong aberrations and get back to the midroad, both would discover that it takes a big proportion of ideas from both sides to constitute the whole truth.

This is peculiarly the fact in regard to one dispute which is rather often in noisy evidence these days. And it is a dispute which specially needs to be harmonized, for it threatens to develop contentious parties in the church, much like the "standpatters" and progressives in politics.

One of these parties is absolutely infatuated with change. The other is sternly set against change.

You can tell the gist of difference between these diverse elements by listening, first at one extreme and then at the other, to hear them argue their respective philosophies of life.

On one side of the road—the radical side—you hear men saying:

"Everything in existence changes continually. Physically, intellectually, spiritually, all life is in flux. Religion is no exception. Christianity can't remain as it was and ought not to if it could. The faith of one generation is never big enough for the next. To try to solidify creeds in permanent form is to checkmate religion."

Go across the road and you find conservatives saying:

"True religion is and must ever be changeless. Truth in the beginning continues true to ultimate eternity. He who tampers with the forms of faith committed to the fathers commits sacrilege. The creeds must remain as they have been. Even if incidentals might conceivably be altered without loss, it would be a process too perilous to try. Vital elements might be vitiated unaware."

To these contradicting voices what will the man in the middle of the road say? What can he say but this:

Those who plead for change and those who plead against it are both wrong. But the error of each consists in not accepting the truth of the other.

How the two theorems of change and no-change supplement each other in the full circle of religion is too big a subject to be worked out journalistically. Some competent middle-of-the-road thinker ought to write a big, clear book about it.

But within limits here it may be possible to state broadly the discrimination which puts the two elements in their right place:

In religion man and whatever pertains to man may change indefinitely and must change largely; God and all that resides in God must be the same yesterday, today and forever.

Men advance to new comprehensions and God welcomes them to new knowledge. But only their knowledge is new; God's fact is as it always has been.

To a new age or to a different people God may send a fresh message. But the message is different only because the men are different—not because God has a new program.

Human apprehensions, interpretations, expressions, angles of view and individualities of emphasis are myriad and multiplying. The divine purposes, plans and pledges, and above all the divine Personality, are sole and "without variation."

Saying these things over in this way is, of course, not making it easy to distinguish between religion's changing factors on the man side and its immutable factors on the God side. In a thousand places it is puzzlingly hard to say which is which.

But the advantage of repeating these contrasts is simply to impress the realization that here is a criterion which does tell the difference between what men may change and what they dare not tamper with—if only they can be wise enough to apply it accurately.

Here comes somebody wanting the church to modify its message, restate its creed or reconstruct its method. He says the multitudes will attend to the gospel better if his amendment is adopted.

What shall the church answer him? First off, it must ask just what is the matter with the multitudes.

Is the language of the church an archaic speech which they do not comprehend? Do they hear the message of God only as some remote, inarticulate call, and not as a "word very nigh" them?

Then by all means let the church translate the gospel into something that will be understandable along all the highways and byways of everyday life, just now in the twentieth century. And let it be quick about it, not dreading the change, but hasting eagerly to make God's word alive to present comprehension.

But suppose the trouble is something else than this—not that the people don't grasp the message, but that they don't like it when they do grasp it. Suppose the gospel seems too exacting for them—too great a venture or sacrifice—and they want it weakened down.

There the church dare not budge a hair's breadth. For this is asking to have God changed—to reduce him to human fancy.

A thousand times modern unrest repeats the ancient complaint: "This is a hard saying; who can hear it?" It is the revolt of insurgent souls unwilling to be held up to the high, fixed points of God's righteousness.

But Jesus changes no "hard sayings."

The only way to obliterate these lofty demands is to resolve God into a vaporous concept of the human mind. Then he may be made over every morning to suit. That some people are trying to do.

But the religion of the Bible is the religion of a God fixed and final. Moreover it is the religion of God's incarnate revelation of himself in Jesus our Lord—likewise fixed and final.

Jesus Christ is not merely an ecstatic dreamer, standing midway of the rising centuries, pointing the way by which he trusted that humanity would rise.

Instead, Jesus is the immortal Torch Bearer standing through all ages at the summit of the road, showing with eternal authority the one way home to God. He himself is Way, Truth, Life.

In this he must be unalterably true or there is no Christianity. Religion might be left without this, but not Christianity.

One changeless Reality back of all reality—God; one infallible revelation of that Reality—Jesus; these are ineradicable axioms of Christian faith.

Huerta Again Declines to Resign; War Talk Heard

The United States was headed straight toward armed intervention in Mexico when the week opened. Huerta, stiff-necked, argumentative and arbitrary, was not disposed to give way to anybody or anything, and showed no inclination to fulfill the promise to retire which he was supposed to have made prior to the recent election travesty. President Wilson and the state department continued to insist that Huerta must eliminate himself and the latter just as steadily refused. He talked much about Washington authorities interfering with the domestic affairs of a neighboring nation and clung desperately to his dictatorship. It was reported that he had tried without success to induce the French government to come to his assistance as a mediator with Uncle Sam. Germany did not offer him encouragement and the British government, though handicapped by undue friendship for Lord Cowdray's powerful Mexican syndicate, yet inclined to give American policy a free hand.

John Lind, President Wilson's confidential agent, who had recently been at Vera Cruz waiting for developments, returned to Mexico City last Friday to reiterate the request for Huerta's retirement. At Washington it was officially denied that this request was technically an ultimatum, but practically it seemed to be much the same thing, and it was so regarded in the Mexican capital. Huerta's practical reply to the Washington suggestion that he resign was an attempt to increase his army, possibly to half a million men.

The provisional president sent another formal note on Sunday to the foreign diplomats in Mexico City calling attention to the efforts he had made to pacify the country and explaining his reasons for forcibly dissolving the last congress, and promising that the newly elected congress would assemble within a few days and would pass upon the validity of the last presidential election. If the congress decided the last election was void a new one would be called, said the dictator, at which neither he nor General Blanquet, the vice president, would be a candidate and in the meantime, of course, he must remain in power—in defiance of the United States.

It was stated last Monday, though not with official confirmation, that Huerta would be given a definite time limit in which to resign. If he declined an ultimatum might then be issued, and if this were unheeded force would be used to expel him. Then a new election would be called and held under American auspices and protection.

Admiral Fletcher has a formidable flotilla of eight huge warships in Mexican waters, with the scout cruiser Chester for fast service and long distance wireless telegraphing. For the latter purpose this cruiser is one of the best equipped vessels in the navy. Other warships were ordered to the Pacific ports of Mexico. Available troops at Fort Sheridan, near Chicago, were sent to Texas. The regular soldiers along the Texas border have long been impatient to cross the Rio Grande, but the spirit of the army and navy has not yet permeated the nation at large.

The President has declined to listen to those Americans who have dollars and cents in Mexico, for he realizes that the loss of life and the cost of national war would be far greater than any loss of American life and property thus far caused through the war of the factions in Mexico. But the humanitarian work of rescuing the people of Mexico from the impossible Huerta naturally appeals strongly to President Wilson's idealistic temperament.

President Yuan Breaks Up a Political Party

"Utilitarian statesmanship," another name for the iron hand, is now the rule in China. Last week President Yuan Shih Kai by proclamation expelled from parliament all the members of the Kuo Ming Tang or Nationalist party and ordered the dissolution of the party. Even the name of the organization was declared taboo and its use forbidden to anyone three days after the date of the edict on pain of being considered a traitor. And President Yuan has made it exceedingly uncomfortable and dangerous to be a "traitor."

The edict accuses Kuo Ming Tang of instigating the second revolution, of blocking the government at every turn and of plotting further rebellion. Several of the leading members were arrested. The party had 265 senators—a majority of the upper house—and 114 representatives. Their summary dismissal deprives both chambers of quorums until other members are elected. It is a grim jest that this same parliament which Yuan wiped out had only a few days before duly elected him president.

Yuan's drastic action makes him virtually a dictator, though at the same time it puts an end to internal dissensions in China and may, it is believed, protect the country from outside invasion and partition. Yuan took advantage of the suspension of parliament to sign a long pending agreement with Russia with regard to Outer Mongolia. The Russian government, probably as a mere matter of form, recognizes Chinese suzerainty, but China concedes autonomy for Mongolia. The plain meaning of this preliminary treaty is that a vast territory, whose geographical boundaries are not yet fixed, is lost to China, to be sooner or later absorbed by Russia. A similar disposition of Tibet has virtually been made with Great Britain. Japan claims that part of Manchuria not held by Russia. These former dependencies constitute an area more than one-half of the old Chinese empire, though their political and economic importance is not commensurate with their size.

Purity Congress Discusses Plans for Moral Reforms

Eight years ago the National Purity Federation was organized at LaCrosse, Wisconsin, for the suppression of commercialized vice, the promotion of a single high standard of morals for men and women, instruction of the young in sex hygiene, and in furtherance of allied civic and economic reforms. As the work developed an international character the name was changed to the World's Purity Federation and the movement became somewhat widely extended, though the original organizer, B. S. Steadwell, remained as president. The seventh annual congress of the body opened in Minneapolis last Friday in Westminster Presbyterian church, continuing over to Wednesday of this week. More than a thousand delegates from various parts of the world were present and representative men and women delivered addresses. President Wilson sent a congratulatory telegram, as did the acting prime minister of Canada.

Mrs. Alice Stebbins Wells of Los Angeles, the first policewoman in America, told the congress that when cities fully realize the value of women in preventive work there will be many more of them thus engaged than is now the case. Herbert S. Genert of New York, who was the chief speaker at the opening session, said that legal limitations and the extent of the territory of the United States would prevent the federal government from doing much more than it is doing for public morality, but he argued that the several states had unlimited powers and were in duty bound to cover this field. Vice being a state problem, he urged that each state should establish a commission of morals to aid in the enforcement of morality laws and to secure better moral conditions everywhere within the state. An objection which such a commission might encounter would be the jealousy or indifference of local town and city authorities, but the advantages are believed to be considerable.

Dr. Kessava Deva Shastri of Benares, India, one of the foreign speakers who addressed the meeting, caused a stir when he revealed himself as an opponent of missionary efforts in India. In a newspaper interview he made statements that missions had gained practically no headway in his native land and that there was little prospect that Hindus in any great numbers would be converted to Christianity. In his formal address, however, he did not refer to these assertions.

A training school in which the principles of purity may be taught was proposed by the congress and a committee appointed to consider its scope, location and financing.

Reviewing Election Results; Drys Win

Elections last week were most satisfactory to the Wilson administration and, perhaps in only slightly less degree, to the general public. Democratic governors were chosen in New Jersey and in Massachusetts and a Democrat was elected to succeed a Republican senator from Maryland, the first one to be elected by the people directly as provided by the recent amendment to the federal constitution. In New York John Purroy Mitchel, whom the President had appointed collector of the port, was victorious by over 121,000 plurality, receiving the largest vote ever given by that city for mayor.

The Tammany organization is regarded as symbolic of political rascality, and its decisive defeat is hailed as the triumph of virtue over vice. To be sure, Tammany may not be altogether bad nor its opponents altogether good, but common people do not split hairs nor draw fine distinctions in an exciting political campaign. Boss Murphy suffered accordingly and the erratic former governor, Sulzer, profited unduly. Sulzer may have been an embezzler and a perjurer, but Murphy, the people believed, was worse, so Sulzer was sent to the legislature and Murphy repudiated in the defeat of his candidate for mayor. Incidental to the picturesque and emotional battle of ballots a clean, well equipped young man was named for chief executive and New York City is now looking forward to four years of intelligent, decent and efficient municipal government. Speculation is rife, however, as to how permanent will be the results of the reform victory and just how long Tammany will stay dead. A London newspaper, warning "the party of honesty" to show wisdom, applies a line from a poem of Kipling's: "'E's generally shammin' when 'e's dead."

Philadelphia disappointed the friends of good government by failing to reelect Mayor Blankenburg, the veteran champion of reform, who overthrew the old "machine" two years ago.

In Illinois the wet and dry issue was fought out in several minor cities and in twenty-two out of twenty-eight points the "drys" won, with the necessary assistance of the newly enfranchised women voters.

Drill Corps for Suffragists on Ulster Army Model

Armed or organized resistance to the government, which has been definitely and positively threatened in Ireland in behalf of the Ulster antihome-rule belligerents, is to be imitated in England by the militant suffragists. Miss Sylvia Pankhurst, daughter of the indomitable Emmeline, who is now in America, made a pyrotechnic speech at Bow Baths, in the East End of London, on Wednesday of last week in which she announced the formation of a volunteer corps under the command of Sir Francis Vane, a Boer war veteran. The plan is based on the Ulster model and Miss Pankhurst said she expected the same immunity from governmental "interference" which has been enjoyed by Sir Edward Carson and his Ulster army. Critics of the militants assert that the "army" will be recruited from the tough element of London.

Captain Vane explained that the proposed drill corps would protect women and labor unionists, and both men and women would be enrolled. George Lansbury, a former Socialist member of parliament who is a warm supporter of the "woman's cause," was one of the speakers at the meeting, of which Miss Celie Emerson of Jackson, Michigan, was chairman. Encounter with the police preceded and followed adjournment.

Congregationalists Promote Home Secretary

Among the radical changes of church polity accomplished by the Congregationalists in their late National Council at Kansas City, no other innovation will be more impressive to the public than the election of a general secretary for the denomination. Dr. Asher Anderson, who has served the council for many years as its secretary, has found his chief duties in compiling statistics. But the conception of the commission of nineteen which has so completely made over the working machinery of Congregationalism, was that the denomination now needs an official of broader powers—not strictly for executive work, but rather for an inspirational or advisory function wherein his personality might help to knit together the various sections of the church and inculcate common understanding among denominational workers.

Some old-line Congregationalists said that the commission was seeking to create a bishop, but the council at Kansas City did not take it so, and very cordially indorsed the idea of a denominational officer who should be a sort of "friend to man" throughout the whole connection. Nevertheless, it was recognized that only a man of very great tact, sympathy and insight could satisfactorily incarnate this undefined and really indefinable function. So a man famous for tact became requisite, and without a dissenting voice the convention turned to find that man in the general secretary of the Congregational Home Mission Society, Dr. Hubert C. Herring of New York. As one speaker said, the council had made the office on paper; it remained for Dr. Herring to "create the part" in life.

The friendly good will of Presbyterians for Secretary Herring is accentuated by the fact that he began his ministry in the Presbyterian Church. Born in Wisconsin in 1859, he attended the universities of Wisconsin and Chicago and McCormick and Princeton Seminaries before he was ordained to the ministry in Iowa. Later he served as pastor of the important Hyde Park Presbyterian church in Chicago. From there he was called to the First Congregational church at Omaha, where he stayed nine years. Thence he was summoned six years ago to his remarkably successful and popular work as a home mission leader.

Editorial

Christ and Our Sins

IN THE ADDRESS with which he opened the session of McCormick Seminary this autumn Professor McAfee laid stress on the fact that there is no room for dispute of the facts of Christ's work in human lives. "The fact is perfectly apparent in history and in personal experience, that men who have had a conscious sense of alienation from God because of sin have received a quiet and peaceful sense of harmony with God through faith in Christ. Separated once, they have come to be at one with God." All possible dispute is as to the way that result is brought about.

It cannot be too strongly urged that no argument can fairly leave out of account the experience of forgiven men. We may vary in our theory of the way in which Christ does the work of giving us peace after our sin, but we move blindly in the whole matter if we do not keep our eyes wide open to the fact that he does it. History is marked with the story of his work in bringing men to peace with God—men who were out of peace with him. Sometimes they were in bitter and wrathful opposition, like Paul or Jerry McAuley, and they have come into harmony with him and have become eager to serve him. Sometimes they have been less obvious offenders like Timothy or D. L. Moody, but the result has been the same. Offenders though they were, they have come into a sense of complete security with the holy and loving God, at one with him, by reason of the faith they had in Christ and what he had done for them and in them. The fact is that Christ does bring men forgiveness of sin and peace with God.

It is in full accord with this accent that we call attention to the striking revival in our own times of interest in the theory of the atonement. For a considerable period it was taken for granted either that the last word had been said on the subject or that the subject itself did not mean anything. Vicarious atonement was out of the question; that Christ should have died for our sins was monstrous or absurd, a sheer mediævalism, a fiction of an age which knew only vindictive sovereignty—with a good deal more of that sort of thing. There appears to be an interesting turn in the tide. The list of books and articles which direct attention again to this great theme would be a long one, and we do not attempt it, but we think many of our readers may thank us for mention of three, which come at the whole matter from different points of view, the chief merit of each being the revelation it makes of the breadth of the subject. Neither is adequate, but all are suggestive.

Earliest in time is the comparatively small book by Charles Allen Dinsmore, "Atonement in Literature and Life," in which the author calls into the witness stand much of the great literature from Hosea to Hawthorne to show how universal has been the conviction that atonement is necessary and possible. Even the varying theories have their justification as efforts to deal with a truth too large for any theory. "Every interpretation of the cross which has entered vitally into the life of the Christian Church rests upon a principle which has received recognition by some world-famous mind in literature. Every great theory of the atonement can be matched by a story of reconciliation embodied in some drama, poem or work of fiction which has lived because in a form of beauty it has presented an elemental truth." Mr. Dinsmore seems to sustain this by his illustrations. And if it is true, then the principle of vicarious atonement is far from foreign to our common thinking.

Next came Professor Josiah Royce's Lowell lectures on "The Problem of Christianity," in which he devotes some of his longest and heaviest chapters to this phase of doctrine. He opens his discussion with the words: "The human aspect of the Christian idea of atonement is based upon such motives that, if there were no Christianity and no Christians in the world, the idea of atonement would have to be invented before the higher levels of our moral existence could be fairly understood." Professor Royce, to be sure, proceeds to discuss this great truth without direct reference to our Lord's life and death, and we are not suggesting that his theory is sustained by what we know of that work, but it is impossible to miss the significance of such declarations as that quoted.

Provoked by Mr. Dinsmore's work, there was next published the volume by Dr. W. A. Wright on "The Problem of the Atonement." Its chief purpose is to oppose the idea of substitution and to accent what is very like Horace Bushnell's thought of the atonement. It illustrates well what was said at the beginning, that it is difficult to keep any theory true to the whole of the experience of the saved man. Certainly there are several important Scripture passages which it does not use, and there are phases of Christian experience which it does not cover. But we are not now concerned with the correctness or sufficiency of any one of the three books. We use them only to accent with what new vividness this old experience of the atoning power of Christ is now being considered. We thank God for it. If only the facts are kept clear, and men are allowed everywhere to rise up and say, "He has saved me," the philosophers may discuss it as widely as they please and we shall profit by their discussion.

Time for Anti-Polygamy Campaign Now

Congress at last is confronted with a comprehensive and unavoidable issue on the question of polygamy. Congressman Gillett of Massachusetts has offered in the house an "eighteenth amendment" to the national constitution in the following form:

"Section 1. Polygamy shall not exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

"Section 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

It will be at once observed that the model which Mr. Gillett has followed in drafting the provision intended to kill polygamy is the thirteenth amendment to the constitution, which did kill slavery. The form of the proposed amendment may therefore be relied upon as efficient and sufficient. Some might indeed prefer that polygamous cohabitation should be mentioned along with polygamy, but there cannot possibly be a legal doubt raised that under the form which Mr. Gillett has drafted, Congress would have ample power to make polygamous cohabitation an indictable offense. So we need not quibble for more words. The legislation required to stamp out polygamy is a matter to consider later; the thing in view now is to make sure of getting the whole subject under federal jurisdiction.

The advantage of those who favor this amendment is that nobody will dare oppose it on principle. Not even in Utah, in the present state of public sentiment, will the Mormons themselves dare say openly that this addition to the constitution is a bad addition. Undoubtedly they hope for a time when they could fight such a proposal openly and directly, but at present they would venture nothing more than arguing that it is not necessary. And that will be the sole acknowledged opposition anywhere—just the defensive argument of inertia: "It is not necessary."

But all this is encouragement to effort—not by any means an intimation that little effort will win. Every ounce of endeavor which church people and social reformers can put behind this amendment of Mr. Gillett's should be swung into line at once to impress Congress. Members of the house, who must be expected to deal with the matter first, should hear from their constituents voluminously. Private citizens should write letters. Local congregations should adopt resolutions and forward them to Washington. No church court or missionary organization which meets this winter should fail to take action to the same purpose. Now is the time to crowd the proposition through Congress. Once it goes through Congress, it will soon be adopted by a sufficient number of state legislatures.

In all support of the amendment let it be remembered that the crucial question is just what has been named: Is it necessary? And the effective answer to that is not in line of proof that the Mormons are now practicing polygamy. There can be no dispute on that, for though everybody in position to know is well aware that they are keeping it up, some people not in position to know are willing to accept the Mormons' own assertion that the practice has been abandoned. But there is one proposition on which there is no room at all for skepticism; documentary evidence of it is plentiful in current Mormon literature. Here is the "fixed stake" to cling to in this campaign:

The Mormons teach that polygamy is the ideal marriage state, and expect to obtain eventually the legalization of it.

It is time now for the United States to prove their foolish dream impossible.

Here the Church Hears a Challenge

The Independent prints a formidable article from Arthur Giovannitti, one of the most daring chiefs of the Industrial Workers of the World, expounding the creed of that revolutionary organization. It is uncomfortable reading but profitable, for Americans need to know just what this fierce brotherhood of revolt intends. Fortunately for stable government, the leaders of the movement are astoundingly frank. They would be vastly more dangerous if disposed to be sly and insinuating. But Giovannitti, in this Independent article, speaks with the curtest candor:

"We believe that everything which tends to preserve the existing economic system is wrong and whatever works to overthrow and supplant it is right. The problem of abstract morality is too much for our limited brain. The law is no concern of ours. Our movement, which aims at the complete transformation of the economic foundations of society, must necessarily subvert its social, ethical and juridical superstructure. It implies a complete revaluation of all the spiritual conceptions and forces now operating in capitalistic society. In its ultimate end what it has really in view is the very reconstruction of the human soul by substituting for the inane, powerless and demoralizing Christian spirit (charity), the manly and healthful proletarian solidarity."

Such a defiance as this not merely threatens civil society but even more directly challenges the church. Not economic conditions alone do the Industrial Workers of the World propose to upset, but all existing principles of religion and morality. Whatever struggle they may be able to bring on is bound therefore to involve the church. Whatever defense is to be set up against them must include the church. What, then, shall the church's attitude be? What is the contribution which it can give, and no other factor can afford, to the sum of forces counteracting this anarchistic propaganda?

Not force certainly. Force against force may sometimes be necessary, but it is not for the church to wield it or even cry for it. Nor are anathemas the church's portion. There will be plenty of excited people who can do nothing but hurl denunciations at the Industrial Workers—let them have monopoly of that exercise; it will do small good anyhow. But the church's weapons are love, compassion, service. And these are the strongest weapons in this fight. They will undercut the footing of the agitators quicker than any other steel. And the place to take the love, sympathy and service is straight to the struggling working people whom Giovannitti and his comrades are laboring desperately to mislead with an inhuman and godless program. Let these workers only know that the church sincerely does care to help them and their children rise to sufficient bodily comfort and higher development of mind and character, and riotous enemies of religion will appeal to them in vain.

—When Dr. H. W. Reherd goes from Iowa to assume the presidency of Westminster College at Salt Lake City, he undertakes what is in many vital respects the most important Christian college work in the whole nation. Westminster College among the Mormons in Utah represents not simply a Presbyterian missionary impulse, but stands with the approval and support of all the evangelical churches as Protestantism's foremost bulwark against the advance of Mormon superstition. Just as with heathenism in foreign mission fields, so with the Mormon cult in Utah it is apparent that the longest but surest measure for undermining the blind faith of its votaries is intelligent religious education for its youth. No false doctrine can permanently withstand that method of attack, nor can it make any effective aggression on outside communities while an enlightened college is at work at its heart. Let the churches of America but once establish Westminster College firmly at Salt Lake City and Mormonism's sun must begin to set. This is what makes the task of Dr. Reherd so enormously critical, and in the courage with which he has taken hold of it he deserves to have the most generous aid of Christians of all names throughout the country.

—The government printing office, it is said, had never put out a sermon among its official productions until it recently printed as "Senate Document 139" a discourse by Rev. T. M. C. Birmingham of Council Bluffs, Iowa, on the text, "The kingdom of God shall be taken from you and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof." Mr. Birmingham believes that "nation" in this text is a prophecy of the United States—which is the point that was thought to make the sermon an appropriate public document. It was Senator Norris of Nebraska who offered it in the senate for official publication.

—Professor Schweitzer, incumbent of an important theological chair in the University of Strasburg, Germany, and author of a recent famous volume, "The Quest of the Historical Jesus," has resigned from his teaching post and volunteered for mission work in Central Africa. He is a graduate in medicine as well as theology and among the African savages will work for the healing of bodies as well as souls. No parallel instance of a theological professor going to be a rank-and-file missionary in a barbarian country is recalled to compare with this.

—Here are a couple of epigrams from Moderator Stone's pithy synodical addresses of this fall: "Christian workers need to be apt, but they need more to be adapt"; "We must have a good word for everybody who is dead in earnest."

Making the Prayer Meeting Vital

Some Live Hints on Procedure

BY HARRY NOBLE WILSON

The pastor of Central Presbyterian church, St. Paul, writing about the development of a live and inspiring prayer meeting, is not writing theories, but deducing counsel from a successful experience which makes his advice authoritative.

WHAT IS THE TROUBLE with the prayer meeting? Let us admit that in most churches the prayer meeting is not serving the important purpose in the life of the church that it should. There are at least two reasons for the neglect of the prayer meeting and its decline.

The first is that the minister himself is not vitally interested in it. The minister may bemoan the lack of attendance and interest; he may worry about it, he may become discouraged; he may make spasmodic efforts to change the existing conditions, but ordinarily where the prayer meeting fails the minister is not so vitally interested as to give it the place that it deserves in his thoughts and prayers and plans and activities, not now and then for two or three weeks in succession, but for fifty-two weeks in the year and every year of his active ministry.

The second reason is that the people do not realize its importance. But this second reason is closely linked to the first.

The Midweek Meeting Succeeds Only if Believed In

If we pastors would cease for a while our pessimistic predictions of defeat for the church and harness up our energies to the task of making our Sunday evening services and our midweek prayer meetings what they should be—not expecting great results at once, but patiently, persistently, prayerfully toiling for them—we would find the church as ready to respond today to aggressive leadership as it has ever been.

To make "prayer meeting night" an evening of the week looked forward to by pastor and people with delight, what are we to do? We must interest the people in the midweek meeting. How are we to accomplish it? Not by new or startling means; only by application of familiar methods—by application of them!

First of all, by placing the proper emphasis upon the midweek meeting—the proper emphasis. We do not believe that the prayer meeting is a greater service than the Sunday morning worship or the Sunday evening service or the session of the Sunday school. But we do believe it is vitally important to the well-being of any church.

If the minister believes in his heart that the midweek meeting is of vital importance, and that his people should be there—if he really believes it—the battle is already half won. If he believes in the prayer meeting, let him tell his people so with no uncertain tone. Let him continue to tell them of its importance, in season and out of season. Let him from the pulpit enforce its claims upon the people. Let him prepare new and striking ways of announcing this service of the church so that when Wednesday evening comes around his announcement may still be remembered. Let them hear this not once nor twice, but continually and in varied forms.

If the situation of the church building warrants it, let a bulletin board give its message of invitation to those who pass—it may not attract many outsiders, but it will have a remarkable effect upon the members themselves. Reach the members by postal cards telling them of the meeting and try the follow-up system to prove that you are really in earnest. Make mention of the coming meeting in your sermons and addresses. "This is the hymn we sang last Wednesday evening when we had such an interesting conference on 'The Things That Really Satisfy' "—you will quicken the interest of some one present at the morning service while that hymn is being sung.

In your pastoral visitation tell about the prayer meeting, of what is being done there, of the attendance and interest, and how it helps busy and tired people to get through the week.

If the minister believes in the prayer meeting and lets his people know it plainly and often enough, they will believe in it, too. And if he does not believe in its value and importance, let him on his knees find out why it has lost power and value for him.

But all this is simply preliminary to the meeting itself. By advertising you may gather a goodly number together for one meeting. But awakening interest in the midweek meeting will do no lasting good nor have permanent results if the meeting itself does not fully repay the people for coming—not once, but regularly.

What kind of meeting will fully repay the people for coming? A prayer meeting; a real prayer meeting. Not all prayer; not a lecture; not a song service; not a third preaching service in the week.

There is a place for a prayer meeting that is all prayer—and blessed is that church where the pastor and elders and godly men and women meet before the morning and evening service in some quiet room in the church to pray for the guidance of the Holy Spirit.

There is a place for a song service, and our meetings are often lacking in power because we have turned our music over to choirs instead of training young and old in our congregations to praise God in the use of the great hymns of the church.

There is a place for lectures upon biblical and religious themes which we do not ordinarily treat in sermons. There is a place in some churches for a third preaching service during the week, and men of God like J. H. Jowett and David J. Burrell are doing wonderful service in this way.

But a lecture, or a "diluted edition of a pulpit service," or a singing school, is not the kind of midweek meeting most churches need. We want the "good old-fashioned kind of prayer meeting," and we want the good new-fashioned kind of prayer meeting also—the one service where the people have the larger part to perform; where they offer prayer, and give their testimonies, and turn the light of their minds upon the themes of Scripture and freely bring the questions that have troubled them and made them anxious; where there is development from nervous embarrassment into calm self-confidence, as they forget self in the gladness of telling the good tidings of great joy and learn well how expression deepens impression.

Give the people a chance. The more people who take part in the meeting, the more interest in the meeting there will be. It is true that the minister will often be told that the people had rather hear him than to hear themselves. And it is a fact that ministers are, or ought to be, better fitted for continual presentation of religious messages than laymen. They have been chosen and trained for just this work. But it is a great achievement for any church to gather a body of men and women who can express themselves clearly and forcibly in the midweek service. It is a great achievement for any church to be training young and inexperienced Christians to take some part, aside from singing, in the congregational prayer meeting.

The Midweek Meeting Must Command the Pastor

The minister ought to be the leader of the prayer meeting except in extraordinary circumstances. And if the minister is the regular leader he ought to be present at every meeting. One of the reasons why so many prayer meetings have such small attendance and are so lacking in vigor and enthusiasm is because, however much the minister may profess his interest in the service, his repeated absences from it, his willingness to let other engagements conflict with it and the ease with which any traveling representative of any good cause may usurp his place there, force his congregation to believe that his interest is not genuine.

The pastor who will travel back a hundred miles to be present at his prayer meeting is the man who will not be much troubled by small attendance of his people. When he shows his own deep interest by making all sorts of sacrifices to be present, then his people will begin to make sacrifices, too.

A prime requisite for the right kind of prayer meeting is thorough preparation for it. The people generally know whether the leader has prepared or not. Preparation for a prayer meeting is not at all the same thing as preparation for a preaching service or the teaching of a Bible class. Most of the leader's actual work is to be done before the meeting begins. He is not to see how much he can say, but how little, and to see how much he can get others to say. He must prepare to present the subject so deftly that even the most timid will be encouraged to take part. He may easily be so learned and eloquent that nobody else will dare to open his mouth when the preacher is through. The required kind of preparation demands the highest skill, ability and self-denial.

The selection of the right theme also is indeed of the highest importance. Many a service has been predestinated to failure because the theme itself was lacking in suggestive thoughts, or was so poorly adapted to the needs of those who came to the service. Have a theme that touches the lives of the people, that pertains to their own thought, faith, hopes, doubts, temptations, conduct. If possible, let this be announced the week previous. The experience of many successful leaders is against the use of a long list of prearranged topics. A week's notice is better than longer.

Be sure that the room is well-lighted, cheerful, attractive and comfortably seated. If your church has a number of rooms, begin meeting in a room just large enough for the number attending, and get the thrill and glow of being forced to move from one room to another that is larger.

The Midweek Meeting Must Be Cheery and Hopeful

The singing is a most crucial part of the service. There must therefore be a thorough understanding with the organist or pianist beforehand. Let the opening hymns be rousing, awakening, inspiring. An unfamiliar hymn will chill any meeting at the very outset. Cultivate congregational singing. The prayer meeting is not the place for "special music" or solos. Have singing, not to fill in, not "before we begin," but as a real, vital part of the service. Many a prayer meeting today is languishing which needs only the triumphant, hearty singing of hymns to transform it.

Begin on time and end on time. An hour is long enough. If the meeting is so interesting that it is a difficult thing to close at the end of an hour, close it just the same. Encourage a social session after the meeting. Get the people acquainted with each other. This you can do if you close on time.

One minister in a busy city church tripled the size of his prayer meeting attendance by the simple expedient of insisting that no meetings of any kind be held in the church the evening preceding and following the prayer meeting. It was not an easy thing to accomplish, but it was found that one reason for the lack of attendance on this meeting was that not many people will go regularly to the church two nights in succession. Give the prayer meeting the right of way.

The minister ought not to come in after the people have gathered, and gravely, solemnly take his place. He ought to be at the door to greet the first comer and start conversation in the direction of the theme long before the meeting begins. A cheerful, hopeful, happy attitude of the minister and a feeling of expectancy on the part of the people awakened by this attitude are the best prayer meeting preludes.

"Microbes" That Kill the Service

BY J. A. ANDERSON

I HAVE LEARNED of one prayer meeting that actually gave up the ghost when the attendance was reduced to the minister and his wife. But there are still signs of life and room for hope. Some things in the meeting tend to kill it—a sort of "auto-intoxication," as the doctors say when certain microbes get at work in the internal organism of the body.

One of these disturbing elements is in the "prayers." I speak from long observation, although in a somewhat limited field. It has been assumed that as soon as a male person joins the church he must lead in prayer. Timidity and lack of experience in public expression count for nothing. It is a "duty" not to be shirked. Some men are thereby kept away from the meeting and others are led to saying in their formal prayers what they imagine should be said, rather than the desires of the heart. Confusion and dread of criticism drive out devotion. The result is often the adoption of a set form and an artificial and perfunctory manner. I recall one whose formula was always the same and was delivered with the speed of a rapid-fire gun. Another declared his desires with a deafening shout. Others assumed in pronouncing their formulæ a mournful, monotonous tone, often scarcely heard.

These may be extremes not found in other communities, but they serve to emphasize the thought that devotions should not be led by those who are incompetent. Abandon the idea that every church member of the male sex shall be urged to this "duty" and there will be a larger attendance and a decided improvement in the character of the meeting.

Let members be trained in a more private way for this service and, when prepared for it, receive previous notice that they will be called on. Abandon the "volunteer" method with its frequent painful pauses and poor prayers. The preacher would not think of doing his part without preparation and should not expect it of the layman. In my youth I often shivered through a meeting, unable to enjoy the service, from apprehension of a possible call to lift up my voice in prayer.

Another thing that injures the meeting is lack of "snap." The service is of little value if the preacher carries into it a suspicion of the remains of "blue Monday." A political address delivered in the style in which some meetings for prayer are conducted would gain few votes. Unless the leader is "alive" the audience will not wake up.

Again, the proceedings should be brief and pointed. A concise statement of a topic is better than a sermonette in which the thought in the mind of the preacher is gradually developed, and calling attention to the special relation of hymns and Scripture to the topic in hand arouses attention and interest. A familiar hymn is sung with fresh interest if by a word or two its relation to the topic of the meeting is pointed out.

An elder who was also a business man was once unexpectedly called on in the absence of the pastor to conduct a prayer meeting which he was attending. There was no time for preparation. He at once announced as the topic for the occasion "The Cross of Christ." Suitable Scripture and hymns were easily found and their relation to the topic was briefly pointed out. There was no long harangue. Persons who could be relied upon were called on for prayer. All was conducted in a brisk, businesslike way. An intelligent lady said that it was one of the best meetings she had ever attended. There might have been a better plan, but this aroused interest and stimulated devotion.

At the base of all is the need of a spirit of prayer; to feel the need of something which God has to give and the desire to ask him for it. We are not likely to ask for what we do not really want. The man who does not "hunger and thirst after righteousness" is not likely to be "filled." Prayers without such desire are likely to be dull and formal.

A Parthian or Mede, looking into some of our prayer meetings, would scarcely be astonished in the same way as were the visitors at the Pentecostal meeting, where all were present and declared the "wonderful works of God." Whether the meeting lives or dies must depend upon whether "tongues of fire" sit upon the participants, and for this we must call.

The fearful prevalence of evils which afflict our own and other lands demands that a mighty cry go up from the Christian church for deliverance, and, if the prayer meeting is allowed to die, woe be unto us.

An Old Man's Prayer

O THOU who art without beginning of years or end of days, suffer an aged pilgrim whose feet are pressing downward into the valley to utter his thanksgiving for thy sympathy—thou who alone art in thyself immortal, expressed in thy comforting message, "Even to old age I am he, and even to hoar hairs will I carry you: I have made, and I will bear, yea, I will carry, and will deliver." Our failing strength needs the girding of thy power, so that, though the outward man is perishing, the inward man may be renewed day by day. In thy mercy we are permitted even now to drink reviving draughts at the fountain of eternal youth.

We give thee humble and hearty thanks for the fulfillment in us of thy promise that there shall be light at eventide. The Sun of Righteousness scatters the gloom of the otherwise darkening path. His rays are never dimmed by outward clouds to children of the light and of the day. They walk in the light of his perpetual presence who is the Light of the world.

We thank thee for the unnumbered blessings of thy watchful providence; for the gift of the Spirit interpreting to our experience the book which thou hast given us as the guide of our lives; a book which, without the interpretation of him who inspired it, is a riddle which human learning and skill alone are unable to solve.

We thank thee for the checkered experiences of life; its sorrows not less than its joy; its defeats and its successes; its failures and its achievements; its losses and its gains—for all these we thank thee, because by means of these thou hast made us to see through the euphrasy of bitter tears that the discipline of life is the "all things" which by thy grace work together for good to them who are "exercised thereby"—for the supreme "good" of transformation into the perfect image of God revealed in Jesus Christ.

We beseech thee to kindle in our darkened souls thine own light and to purify our corrupted natures after thine own image. Inspire thy people by thy Spirit so that in all their relations to human society they may manifestly be the light of the world and the salt of the earth.

We thank thee that thou hast assured us that we cannot know on earth what we shall be when thy purpose is realized in us, for our attainments in Christlikeness seem more and more to fade away when thou dost enable us by the Spirit to get a glimpse of that glory of righteousness with which we shall be clothed upon when we shall see our Lord as he is, for then we shall be like him.

Give to our listening spirits power to hear thy heartening voice, urging, "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee thy crown of life!"

WHAT THE SALOONS ARE DOING TO PENNSYLVANIA

Some Observations by William T. Ellis, Editor Afield of The Continent

DURING THE PAST SUMMER I spent a night each in nearly two score Pennsylvania towns. Most of them are off the main-traveled highways; but they represent the normal life of a commonwealth which has reason to be proud of its widely diffused education, its devotion to religion, its material prosperity and patriotic traditions. The experience has in many respects been provocative of pride in Pennsylvania. The real greatness of the Keystone state cannot be understood by those who know only its large cities.

Only one who has come into personal contact with a large number and variety of smaller Pennsylvania communities, talking with representative citizens at every opportunity, can understand what a sinister factor in the state's life the liquor traffic is. This past summer has made me a militant abolitionist. Always a total abstainer, always interested in the temperance cause, I now have come to perceive that this is at once the fundamental and the overtowering issue before my own state at least. And this article is written to tell why.

This conclusion has not come in a flash, but has slowly been built up. It began in the hotels. Our Pennsylvania practice under the Brooks high license law is to grant liquor licenses to hotels in practically every community "for the convenience of the traveling public." The way that works is that, although a town may be overwhelmingly opposed to the saloon, the sacred rights of the thirsty traveler must be preserved in the "hotel." Instance after instance is known to me of towns that petitioned ten to one against the granting of licenses, only to be overruled by the judges.

The first fact that strikes a traveler is that these hotels are never good hotels. My uniform experience has been that the business of hotelkeeping is entirely subordinated to that of running a bar. Usually the bartender is the hotel clerk. And a greater contrast with the alert, obliging, well-informed clerk in the average city hotel it would be hard to imagine. Often the barroom is the hotel office. If any reader of these lines still credits the old fiction about the alluring power of the barroom, its seductive charms, its enticing attractions, he has but to go on the road in Pennsylvania for a month. The average barroom is a smelly, ill-kept, unadorned place which does not in any way recognize the fact that there are men of refined tastes in existence. It is unthinkable that a man of any cultivation or innate sensitiveness should resort to the average barroom, unless he is a real victim of an alcoholic appetite. Often the barrooms were so vile that readers of The Continent would not tolerate a detailed description. The trough under the bar rail and the frequent juxtaposition of toilet facilities are simply unspeakably vulgar and nauseating, and worse than anything to be found in a Moslem inn. A man must be lost to all the finer sensibilities who frequents these barrooms.

From that charge the travelers must be exempted. Somewhat careful observation makes clear beyond question that it is not the traveling men who find the hotel bar a "convenience." In the small town more than 90 per cent of men traveling are drummers, and young men at that. As is well known, the salesman nowadays cannot hold his position and be a drinker. These young men do not frequent the barroom; they loathe it, and curse the state of affairs that makes the hotel a mere inconsiderable adjunct to the bar. The habitues of the latter are the town loafers, the degenerates, the ne'er-do-wells and the youthful swaggerers who covet the "manliness" which is shown by hard drinking. Many a time I have tried to sleep in chambers over barrooms where foul-mouthed dolts kept noisy carnival far into the night. On any evening the very dregs of any of these small towns may be found in the hotel barrooms. Nobody with gumption enough to travel twenty-five miles would be found with such company. The assumption that wayfarers need the hotel bar is wholly erroneous.

The Manufacturers of Deteriorates

These barrooms are not only the foci but also the factory of deteriorates. If the present crop of defectives were the last, we might wait in patience for their extinction and the death of the barroom by slow starvation. This is not the case. A vivid picture on the film of my memory was photographed there at Athens in Bradford county, one of the charming communities which are Pennsylvania's pride. Unfortunately, my most acute recollection is not of the beautiful library, of the historical monument, of the long and shady main street or of the homes of prosperity and refinement. Standing out with the most distinctness is a scene late at night in the hotel office, which is but an extension of the barroom.

I had gone downstairs for a pitcher of water. There were but three persons in the room, the bartender and two boys, who looked to be about 18 years of age. Their clothes proclaimed them the sons of comfortable homes; had I met them on the street in ordinary circumstances I would have set them down as high school students. But now they were staggering, silly drunk. The bar had done its work with them for that day and they were being sent forth—to their mothers! Compassion for those waiting, heartsick mothers was choked by another sensation. The bartender, an oaf, was looking at them with a stolid, contemptuous and self-complacent expression that may scarcely be described. Those promising, educated, prosperous young Americans were despised by such as he! That this sodden servant of the beer spigot should have the power to bring educated youths to shame and then disdain them in their ignominy and drive them forth from his filthy presence as unworthy, somehow opened all the springs of my manhood's wrath. In the name of all things fundamental to manhood and citizenship, that stupid and sodden-minded thing should be shorn of his power. Athens and hundreds of other Pennsylvania towns have no other obligation so great as the getting rid of this fellow and his ilk.

To return to the hotels: Two illustrations should suffice for the statement that these barrooms are detrimental to the hotel business. Cleanliness, conveniences, comfort and good food are commonly lacking from the hotels in the small towns, simply because these fundamentals of hotelkeeping are neglected by the barkeepers. My first outstanding illustration is Montrose, as beautiful a community as one may find in all America. Its attractions have made it a summer resort for cultured folk from New York and Philadelphia. Here Dr. R. A. Torrey conducts a Bible conference every summer. Now, Montrose has three "hotels," or saloons. One would never expect to see in them any of the men whom he would meet in a business or social way as representative citizens. For a typical summer visitor to have to sojourn in one of the hotels would be a scandal upon Montrose's reputation. All the people of the town know that the hotels are bad; only those of us who have endured them know how bad they are. The community is grossly misrepresented by its places of public entertainment. It has been victimized by the high license law. The wonder here, as in many other towns, is that the citizens do not build a modern and efficient hotel, without a bar. As a business measure this would pay, for it would draw trade and travel from a wide area. The wisest step in town improvement that many a community can take is to provide a first-class hotel.

Voters Must "Petition" for Their Rights

A wide public has heard of Lititz, the beautiful old Moravian town in Lancaster county. Visitors come from afar to see this quaint and lovely community, where the people's garb and the serene faces bespeak the primacy of religion. Yet to register at the Lititz hotel one must go into the barroom; and he will later learn that the hotelkeeping is all attuned to the level of the bar. Of course this is a disgrace to a community of sincerely pious folk, and the traveler is at first tempted to criticise them for not having enough vital religion to get rid of the saloon. Further investigation shows that the usage of the judges of the state, under the present law, renders the local residents well-nigh helpless. They may for a short time accomplish something by petition, as has been done in Chester county and elsewhere; but, after all, it does not comport well with the principles of democratic government for the great majority of the voters to be driven to the rather abject expedient of petition for securing their rights, as is the usage in absolute monarchies. A gang-controlled judge can nullify in an hour months of expensive temperance agitation and petition circulation. That has happened repeatedly.

Here we find ourselves squarely up against a more serious phase of the temperance question in Pennsylvania. In several counties I found, on unimpeachable authority, that the liquor interests were making sure of the election of friendly judges, for with the judge rests the granting of liquor licenses. This and nothing else has become increasingly the determining factor in the election of judges.

A man's friendliness or unfriendliness to the liquor business, rather than any question of fitness or legal attainment, has determined his availability as a candidate. A distinguished Philadelphia lawyer, prominent in the political affairs of the state—not a Progressive—expressed the situation more clearly than any words of mine could do when he remarked recently, in conversation, "They talk about the recall of judges bringing the bench into disrepute! Why, I tell you that this license business has done more to impair the dignity and prestige of the bench in Pennsylvania than all other causes combined. We thought we would elevate the liquor business by taking it into court; instead we have lowered the bench to the level of the liquor business. All over our state the judicial ermine is smirched by the liquor traffic."

Talking politics throughout the state with a variety of men, including many ministers, I have been amazed at the revelations of the ramifications of the liquor business. In one county there is a fight over the appointment of an internal revenue collector; run it down to the real issue and the question becomes clearly and simply one of the saloon's determination to control the post. Delaware county has a jury-wheel stuffing scandal which harks straight back to the brewery in politics. Huntingdon county is torn by a judicial fight, avowedly over the saloon. Erie vacillates in voting, with the liquor interests controlling the seesaw.

How to Purify Pennsylvania Politics

Now that the late election has broken the old political party lines in Pennsylvania and destroyed the infamous bipartisan machine, one will not be accused of serving any party when he points out, what is now a matter of common knowledge, that gang politics has been and is pillared deep in the liquor business. The shortest and most practicable route to the purification of Pennsylvania politics is by the elimination of the saloon. That is not temperance hysterics; it is the careful conclusion of honest study of conditions. The rum power is making its last stand in Pennsylvania, and its only hope is in its life and death alliance with machine politics. The surest touchstone to any man's political fitness is his personal attitude toward the liquor interests.

Before dismissing the political side of the case, it should be said that, without making a new party, it should be possible within the next few years to make the pro- or anti-saloon question the one supreme political issue in the state, taking precedence of old party lines, of economic measures and of misleading political slogans. To this present observer there seems no other way to rehabilitate Pennsylvania's good name in the eyes of the world and give the state a front-rank position in moral and religious and social progress and make her voice once more powerful in the affairs of the nation, than by wiping out this unnecessary and wide-spreading business of liquor, the worst blight that has ever fallen upon Pennsylvania.

Things seem to be shaping up for this issue all over the state. The church folk appear really interested. There have been various influences at work in Pennsylvania to stir the Christian conscience. The Anti-Saloon League has persistently and sanely pressed the battle against the liquor interests. The recent political revolution has brought to the fore in at least two parties the Christian reformer who is also a practical politician. This entire breaking up of old political lines has made it easier to fix the thought of the church upon this present duty. The Chester and Delaware no-license campaigns have been educationally effective. The rapid growth of adult Bible classes, with monster parades at the state Sunday school conventions, have helped Christian voters feel their solidarity. The Christian Endeavor societies have taken a fresh lease of life and interest in state matters. The women's clubs and the Pennsylvania Chautauqua have unequivocally stood for temperance. Several newspapers, notably The Philadelphia North American, have fought openly and valiantly against the saloon. The social service idea, which has taken strong root in this state, is, naturally, a force militating steadily against the saloon. Apparently a large proportion of the pastors of the state have really become aroused upon this issue. A Christian foundation, ever essential, is being put under the temperance propaganda.

A banker friend serving on the Philadelphia grand jury, a man whom nobody ever called a "crank"—fanaticism is not characteristic of Philadelphia bankers—said to me last night, "If it were not for the liquor business the grand jury would get through its work in four days, instead of four weeks."

"Seriously, do you mean that you could finish all your grand jury work in four days if it were not for the direct fruits of the saloon?"

"Certainly not more than four days; it might be considerably less."

The trail of the saloon is daily becoming more clearly discernible. Pennsylvania is permeated with the reek of rum, even as streets of Shenandoah and Susquehanna and Dushore and other places literally smell of the ubiquitous saloon. But the people are seeing more clearly the relation between cause and effect. The churches are beholding in the saloon a powerful, subtle, many-phased adversary of the common good. Temperance is no longer debated on the narrow lines of "personal liberty." Here is a real enemy to the common weal, a menace to the state. The world at large may prepare for news that the stanchly Christian Keystone state is proving victorious over the most dangerous foe that ever invaded her borders

Prohibit—but Educate: A Lesson from Europe

BY WILBUR F. CRAFTS

Dr. Crafts here shows that in Old World lands temperance is gaining ground through work upon the individual, and that the prohibitory legislation of America must be supported more strongly in the same way.

COUNTRIES WITH LITTLE or no prohibition are decisively reducing the national per capita consumption of liquors, while the United States with more prohibition than any other country has never succeeded in accomplishing such reduction in the nation as a whole, except temporarily in years of financial depression. This is the riddle of reformers the world over; it is time to face the fact and see what it means.

I got directly from the German government in Berlin official figures showing that the per capita consumption of beer in Germany steadily decreased from 125.1 liters (about 1½ quarts to the liter) in 1900 to 98.6 in 1910. An unusual summer sent this consumption thermometer up to 106.4 in 1911, but it was still 19 liters below the figures of 1900. The consumption of distilled liquors also decreased, but in less marked degree. Germany still consumes nearly twice as much beer per capita as the United States, and twice as much per capita of stronger liquor—a conclusive answer to those who argue that free use of beer will displace whisky.

Germany Cutting Down Drink Bill

The fact to be faced is that Germany with no prohibition and no temperance lesson laws is steadily reducing the per capita consumption of liquors by out-of-school temperance education and organization; that is, by an organized abstinence movement led by university professors and the emperor, and by labor leaders. An authoritative statement of the emperor's near-abstinence is that "the emperor takes alcohol only as far as the duties of representation require." The first known abstainer in Germany heroically took the pledge so recently as 1893 in the face of universal ridicule, and now there is a third of a million not only pledged but organized in local lodges of Good Templars and other societies, to whose ranks 100,000 were added last year.

Bulgaria, with no prohibition, has only one-eighth as large a per capita consumption as Germany and only one-fourth as large as ours, in part because of the temperance literature circulated by a missionary, Rev. J. F. Clarke, but more because of the moral influence for abstinence of Mohammedan scruples.

In Holland, with no help from legislation, there has been a per capita reduction directly due to an abstinence movement distinctly Christian, led by the minority of abstaining preachers.

In Great Britain there has been a reduction of consumption with not even a local option law, until recently for Scotland only. But every third child is enlisted early in abstaining juvenile temperance societies.

Norway, with only a little "dry" territory as yet, has reduced the consumption and consequences of drink not by the now discredited "Norwegian system" of so-called "disinterested management" with its 4 per cent dividends and good salaries and big subsidies, but by local option in part and chiefly by the organization of every tenth person in total abstinence armies. In Sweden there is reduced consumption also with little from law as yet. Of the Socialist members of parliament eighty-four are total abstainers and workers for prohibition. Of the total 350 members of parliament 153 are avowed and aggressive abstainers.

"Dry land" is in sight as far away as Scandinavia, and the only thing that might prevent the early enactment of prohibition there is the amazing failure of Americans to reduce our per capita consumption of liquors and the nonenforcement of "dry" laws, which partly explains it; and the still more fundamental reason for it, that we have grossly neglected educational temperance work in public schools and even in Sunday schools, and most of all out of school and have not given due effort to the enlistment and organization of abstainers.

Of course no sane, unprejudiced mind will argue from statistics that prohibition is not efficient, but only that it is not suffi- cient. We have reduced the per capita consumption of liquors by local and larger prohibition in the mostly rural "dry" areas, even with no adequate pull on the educational oar; but because the big cities were manifestly beyond the reach of prohibition we have seldom even tried to pledge individuals there and organize them to help each other in the good old way, with the result that the city facilities for drinking have been increased rather than restricted, and the increase in consumption of liquors in the cities has more than offset the decrease in more rural territory.

Much education with little legislation is more effective than much legislation with little education. What we need is not less legislation, but more education. We must pull both oars with an even stroke to get full speed ahead.

There are good reasons to believe the prohibition cause would be much farther ahead in the Old World but for the big question mark that many sheriffs and judges of Maine have put into the legislation there. Prohibition for foreign lands is at this hour being delayed by every true report of nonenforcement in American "dry" territory, and most of all by our failure to reduce per capita consumption, for which preachers and teachers and Christian parents who have not promoted organized abstinence must share the blame.

The worldwide injury done by our neglect to elect faithful executives and promote personal abstinence will become tragic in its effect on other lands if there is not a marked change for the better before the fifteenth international congress on alcoholism brings here in 1915 a host of antialcohol experts who will take pains to see for themselves just what we are doing and are not doing.

I suggest the following plans:

1. Let the pastors and social service leaders organize in every county a union course of coordinated reform lectures, each one of which shall be strong enough to prove something more than the excellence of some organization and its need of funds. Instead of random temperance addresses that range through the whole field of abstinence and prohibition, each aspect of the subject should have a convincing lecture. In order to prevent the necessity of making the collection the chief anxiety of the lecturers, let each church and various individuals share in a guaranty of the cost of such a standard course as will bring out those not already converted to the cause. Whenever the weather permits, outdoor automobile lectures are the best for getting at those who need, but would not seek, the truth about alcohol.

Good Temperance Literature Is Needed

2. There is also great room for improvement in temperance literature. Material of good intellectual quality is indeed available. Three new temperance books are worthy of a place in every library: One by Earnest Gordon on "The Anti-Alcohol Movement in Europe," another by Guy Hayler on "The Prohibition Advance in All Lands." The 1913 revised edition of "Social Welfare and the Liquor Problem," by Harry S. Warner, is also so rewritten as to be a new book, and there is none better for a concise statement of the whole drink problem. The Interchurch Temperance Federation, Professor Charles Scanlon of Pittsburg secretary, has by a ballot of specialists listed a "temperance library" which covers the whole subject at a small cost.

But the smaller leaflets and booklets for free circulation should be made more attractive by the use of better paper and especially of diagrams for this picture age. Most of all is it necessary that we should quit trying to war on a mighty foe with such supplies of ammunition as captains may order now and then at their own expense. Manifestly what is needed is an ammunition fund by which literature can be sent more abundantly to those who need it and are likely to read it, and especially to those who can be relied on to circulate it wisely.

3. Both in lectures and literature, strategy if nothing else should suggest that total abstinence and prohibition may be most effectively presented as part of labor reform or charity reform or municipal reform. These broader themes will bring those who would have been repelled by a call to a "temperance meeting." In a "citizenship convention" or "sociological congress" or a lecture on "social problems" or "uplifting movements" a shorter argument may win more converts because there are more unconvinced hearers at hand.

4. In order that a city or state may make the most of such lectures and literature as may be available it is most desirable that they shall not be handled by some one denomination or one society, but by a federation or union committee.

Thanksgiving at Cabin o' Wildwinds

BY ADA MELVILLE SHAW

PART I.

SOMEWHERE on the plains between the Yellowstone and Musselshell rivers, within reach of the snow-bright smiles of the Big Horn, Pryors, Absaroka, Crazies and Big Snowies, you will find Ruthven ranch. There is now a roomy addition to the original log cabin. A prosperous group of outbuildings and well cultivated fields lie inside its trim fences. But on that August day in the year of which I write there stood on the upturned sod of the newly claimed quarter section a little log cabin, a small log barn, and that was all.

The young mistress of Ruthven ranch was beside the cabin door, arms outspread to the horizon, her cheeks palpitant with color, her gray eyes intense with happy emotions.

"It is all so big and so beautiful, Joe, and so—ours, sky and all—to the farthest rim of nowhere and the highest snowdrift on the mountains. Hear that meadow lark! He has been wearing himself out all day, trying to sing to me how fine it is. Joe, does anyone really know what the winters out here are like?"

Joe came out and pulled his wife down to a seat beside him on the doorsill. "I have yet to take the question up with the Indians," he said lightly, "and I have not gathered in the testimony of the antelopes, but the rest of the old-timers——"

"Who are the 'old-timers,' anyhow? I don't see their mansions hereabouts." Maggie swept her laughing gaze over the miles that spread out and out to the horizon circle. "How the new shacks are popping up, Joe! There is one I am sure was not built yesterday. How far away is that?" She pointed toward the eastern rim of things where the humble pane of a tiny abode gave back the sunset splendor in diamond effects.

"May be three miles, or six or ten—hard to tell. Light and shadow and distance play queer tricks out here. I saw a mirage when I was first out, locating. It made a sheep corral in the distance look like a Chicago skyscraper and right before my eyes a bunch of steers grew straight up until I could hardly believe they were not sure-enough camels. The old-timers are sheep herders and cow boys, mostly. You can't get a real old-timer to say bad words about this climate. They have hair-raising tales about dust storms and blizzards and wind and cold and heat, but to hear them talk you would think those are the personal favors the country hands out without charge. Maybe they are. We shall know more about it before we prove up. Afraid, Magsie?"

"Not—ever! Let the 'personal favors' come straight along. Cabin o' Wildwinds is good for the worst. And you—I have you! I wish I might meet a sheep herder."

"There was an old fellow, Peter Frink, took a band of a thousand woollies right past the door the day before you came. He offered me three bum* lambs, but I had no milk for them, so he took them along. Had them slung in a sort of hammock on his pony. Some would have left them to die."

"I wish I had them!"

"Maybe we can get some sometime. I believe we are going to do fine out here, wife."

"I know we are. And we can really count in this new country, Joe. Big fish in little puddle, you know! Citizens on the ground floor."

"That is it. Meanwhile, how about kindlings for morning? Got to get out for town first thing."

"Oh, that ridiculous town!" scoffed Maggie, smiling at a sprinkle of pine board buildings ten miles across the rosy land. "There are twelve of it, exactly, Joe—I counted every single shop and shack. But that is ours, too, to help grow and count on the map. Aren't we glad we quit bookkeeping and shorthanding and nobodying and came out to grow up with the state?"

"My bottom dollar on it, Magsie! Well, do you think you can leave the sky and mountains where they are for the night and bring your thoughts down to supper? We ought to be up at 4."

It had taken a major portion of the young couple's savings to emigrate to the new land, build their house and fences, buy a team, wagon and buggy and lay in the first supplies. But that was a fine start for the first summer. Joe earned good wages teaming—he had been a farmer's boy before bookkeeping in close offices thinned his red blood, and he was courting the open air for dear life's sake. When spring came they could buy a cow, pig, chickens, put in a garden and begin farming on broad lines. But for the present they must live simply on "boughten stuff" and let residence on the land count for claimers' proof.

*Lambs too weak to keep up with the flock.

The next day was deliciously cool from the refreshment of the night as Maggie packed a lard pail with her own good bread, crisp slivers of bacon and a little precious jelly "from home" in lieu of butter. She filled a stone jug with water from the barrel at the door—Joe hauled water five miles from a spring—pounded in the cork, wrapped a wet gunny sack closely around it, turned an old pail over the whole and pushed it into the shade of the wagon seat. "There is your patent, self-adjustable, iceless ice water, young man!" she said. "And here's your luncheon de luxe. Don't you dare give away a crumb and don't dare bring a crumb back!"

Joe tossed her a comradely smile across the backs of the bronchos as he sprang to his seat. "You're learning, Magsie!"

She nodded. "That is what makes pioneering so interesting—things to learn every day, and I'm the girl who is going to learn them! I am going to study this thing to a finish—the way I studied shorthand."

Joe bent down to snatch a kiss, the bronchos whirled away, and in the heart of the young man was a prayer that the hardest "things to learn" might be spared his Magsie. "It is tough enough for men, this breaking in a new country," he mused to himself, "and I don't see how some of the women stand it," meaning that one of the women had his arm and heart between her and the rough odds of the new life. "Shouldn't wonder a bit if she is watching me out of sight right now," and he glanced back toward the cabin where his life-hopes were centered. She was doing just that—peering with concentrated vision along the bright miles.

The woman who makes a home on virgin soil literally makes it. As a rule—for it is not the rich people who take up the claims and improve the land—only the barest necessities are freighted out from "back East." For the rest, as a skilled writer of western tales puts it, out of what you have you must make what you need. They tell one another, these home builders on the sagebrush, that all you need to begin housekeeping is a snarl of baling wire picked up along the trail, a few old gunny sacks and a can opener. Thus, with brave pleasantry they dress the fact that inside the four rough walls of their "houses," bare hands plus sheer grit must wrest most of the necessities and all of the luxuries of daily life from "what you have."

So, while the clock ticked off the minutes of Joe's absence, Maggie was transforming a four-walled shelter into a home. There were a thousand happy things to plan and do and the young wife sang as she invented and created, for before winter came she hoped to have her hands full, very full indeed—hands, aye, and arms.

The sun climbed the stairway of the sky. No faintest wisp of cloud lay on the blazing dome. The mountains withheld their cool breath. Maggie's bare arms felt the bite of actual scorch as she stood a minute in the sun. At noon she grew restless. How can one eat alone? The barrel water was not inviting.

"I do hope Joe's jug stays cool—dear old Joe!"

Weary of the house, she walked down to the barn to plan the chicken house for spring. As she walked slowly in and out of the sage clumps, her eyes afar in that long look peculiar to plains dwellers and the seafaring, she stumbled over a man unconscious or asleep upon the ground.

Maggie Ruthven had lived a sheltered life. She was only 22. She was alone. And until that moment of undreamed of emergency she had not realized the depth and height and width of the aloneness of the plains, even on one's "own" quarter section. Dismayed, she stared at the rough, huddled form. She spoke—called—touched and shook him, without response. Then, with fear and difficulty, she turned him over, face to the hot heavens.

He was an old man and he was dirty. There was a trickle of dried blood on his cheek from a slight cut.

Maggie took in the solitudes with wide gaze. "I suppose it is up to just me!" she half-whispered, but instantly came another thought as, in her need, she became conscious of a Presence, strong, comforting, loving. The white majesty of the mountains seemed to bend toward her and the Presence spoke to her timid heart: "From whence cometh my Help? . . . My Help cometh. . . ."

Maggie set to work.

It took two minutes to wheel the buggy up so that its bed somewhat shaded the purpled face. A few more minutes' work with wet cloths and such simple restoratives as her stores afforded brought her to the end of what she could do. There then remained only to wait and watch.

It was an hour after Maggie had found him that the stranger showed signs of awakening and she promptly sought the shelter of the house. With some difficulty he sat up, stared about him, drew the wet cloths from his head, stared at them, stared at the buggy, slowly shook his head from side to side and staggered to a log near by. Then he turned his face toward the house. It was as well the little woman watching within did not hear his slow words—she might have misunderstood their intent. It occurred to her that perhaps it were the finer part of valor in this case to take the initiative, so she bravely walked out to her uninvited guest.

"How do you do, sir?" The conventional words in a pleasant voice, from a trim figure in fresh blue calico, brought no reply. This man was an old-timer in the land of mirages. He had also dwelt for long in a body subject to drink-bred hallucinations. "Feeling better?" added the speaker, picking up the ax that lay near by. Then she was genuine! The man spoke.

"How do, ma'am. R-reck'n I'm trespass'n'. Sorry. Pony got away. Good pony. Seed him?"

"No, I have not."

"Old man at home?"

"You cut your face when you fell," parried the discreet hostess.

He felt for the cut with a dirty, gnarled old hand. His thoughts were clearing. "R-reck'n I didn't pitch plumb under that there buggy—accurate? Did I?"

Maggie had to smile. "No. I wheeled it over to shade you."

"Put wet rags on me, too. Well—I'm—cradle-rocked—that's what!" Maggie wondered what he meant.

"You had better move into the shade of the house," she ventured. "Will you drink some coffee?"

"Sure will! Got water?"

Maggie pointed to the barrel and, leading the way, handed him a dipper and basin. He washed away some of the alkali grime, gulping the water freely as he thrust his face into it again and again. He let but few drops splash away and his question as he lifted a brighter countenance, "What shall I do with this water?" was eloquent of long experience in a "dry and weary" land.

"Throw it away," answered Maggie, not so shocked as she would have been before she began to learn.

On an upturned box beside the door she set out a lunch of coffee and bread and bacon, and as she added a bright knife and fork and spoon, the old man crooked one knee above the other and regarded the "lay-out" on the "Montana mahogany" with a pursed up smile. "R-reck'n you be one o' them there—Christians—ain't you?"

Maggie turned her honest gray eyes full upon him. "Why, yes," she replied simply. "Hadn't you better sit up?"

He ate and drank silently till the dishes were cleared. Then, silently, he filled his stubby black pipe and silently smoked till the shadow of the cabin lay straight toward the east.

Maggie sat within the door sewing and watching the trail.

"Well, guess I'll hit out and hunt that there cayuse o' mine. Won't do a thing to him!"

"What will you do to him?" asked Maggie, gently, for she loved all things that draw breath.

"Feed him sugar out o' my hand!" The wizened face broke up into pleasant wrinkles that drove the last bit of timidity out of Maggie's mind. From an indescribable pocket he produced some lumps of once white sugar. "Me and him's great friends. Well, so long, lady. Do as much fer you some day. If you git in a hole ask 'round for Pete Frink. Old-timers know where I hang out—when I hang. So long! Much 'bliged, I'm sure!"

There was real dignity in the wave of the ragged arm and Maggie, her eyes big with new wonderings, watched him out of sight.

"You must have a gun, little woman," said Joe when he heard her tale.

"My mother used to tell father," she made reply, "that guns are for folks who do not know God."

"Maybe," answered Joe skeptically, "but I put a lot of confidence in a good little old persuader—sometimes."

"You are a man. Don't you know, Joe, boy, that women have to learn different? And I was taken care of!"

"Yes, you were," admitted Joe, "but——" Gentle fingers upon his lips closed the sentence. (To be continued)

MADE TROUBLE FOR THIS HUSBAND—It has been said that when a man says he can manage his wife he really means he can make her do just what she wants to do. The Louisville Courier-Journal's raconteur reports a dialogue which goes to prove it:

"That fellow certainly is a dub."

"For why?"

"I told him I bossed my wife, and he went and told her."

THE HOME COUNCIL

Ways of Simplifying Christmas

BY ELIZABETH L. GEBHARD

THOUGH everybody loves Christmas, and our friendships are among our richest blessings, there is no denying the fact that the Christmas giving has become a burden to many of us. We bask in the sunshine of our dear five hundred relatives and friends for eleven months of the year, and then long to halve the number the twelfth. What we need is to find some type of gift which will cover the whole five hundred, and will carry with it blessing to the giver as well as happiness to the recipient. I have found one solution of the problem of Christmas giving, during the last few years, by selecting two gifts and choosing one or the other for all my friends with a very few exceptions.

Originality Much to Be Desired in Planning Christmas Gifts

This plan may at first seem prosaic, but it works well if a little ingenuity and practicality are infused into it. All of our friends have practical needs. Most of them have some artistic tastes awaiting gratification, and there is a charm in the mere freshness of original gifts.

One year I had photographs of our front door taken and colored. Ours is an old homestead. Two Quaker ladies stood on the porch, for it was the last home in which the Quakers of our little city were accustomed to gather on holidays. The town was settled by the Friends, but through their intermarriage with the "world's people," their peculiar type was no longer seen on our streets, so the picture had not only a sentimental value but a historical value as well.

Large quantities of orange and grapefruit peel were candied and placed in preserve jars, where they kept moist and fresh until needed. Pound candy boxes were filled with this at Christmas, and either a picture or a box of the candied peel went as a Christmas remembrance to all our friends and relatives.

Almost Unlimited Variety of Articles from Which to Choose

A friend who tried the plan gave library scissors and pieplates in nickel frames to her friends, using homemade candy to fill in the chinks when neither fitted. One year we made writing pads and calendars.

Another friend made sets of little ribbon sachet bags in rainbow colors, each one supplied with a gilt safety pin; for a second gift she gave sets of Smith College pencils in their brilliant stripes, wound and tied with Christmas ribbon.. The pencils were a part of the college's effort toward a million dollar fund, and had the double merit of artistic exteriors and a good lead within.

One can often find exquisite little water colored postal cards at summer resorts. These I have utilized by pasting them on green blotters and tying with the prevailing shade of the color sketch. I also put them into small frames. Their alternates were brown leather cord bags, cut with fancy eyelets, through which the red and green cord showed brightly.

A plan for the coming Christmas is to be worked out with the help of some Cuban basketmakers. A bag-shaped splint basket with a band of green, lavender and orange stripes, which crossed the continent with some travelers, and was left at my door, has long been the envy of my friends. Its picturesque exterior is quite equaled by its capacious interior, making it a valuable receptacle for lunches and flowers, packages, or magazines and papers. The basketmakers are willing to fashion others like it, by the dozen, at a reasonable price, and they are to be sent to my friends filled with Christmas evergreens with a touch of bittersweet berries gathered in the woods in the fall, and of course tied with a Christmas tag.

The second lot of gifts this time are to be work baskets for traveling. A small sweet grass basket with a cover is to be furnished with spools of black and white thread; a half dozen each of pearl and bone buttons; white and black hooks and eyes; middle-sized and small safety pins; a small ribbon needlebook; celluloid thimble, tiny scissors and emery. The first thing that meets the eye when the lid is lifted is a card with this injunction: "Do not borrow or lend." Obeying the injunction always insures the traveler a very necessary convenience, ready at a minute's notice.

There are dozens of other equally simple articles which may be coupled together and made available as Christmas gifts over a wide circle of friends. The plan is worth a trial and once tried will be found too desirable to relinquish.

BITS BY THE WAY

PROGRESS AND HOMEMAKING

One of the vital questions suggested by the so-called "woman movement" is whether it is going to make for efficiency or inefficiency in homemaking. It is interesting to note some of the personal opinions on this matter expressed in the New York Tribune by certain well-known women.

Mrs. Laura A. Batchelder, president of a national bank in North Dakota, says that "the best wife, the most contented housekeeper and the dearest mother in the world is the woman who has at some time had business experience of some sort." Housework and homemaking as a steady and sole occupation she considers stultifying. Develop a woman's mentality, she declares, and she'll do everything in a bigger way—dust better, sweep better, wash dishes cleaner; and she will handle more dexterously each situation in which she finds herself. With the potential mothers given opportunity to broaden in every direction, the percentage of famous sons will be greatly increased.

In direct opposition to the views of Mrs. Batchelder stands Mrs. John Martin, antisuffragist and writer of books. Her idea is that "making laws is man's work. Woman's true work is in the four walls of her home," where her particular job is to begin at the bottom of things and mold her small sons into moral voters and through them mend the laws.

Next comes Mrs. Alfred J. Eno, a hard worker for suffrage, who believes it impossible for a woman to be a really good wife and mother unless she is also interested in outside things. "How can a practical girl," she asks, "when she marries and has children, help being concerned about the schools, about the drainage, about the hundred and one outside things that affect her child and the children of other mothers and the children who have no mothers? Why, she is no true mother if she doesn't ache to make conditions better — and that needn't make her oblivious of the little intimate home duties. There is time for both." Both Mrs. Martin and Mrs. Eno are mothers of boys.

Speaking in a general way on the subject of motherhood, Mrs. Mary Ware Dennett of the National Woman Suffrage Association, and owner of two small sons, says a sense of humor is the most essential quality in a wife and mother. Children, in her opinion, "have a terrible way of upsetting your theories. A sense of humor helps when your theories are scattered. The trouble with our homes," she adds, "is that too many women are just parents and too many husbands are just providers and not true parents."

Then another little woman says her say: "The best wife and mother is she who takes an intelligent interest in the world movements. There is such a different feeling, now, about the rights of children, there is such an advance in methods of education. How can mothers know about these things if they stay shut up in their homes?"

Mrs. Schuyler van Rensselaer, antisuffragist, declares that while to be a good wife and mother a woman needs "to think more, to know more," there is a certain work that is distinctively man's, other work that is distinctively woman's. Hers is to mold character and through it public opinion; his is "to give public opinion shape in the practical form we call government."

Whatever your opinion and mine may be on the woman movement, on one point we must unfailingly agree: Whatever makes for a broader, stronger womanhood will produce a finer, larger-spirited home, and children with greater potentialities for noble citizenship.

MISS ADDAMS DEFINES CULTURE

At a recent dinner gathering, of which Jane Addams of Hull House was the honored guest, the conversation turned to the subject of culture. One notable person and another was named as embodying different guests' ideas of culture. At length a hitherto silent guest spoke up. "I think our ideas differ a bit as to what culture is." Then, turning to Miss Addams, "How would you define culture, Miss Addams?"

Miss Addams was thoughtful for a moment.

"That person is most cultivated," she said at last, "who is able to put himself in the place of the greatest number of other persons."

In other words, to be cultured is to understand. S. C. R.

DO IT TODAY

BY GRACE BRUTON

Say them today, my dearest,
The tender words and true
That so long have lain unuttered
Between your friend and you;
The words that, sweetly spoken,
May cause some soul to sing—
Say them today, my dearest,
For time is on the wing.

Do it today, my dearest,
The loving deed of grace
That shall bring a thrill of gladness
To some weary heart and face;
Comfort some lonely toiler,
Chilled to the spirit's core—
Do it today, my dearest,
The chance may come no more.

Send them today, my dearest,
The letters you mean to write,
Bearing a helpful message
Each in its cheery flight;
Do as your kind heart tells you,
No longer, lingering, wait—
Do it today, my dearest,
Tomorrow may be too late!

YOUNG AMERICA

Stanley's Jungle Nursery

BY FRANCES MARGARET FOX

THERE WAS A TIME in the life of the great explorer Henry M. Stanley when he was responsible for the safety of an uncommonly large nursery. This nursery was composed of little babies, black babies and yellow babies, in the heart of Africa not longer ago than the year 1889.

It happened this way: Great Britain had sent an officer to rule over a vast territory in Northern Africa. The officer was General Gordon, whose headquarters were at Khartum. Under General Gordon was Emin Pasha in command of a large force of Egyptians. Both these forces were accompanied by their families and numerous servants and other followers. Emin Pasha's headquarters were far from Khartum. The country proved hard to govern. At last serious trouble broke out and Khartum, surrounded by enemies, was cut off from the outside world. Great Britain immediately determined to rescue her officers and tried to reach Khartum by the only road known to civilized man, which was through Northern Africa. Before this could be accomplished Gordon was killed and Khartum fell. Emin Pasha, with all depending upon him, was left to perish.

This officer, however, held out against the enemy and sent to Europe frantic appeals for help. His appeals aroused great sympathy in England. How to rescue Emin Pasha was the next question. It was impossible to reach him through the north of Africa, which was held by the enemy.

Immediately that great hero of many an African adventure and accomplishment, Henry M. Stanley, offered to head an expedition for the relief of Emin Pasha and declared his willingness to cut his way through the unknown forest from the south.

In that day the interior of Africa was a wilderness inhabited by savages. Stanley knew better than any man what it meant to attempt the rescue of Emin Pasha and his army; to fight his way through the great forest and carry sufficient supplies and ammunition for the entire expedition.

Stanley and his men reached Emin Pasha from the south after enduring frightful perils and hardships. Many died on the journey. It seems strange that any survived.

After Stanley found Emin Pasha, whose title was governor of Equatoria, and that gentleman with his thousand followers began the return journey to the coast, their route was certain. They had but to follow as rapidly as possible the newly cut road through the land of wild beasts and cannibals down to the port opposite Zanzibar. But Stanley now had to provide for this additional thousand men, women and children placed in his care. The majority of this multitude could not understand that they were being taken home by a roundabout route covering thousands of miles by land and sea. They only knew that they were not returning with Emin Pasha the way they entered Equatoria. There were no horses nor carriages nor wagons. The sick and wounded had to be carried; also little children and babies. Stanley had to provide food, water and medicine for Emin Pasha's followers as well as for his own men. There were perils on every hand and not the least of these were from wild beasts which in spite of all caution carried off a number of children.

On the march as many as forty little babies were born to swell the number of the Emin Pasha expedition, and these were the babies, with their older brothers and sisters, who formed Stanley's traveling nursery.

One night the camp was much disturbed by stories of cannibals. Just outside the great forest cannibals were said to be waiting to attack the expedition. The mothers of forty plump and tender babies were greatly alarmed, fearing that the cannibals would choose first of all their infants for dinner.

That night Stanley was awakened from his sleep by a sound apparently made by a wild animal just outside the tent. It was a faint cry. In a moment the air was full of wails, as if wildcats were giving a concert for his benefit. When Stanley went out to learn the meaning of this uproar he found his tent surrounded by little black babies lying on the ground in their blankets. Their mothers knew that the "great master," as they called Stanley, would never allow the cannibals to eat their precious babies, so they placed them there for protection.

The "great master" promised to guard the infants from harm, but objected to having their cradles so near his tent. He said he couldn't sleep when the babies cried.

A little yellow Egyptian baby of the expedition was left to the cannibals—a fact which caused Stanley much grief. The mother died on the march. After that the father, whose name was Selim, was obliged to carry the baby. When it was too late, Stanley learned that Selim had grumbled about carrying the baby and his gun, too.

It was Stanley's custom to walk around among his men every evening after the expedition stopped to make camp. On one of these occasions he noticed Selim's big-eyed baby sitting all neglected by himself. The next day when the tents were in place the "great master" sent for this baby and gave orders that it was to be allowed to sit on a mat in the doorway. For several days after that Selim's baby and Stanley entertained each other in the same manner at the same hour every day.

But one day Stanley awoke to the fact that no little yellow baby had sat on the mat in his tent doorway. He straightway sent for the baby and inquired why he had not been brought to visit him as usual.

"Alas, master," was the answer, "Selim got tired of carrying his boy, so he left him in the forest three marches back."

That meant that the cannibals had long ago eaten Stanley's little charge. "I would willingly have had the boy carried had I but known," he declared sadly.

The next week Selim ran away into the great forest, where he, too, must soon have died in the same way. Stanley halted the expedition and searched for the father of the little yellow baby, but the search was in vain. Selim was never seen again.

A pleasanter story than this is the one about the little black baby who was forgotten by its family when an entire native village fled at the approach of the relief expedition.

When the little 3-month-old black baby was found by Stanley's men it was taken immediately to the "great master," who describes it as "gobbet of fat, with large, innocent eyes." Feeling sure that the mother was not far away and would come for her baby the minute she dared venture, Stanley left the little thing where it was found, although he would willingly have taken it with him. The baby was cold, so instead of leaving it unprotected on the ground Stanley ordered a fire built, "and," as he says in his autobiography, "I had a sort of cradle nest scooped out of the earth beside the fire, so that the little creature could be warm, sheltered and in no danger of rolling in. I lined the concavity with cotton cloth as a gift to the mother; and when we left that encampment the baby was sleeping as snugly as if with its mother beside it, and I left them a good notion for cradles."

Snowball, the Children's Pet

Who knows the difference between a rabbit and a hare? There is a difference, and a big one, too. The common—cottontail—and jack rabbits are really hares. When rabbits are born their home is in a deep burrow in the earth, for they are helpless at birth and need this protection. Besides, they have no fur. Neither can they use their eyes. But a baby hare has fur, lots of it, and is able to look out of its eyes immediately. Hence its parents do not need to go to the trouble of providing a deep burrow for its cradle.

This pet bunny, called Snowball, has large ears, but they would seem small in comparison with some. Breeders have raised rabbits with ears twenty-three inches long and six inches wide. One would think such a creature had run to ears the way some radishes run to tops.

Rabbits have babies four to eight times a year. There are from three to eight babies each time. That is what led a little boy to boast that his pet was good at arithmetic. He had heard his father say that rabbits multiplied rapidly!

A rabbit is old at seven years, when one would think it was just beginning its education.

Couldn't Catch Peggy

Seven-year-old Peggy was drawing the picture of a house and finally announced it completed.

"But where are the chimneys?" she was asked.

Peggy's face fell for a moment as she noticed this important omission, but she quickly recovered her presence of mind.

"Oh, this kind of a house doesn't need chimneys," she answered calmly. "It is heated by radiators."

White Naughtiness

BY PAULINE FRANCES CAMP

A little white dog came trotting along;
Snowy his fur, and light.
But somewhere beneath
Were sharp little teeth,
And I knew that the doggy would bite—
Oh, yes!
Although he was woolly and white.

A little white cat came purring along,
Snowy, the dog to match.
But the fluffy wee paws
Hid sharp little claws,
And I knew that the kitty could scratch—
Oh, yes!
Though white as a ripe cotton patch.

A little white lie came tiptoeing by,
Whispering "Almost true!"
But it spoiled, so they say,
A little boy's day;
And his honor was stained by it, too—
Oh, yes!
Such harm can a white lie do!

MISSIONARY WORK

General Assembly in Korea

The second annual session of the Korean Presbyterian General Assembly comprising workers and converts of four Presbyterian missions—Northern, Southern, Canadian and Australian—met at Seoul from Sept. 7 to 11. Rev. G. Engel of the Australian mission was elected moderator and the vice moderator was Pastor Han of North church in Seoul. In American Assemblies successive evenings are given to different church interests, but there is only one general interest to the Korean Christians, and that is foreign missions. So each evening the "popular meeting" dealt with the foreign mission work.

Reports from the mission begun on the island of Quelpart in 1907 were most encouraging. The Korean Church now has six native workers there and over a dozen churches have been organized. The Assembly also turned its attention to Siberia, where the efforts of the Korean Church were stopped two years ago when the Russian government imprisoned all the Korean colporteurs. The one ordained man who had crossed over into Siberia saved himself from imprisonment by joining the Greek Catholic church. But more liberal conditions now prevail and another man is to be sent into this field. Three Koreans were likewise formally set apart for the work among the Chinese in the station which the Assembly a year ago determined to establish in the province of Shantung, China. The volunteers for this work are three young Koreans whom the missionaries consider to be men of exceptional power. They were consecrated to the work in a service of wonderful power and were to sail for China on the 30th of October. They will of course have to spend a considerable time in learning the Chinese language, just as Americans do when they go into that country.

The statistics reported from the Korean churches showed for the year a gain of 10 per cent in membership. There was also a large increase in contributions.

The one administrative question in the Assembly was the matter of how large a relative weight should be given in the courts of the Korean Church to the voice and vote of the missionaries. The missionaries themselves raised this question, not the Koreans, and after having debated it at great length in their own council they proposed in General Assembly that they should elect as commissioners two persons out of every five ordained men in their own body. The native representation is one pastor and one elder from every five congregations and it was felt that this limited representation of the missionaries would not overawe or overpower the Korean element. The basis proposed would make the Korean vote about 120 and the missionary vote between thirty and forty. But the Koreans opposed the missionaries' suggestion, not because the missionaries were claiming too much but because they were claiming too little. It was the judgment of the Koreans that they needed more missionary strength in the Assembly, not less, and therefore by the wish of the Koreans the missionary proposition was laid on the table for a year—a result very different from what would have ensued upon the same sort of discussion in either China or Japan.

Succeeding the meeting of the Presbyterian General Assembly the Federal Council of Korea, which includes the Methodists, met for two days. The principal matter of discussion in that body was the graded system of Sunday school lessons, which was tried in Korea last year. The loss on the enterprise proved to be about 900 yen and it was agreed that the system was costing too much. A simpler plan was therefore formulated, but it was agreed that the graded lesson principle should not be abandoned and the new work goes on on that basis.

First Fruits of China Campaign

A party of twenty-two men and women, mostly newly appointed missionaries of the Presbyterian Church, recently traveled together in a private car from Chicago to San Francisco to embark on the Chiyo Maru for their field of work in China. In the party were fourteen women, five young men and one lad. Of the women three were married. Two of these have been on the mission field in China for several years and were returning to their families.

The above is a picture of the Board's newly appointed missionaries as they traveled from Chicago to San Francisco in their private tourist car, to embark on the Chiyo Maru

The success of this innovation in missionary travel is largely due to the efforts of one of the young men of the party in whose mind the idea had its inception. Without doubt so many missionaries traveling in a special car for so long a distance is unique in the history of Presbyterian missions. While unique, it has most interest to the church at large because such a contingent is only the first fruits of the recent China campaign so successfully undertaken by the church.

In Salt Lake City on Sunday a union service of the three Presbyterian churches was held. Two "off to the Orient" meetings were held in Berkeley, near San Francisco, to arouse missionary interest and especially to quicken the thought of foreign service in the minds of the young men and women of the California State University.

Those in the party were: Mrs. Hunter Corbett and daughter Louise, Mrs. W. O. Elterich, Miss Helen and Master Wilford, Miss Lulu A. Francis, Miss Mary I. Craig, Miss Mary Preston, Miss Anna Reed, Miss Marie E. Woodward, Miss Anna E. Kidder, Miss Emily E. Patterson, Miss Helen C. Silsby, Miss Mae Chapin, Miss Irene Cowen, Miss Helen E. Christman, Rev. and Mrs. John R. Lyons, Paul C. Cassat, Dr. Le Roy F. Heimberger, Rev. Delbert L. Coleman, Rev. W. W. Highberger.

Senior Presbyterian of Japan

Dr. David Thompson, the senior of Presbyterians among the mission forces in Japan, has now been a full half century on the field. He sailed from New York Sept. 1, 1862, in a 1,200 ton clipper ship called "Belle of the West." The journey of this vessel to Shanghai by way of the Cape of Good Hope and the Philippines took 184 days. It took two weeks more to travel the remaining distance in another ship from Shanghai to Yokohama. When Dr. Thompson landed in Yokohama the historic edicts which forbade the entrance of Christianity into Japan were still displayed on public bulletin boards and were nominally in force. No preaching had been begun. None of the missionaries except Dr. J. C. Hepburn were yet able to speak the language, and Dr. Hepburn was devoting himself to the practice of medicine.

Not only were there no converts as yet, but no prospect of any visible among the people, who were either hostile, indifferent or afraid. The first church in the empire was not organized until nine years later. Dr. Thompson declares that anyone who has seen the tremendous advance of Christianity within the Japanese empire since that time "cannot doubt that Christianity is founded in the nation today too deeply for it to be uprooted."

Dr. and Mrs. Thompson were recently guests of honor at a reception given them by friends in Tokyo, both missionaries and Japanese. Dr. William Imbrie presided, and the congratulatory addresses with telegrams from interested friends who were not permitted to be present represented practically all the existing Christian forces in Japan.

Surgery Under Difficulties in Persia

The need of a well-equipped woman's hospital in Tabriz, Persia, toward which the women of Colorado have undertaken to provide $5,000, is illustrated in a recent letter from Mrs. L. C. VanHook of that station, telling of four most difficult operations that Dr. Edna C. Orcutt had had to perform amid very adverse surroundings. For one of these "she was called to the one-room house of a Moslem on a bitter cold day to find the patient surrounded by thirty-five women, all of whom were talking and all of whom were smoking. She first requested thirty women to depart, keeping five to assist her. She then borrowed a stove, as the patient was suffering from the cold, and only after hours of preparation was able to proceed with the operation."

Board Notes and Announcements

—Mrs. George B. Lown, literature secretary of the Board of the Northwest, leading the Friday morning meeting at Chicago, chose a lesson from John 14, "Peace I leave with you." Mrs. Berry introduced Miss H. O. Lawrence of New York, saying, "She might be named in various ways—as secretary of the Woman's Foreign Board of the Dutch Reformed Church, as delegate to the International Missionary Union, as representing the central committee of united mission study—but I will introduce her simply as my friend." Having within two years visited missions in India, China and Japan, Miss Lawrence testified to the gratitude and the prayerfulness of Christian women of various races. She met in China "those whose feet are but two and a half inches long, but their tongues are not bound. How eager they are to take part! One pair of spectacles was made to do for six women." Another welcome guest was Miss M. Josephine Petrie, young people's secretary of the Woman's Board of Home Missions, on her return from the meetings of synodical societies in the Southwest. The president, who represented the board at Goshen, Ind., called it the best synodical meeting she had ever attended. The report of Mrs. Thomas E. D. Bradley, treasurer, showed total receipts within seven months to have been $60,398.

—For a week during December, 15 to 22, it is hoped that Rev. George C. Doolittle, for twenty years a missionary in Syria, will be in Chicago. Those who have read his letters will want to hear his lecture on "The Triumphs of the Cross in Syria." If a church or society can provide a stereopticon and operator he will illustrate the talk with a profusion of pictures. His address during furlough is 110 East College street, Oberlin, Ohio.

November 23, 1913—Joshua, the New Leader

Everyday View of the Lesson

By J. L. Scott

Lesson Text, Joshua 1:1-9. Golden Text, Joshua 1:9: Be strong and of good courage.

The contrast between Joshua and Moses is marked. One was a soldier, the other a prophet. As to Joshua's boyhood we know only by inference. He belonged to the tribe of Ephraim and was the twelfth in line from Joseph. He was probably born at Goshen and at about the time that Moses fled to Midian. God prepares things long in advance of the need of them. Moses at 40 years, flying before the face of vengeance, little thought that among the slave cabins of Israel a child was being born whose life would one day become a part of his own.

God's estimate of us can best be measured by what he gives us to do. Moses was to lead the people out of Egypt, while Joshua was to lead them into Canaan. One was essential to the other. Each required an ability that the other did not possess. And yet Moses was by far the greater man. His prophetic endowment brought him face to face with God. Joshua's office was more remote. He also communed with God, but through the priesthood. Nowhere is the superiority of the pen over the sword given clearer illustration. Men are great only within their own spheres. That of Moses ended at the Jordan, while it was there that Joshua's began.

Martial Ability of Joshua Shows Itself in His First Battle

Where Joshua learned the art of war we do not know, but Moses was not slow to discover his marked ability. Napoleon claimed that his patent dated from his first battle and to a similar source history credits the beginning of Joshua's career. The children of Israel but three months after they had gone out from Egypt were attacked by the Amalekites at Rephidim and there followed one of the bloodiest battles ever fought in the desert. In that battle Joshua, a young man of 40, commanded. The victory was complete, and from then on he was the one man on whom the lawgiver constantly relied. He accompanied him to the summit of Sinai and waited like a sentinel at the door of the sanctuary, while his master talked with God. No mission was too great to be confided to him. He was one of the twelve spies sent forward to observe the country and he returned with heart aflame for the attack. But the people refused to advance, and for thirty-eight years he shared in the obscurity of Israel.

But no time is ever lost in the plans of God. Moses and Joshua finally returned to the borders of Canaan, one to die and the other to assume his place. Tradition says that Joshua, appalled at the stupendous work before him, rent his garment and fell weeping at the feet of Moses, but the lawgiver raised him from the earth and assured him that he alone was the choice of God. If this be true it recalls a similar scene in Midian, when Moses at the burning bush hesitated to face the responsibility that God would lay upon him. Hesitation is not always the effect of doubt. It may be a sense of humility born of real worth.

God in the Shadows Cast by the Death of Moses

The death of Moses occurred at what must have seemed a time most disastrous to the welfare of Israel. The Israelites stood upon the shores of a sea. What lay beyond it? The familiar form which they had followed for forty years had passed into the eternal shadows. But God is always in the shadows. He never forgets his own. This was as true in the day of Joshua as it is now. Those thirty days of mourning that followed the death of Moses were not merely conventional. They held genuine sorrow. But work is a great comforter. The son must put hand to the plow and complete the furrow.

"Moses my servant is dead." That was God's eulogy. Moses had been his servant and God could say nothing more. No monument was needed to perpetuate his memory. What he had been would survive. His grave may be unknown, but his service is immortal.

Life succeeds death. "Now therefore arise, go over this Jordan, thou, and all the people." Their future lay upon the other side. The conquest of Canaan was in the interest of morality. The Phœnicians were a commercial people and the Hittites, too, were a people of culture, but their religion was death. The one God who forms the basis of the present civilization they knew nothing about. The country belonged to God; he had given it to Israel.

Joshua was to attempt the conquest with full confidence of success. Nothing else could accomplish it. Two things were essential, faith in God and faith in himself. The God of Moses was to be also his god. But Joshua must also contribute of his own strength. He had courage and must use it. Until one has exhausted his own resources he has no right to appeal to God.

Guide of Moses to Be Also the Guide of Joshua

But he must go about his task in a rational way. The written law was to be his guide. Joshua was to sail his craft by the same compass that had guided Moses all his life. Then having selected his course he must turn neither to the right nor to the left. Constancy of purpose is essential to all true success. In times of doubt and despair he must not falter. The commands of God are ever possible to obey, else they had not been given.

Before everyone lies the conquest of life. The same counsel that God gave Joshua he gives to all. The principles laid down on the banks of the Jordan lose none of their force when applied to the present. Truth is universal. Methods vary, but purposes are the same. The God of Moses was not only the God of Joshua—he is the God of everyone who waits to serve him.

The Lesson Verse by Verse

By Hermon D. Jenkins

ANALYSIS—Joshua was called to a difficult duty which he admirably discharged. It is an honor to be called to succeed a successful man. God was leading Israel to a fertile and fruitful land, but to secure it faith, courage and obedience were imperative.

"Joshua was Moses's successor as the leader of Israel. To him was given the supreme task of leading the people into the inheritance and of conquering it for them. What he needed was faith, assured confidence in God who had promised to give him the land, and courage to execute that commission. Both of these Joshua had to an eminent degree.

"Boldness is an essential element of courage, boldness to do and to dare. All successful workers for God have it. Paul had it, but longed for more of it. Courage has its root in faith, and faith its root in the word of God." —Moorehead.

"A religious warrior is a peculiar character; a Gustavus Adolphus, an Oliver Cromwell, a Henry Havelock, a General Gordon. Joshua was of this mold. He stands out as one of the early military heroes of the church. In depth, in steadiness, in endurance his faith was not excelled by that of Abraham or by that of Moses himself. The one conviction which dominated all his life was that God had called him to his work."—Blaikie.

Joshua Stands Out in Striking Resemblance to Washington

"Joshua stands forth as one of the most remarkable men of Jewish history, certainly its one striking military figure. Joshua seems to me to have resembled our Washington. Like Washington he was trained for his great work by seeing the land before the struggle for its possession began, and by his experience as a soldier. Like him he was chosen by the appointing power and accepted by the people. Like him he had before him a seven years' war to endure and like him he became ruler of the land and the people when the war closed."—Wharton.

Verse 1—The man who follows a discredited statesman, a broken financier, a defeated general, is sure of full credit for his gifts and accomplishments. But who could succeed Beecher as an orator, Tennyson as a poet or Lincoln as a master of men? The career of Moses was long, eventful, brilliant. But it came to its close just when, to human eyes, he was most needed. To succeed the great leader in the very crisis of the battle, when the issue was joined but hung wavering in the balance, required either a very self-sufficient man or a man of great faith in his cause and his King. Joshua was a man of the latter sort and his career made plain the reason why God chose him.

Verse 2—"Moses is dead." Joshua hardly needed to be told that. It was his last thought at night and his first remembrance in the morning. But God lives! And it was God who had promised the victory to his chosen people.

Verse 3—God never plans a half-victory for his saints. He did not intend that Israel should hold a city here and a hill there amid a swarming multitude of foes. Israel was not to possess the wells of Beersheba and lose the mountain of Dan (I. Kings 4:25). God never intends that the redeemed soul shall be master of his ideals and slave of his appetites. He is not to triumph over his passions and surrender to his fears. The old English poet Chaucer understood this when he said God "saves us every whit or not a deal."

The Saved Life a Life of Beauty and Fruitfulness

Verse 4—God did not redeem his people from slavery to set them free in a wilderness. Of all the known Oriental lands Palestine was then and might yet be the land of most varied and precious products. Its mountains and its valleys, its wide plains and beautiful lakes afforded all that life could desire of material comforts. We greatly dishonor God if we conceive the saved life as a life of sterile fields and valleys black with death's shadows.

Verse 5—It was true that the heights were now in the possession of tribes and races known for their fighting qualities. God was not to take it from pygmies and dwarfs, but from the Hittites and the Anakim. There are those who think God can save a man already half-saved, but doubt his ability to subdue the giant passions and cruel appetites and intrenched customs of ancient traditions; that he can save on the avenue but not in the slum, in New England, but not in New Guinea among the cannibals. In this connection every Christian could read with profit the biographies of such men as Old Whang of Mukden, the opium eater; and Lomai of Lenakel and Afrikaner of the South African veldt. Harold Begbie's "Twice-Born Men" is the twentieth century story of God's conquest of the Hittites and the Anakim of today. Joshua is reminded that what God could do for his own he had seen in the career of Moses, whom he succeeded. He would be under the same protection and leadership.

Joshua's Courage Born of Conviction of Cooperation with God

Verse 6—History is made up of a series not of miracles but of providences. Now and then God does cause the walls of Jericho to fall down when the rams' horns are blown, but the rule is that the city is taken by assault of brave men. Jerusalem may now and then be saved by a panic among the besieging host, but it is only man's extremity that can count upon God's opportune intervention. Joshua had the courage of his convictions. And his courage arose from his conviction that God was with his people.

Verse 7—Not less important is obedience. God's purpose in all this overthrow of one race and the establishment of another was not simply to replace the native population by an immigrant one, but to drive out a people of signal and notorious wickedness by one obedient to the law of holiness. Should Israel prove apostate, Israel, too, would be swept into captivity.

Verse 8—We know now what our fathers did not know, that writing and the preservation of written laws are older than the days of Abraham. The prosperity of any people will depend upon their familiarity with and obedience to the revealed word of God. But the Bible must be the subject of meditation, of loving study. It was never given as a charm to effect miracles by its mere presence, like a Russian "icon." It is not by laying it on the parlor table we are kept from sin, but by hiding it in our hearts. This is the teaching of the Old Testament as well as of the New.

BY EDWARD ARTHUR WICHER

Week Beginning November 16, 1913

Topic—The rich man and Lazarus. Luke 16:19-31.

This parable is not a discourse upon the importance of bestowing alms, but a study in the relatively insignificant worth of wealth and respectability, as compared with the human soul.

The spirit of man is of transcendent worth. A man is a living soul and has an eternal value in the eye of God. His chief end in the world is to use such things as this life affords for the culture of his spirit.

Between the rich man and Lazarus there is a contrast at three points—in life, in death and in the life beyond death.

There is a vivid contrast in the lives that Lazarus and the rich man lived. We do not read of any house that Lazarus possessed. He lived in the street. He was very poor. He was clothed in rags. He was so weak of body that he could not walk or help himself in any way. He was stricken with a loathsome Oriental disease, a plague of running sores. The natural inference is that he had no close relatives who were able to support him, or they would have been required to do so by the Jewish law. He was evidently helpless and without friends. One neighbor, rough of hand and kindly of heart, who was a little less poor, a little less wretched than himself, brought him day by day in accordance with the custom of the land and laid him in a public place, where the passers-by or the residents of the district might bestow upon him a trifling alms of food or money.

But the rich man lived in a splendid house with a spacious portal. He was superbly clothed. His purple robes were dyed with the costliest dye and were the dress of the noblest; his linen was the rich Egyptian fabric, of which a robe was worth double its weight in gold. And the ordinary meals of which this rich man partook were banquets. He dined with mirth and he fed on dainties. When his guests had eaten their fill they wiped their hands on the fragments of bread provided for the purpose and dropped them under the table.

But Lazarus was hungry and without food. He desired to feed upon these fragments of bread. But the pariah dogs of the street, themselves full of sores, were his only comrades at his banquet. Not very polite were they, for they snatched away from him the scraps he fain would have eaten. And in further aggravation of his pain and misery, they turned and licked his sores.

The rich man might have clothed Lazarus and fed him. He might at least have driven away the dogs from troubling him. But he probably thought that Lazarus was in appropriate company. He, too, was a dog. There is no selfishness like that of a cultured heartlessness.

Doubtless the rich man had a great name and a wide fame in the city where he lived, but we do not know it now. But Lazarus, associate of dogs, has a name; and it means "helped of God." It is the only name given in a parable and it is a great name.

Both men died. The griefs of Lazarus could not prevent his dying, nor could the feast of the rich man keep him alive. When the rich man died, "he was buried." It was a splendid funeral, attended by all the great and notable people of the city. It was a funeral that was talked about for several days. There is nothing said about Lazarus's burial. No one attended it. The body was cast into a pauper's grave, and the world scarcely knew that a soul had departed out of this life.

But the angels knew. Up the high steeps of the shining road the angels of God carried Lazarus, for Lazarus had a soul. It was a noble soul, though it had been incased in a vile body. It was a soul that soared in its aspiration after sweetness and holiness; and soaring, through the ministry of angels, it attained. It was a soul that rested in faith in the righteousness of God and his good government of the people of his name. And therefore there was given to Lazarus the highest honor of the Hebrew heaven—he was carried to the bosom of Abraham.

The rich man was in mortal pain. He suffered the agony of an awakened conscience. He suffered a thirst for the assuagement of which he had made no provision. He suffered the remorse of a lost opportunity and a departed day of grace. The splendors of his earthly banquets and his magnificent funeral availed nothing now to influence the course of the justice of the judgment of God.

What is the explanation of it all? The rich man, banqueting, dying, suffering? Lazarus, suffering, dying, rejoicing? What is the reason of the parable? What is the moral issue involved? It may be discovered in one little phrase in the sequel—"thy good things." This is the whole point of the story. The reveling and making a display were the good things of this man while he lived. They were the things he desired, the things upon which he expended his energies. He drowned the higher aspirations of his soul in self-indulgence. Having been given vast resources that he might use them to bless his needy brethren, he utterly forgot them. He grieved not for the wound of Jacob, but lived in callous selfishness.

It does not do to excuse the rich man on the ground that he did not do Lazarus any harm. He failed to render him assistance. A high authority has told us that for the man who knows to do good and does not do it, it is sin. In the rich man there was no revolt of spirit against the things of sense, no uprising of manhood against the crushing tyranny of worldly gratification, no arming of the soul for the warfare against the invasion of softness.

Wealth and commerce, respectability and comfort may strangle the life of a soul. We do not need to fear poverty nearly so much as we need to fear self-indulgence. We do not need the dread of the power of materialism. We need the reassuring sense of the supremacy of the human spirit. We need the return upon the world of our self-controlled reason, with the compassion of an aroused moral nature, with the power that is conferred by an emancipation from the sway of worldly possessions. Then will our good things be more than earthly goods. They will be the good things of Lazarus.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SERVICE

COMMENTS IN BRIEF BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS

November 23, 19 3

THE TUNE TO WHICH WE TRAVEL

Topic—Discontent or praise: Which in your life? Psalm 100.

Even the doctors agree that "a cheerful heart is a good medicine." There is an absolute physical value in a joyful soul. The fretful spirit is likely ere long to have an ailing body or an additional reason for fretfulness. Even on the low plane of self-interest the habit of happiness is to be cultivated. For the praiseful life is the peaceful life and the powerful life.

Music helps soldiers drill and march. The tunes which the bands play are lively and merry, for as the music is, so will be the march. It is possible to travel through life to the tune of praise. The habit of counting our mercies is as easy to form as the habit of grumbling; and it is a gem on one's forehead, while the other is a ball and chain to one's ankle. Since everybody is master of his own habits, why not train up good ones while about it?

There are prudential and philosophical reasons for cultivating the spirit of joy, but they are not the best reasons. The fact of God is the surest foundation for happiness. God is, and he is good. His thoughts toward us are loving thoughts. He plans happiness for us. Therefore, the least return that we can make is to join the chorus of nature and sing his praise. A grateful, rejoicing spirit, established in the spirit of thanksgiving, is the surest defense against the cares of life.

It makes for refinement and strength of spirit to cultivate a sense of gratitude which endures. A resolute principle never to forget a benefactor and never to fail to acknowledge a kindness is a fundamental equipment for noble living.

The person who keeps his soul turned gratefully toward the Father in heaven will always have sunshine on his face. Devotion to the Highest helps even in the lowliest and littlest things.

To be unhappy is really dangerous. Many a one who has childishly hugged to his heart a sorrow has found it ere long an "old man of the sea" astride his back.

The usage of grace before meat is said to be dying out in America. This is serious, if true, because the open acknowledgment of God's goodness in providing for our daily needs not only sanctifies the common meal, but it is also a daily reminder of our indebtedness to God.

Just to be glad is gratitude. A child's pleasure in a gift affords parents more gratification than any words of thanks. When we enjoy the good gifts which we have from heaven and when we live sunnily and helpfully we show a real gratitude which may be lacking from personal words of praise.

When a nation's thoughts are turned upward the roots of its strength strike downward.

Thanks-living is the best thanks-giving.

"To everyone on earth
God gives a burden, to be carried down
The road that lies between the cross and crown.
No lot is wholly free;
He giveth one to thee.

"Some carry it aloft,
Open and visible to any eyes,
And all may see its form and weight and size.
Some hide it in their breast,
And deem it there unguessed."

It is rather a high, hard doctrine, but a true one, that nothing—literally nothing—enters a Christian's life for which he may not be thankful to God. The Pauline word is sound: "In everything give thanks." For burdens which make us strong; for sorrow, which makes us look beyond today; for adversity which opens the door to the visits of the spirit; for disappointment which turns our eyes to the things that fail not; for ingratitude which pricks our consciences—for all these, and every other experience of life, we may sincerely give thanks to the Sender, who is planning our spirits' welfare for two worlds.

I thank thee, Lord, at break of day,
When all the East is red with sun,
For health and hope and heart to say,
I would be part of any way
In which the will of God is done.

I thank thee at the time of rest
For strength that held the long day through;
Footsore and worn, yet peace-possessed,
I know the honest toil is best
Of him who strives thy will to do.

And though the task that I have sought
Transcends my hands' unaided skill,
I thank thee for this mighty thought—
That all the wonders to be wrought
Lie hidden in thy perfect will.

Notable New Novels

VAN CLEVE, by Mary S. Watts. It's one of the distinguishing features of this fall's books that several prominent writers should have written what may be considered their best work. There's Mary Johnston and Mrs. Burnett and Meredith Nicholson and Basil King and that extraordinary new star in the sky, Ethel Sidgwick; and now here comes Mrs. Watts, the author of "The Legacy" and "Nathan Burke," with a story that stands at the top of her achievement—and in fact very close to the pinnacle of the year's fiction. "Van Cleve" is modern in setting, but it is written with such exhaustive care for detail and such evidences of the richness of its author's mind that it has all the flavor of the masterpiece of a decade ago. The hero is a young man upon whom falls the burden of supporting a family of silly, well-meaning woman folk. The way he manages it all is so to his credit that it makes the typical modern hero look like pretty feeble stuff. "Van Cleve" is a great book, full of that essential cleanliness and artistic painstaking that make a piece of literature live. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.35 net.

THE STORY OF WAITSTILL BAXTER, by Kate Douglas Wiggin. By just the measure of an atrocious old skinflint deacon is the charm of this story, as compared with other of Mrs. Wiggin's creations, imperiled. Deacon Baxter is too hatefully mean for fiction; only in real life can the occasional existence of such a creature be admitted! But the awakening of spirit in his two charming daughters by the magic touch of love, and their rebellion against the paternal tyranny, make a pleasing sequel to a somewhat distressing beginning. It is a story of fine spirit, delightfully written. One is glad to feel that Waitstill and Patty and Ivory and Mark are typical of American life, rather than the deacon—or the blase heroes of some recent novels that have had the public stage. Mrs. Wiggin is never dull and yet she has never put into print a harmful sentence. Long may her pen be active! [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1.30 net.

SUCCESSION: A Comedy of the Generations, by Ethel Sidgwick. A masterpiece in its field —and its field is a superlatively high one. Such a judgment may sound uncritical and unconservative, but it is neither. Aside from any question of personal taste or preference Ethel Sidgwick is a writer of such astonishing gifts that the question of her permanence is undoubtedly established; the peculiar thing about her "arrival" is that even now she's practically unknown to the general reader. She belongs to the famous English family of Sidgwicks; she has written three novels before this one—"Promise," "Herself" and "The Gentleman"—and the reason that she's not so far been discussed largely by the general public is because her work is more or less esoteric, having its chief interest in the subtleties of music, art and literature. Critically, Ethel Sidgwick has received the most elaborate encomiums and her claim to literary accomplishment is as definite as Romain Rolland's. The present novel, "Succession," is really a continuation of "Promise," though perfectly complete in itself. Its chief character is a wonder-child violinist, the last of an old aristocratic French family whose genius for three generations has been given lavishly to music. This child finds it impossible to follow the musical ideas of his grandfather—hence the comedy, the tragedy and the beauty. The reviewer knows of no character in modern fiction so overwhelmingly lovable as little Antoine. The audience for "Succession" is bound to be limited; but if you like a masterly character analysis, if you enjoy a splendid story for its own sake, above all, if you love music in all its profundities and want to understand its creation, then you will want this book. HAGAR, by Mary Johnston, is a novel of such sterling qualities and such tremendous interest that one has very little hesitancy in saying, "Surely this is the best thing Miss Johnston has done!" In Hagar—the girl heroine in whose imaginative life one reads such unmistakable signs of autobiography—Miss Johnston has made herself the prophet of the new woman, and no one that we can recall has been so persuasive a spokesman—has done so much to explain and justify woman's recent surging toward selfhood. Hagar is a precocious small child when the story opens; we see her being punished by her horrified relations for reading Darwin, and, since they feel the punishment must be made to fit the crime, they forbid her to read anything for a whole week—surely the greatest calamity that could befall her. Later on Hagar leaves the southern plantation for a New York school and then some of her blind young gropings toward a life of service are given expression. It's at this period that she remarks, when someone suggests the possibility of her being insulted if she goes about alone, "I could never feel more insulted than, sometimes, I have been at home." It's a temptation to quote Hagar at length; but, aside from the story of how she grows into a beautiful, achieving woman, the book has other qualities that must be remarked. One is that it's essentially clean and fine; it touches the heights and the depths without a suggestion of the sordidness that a great many modern writers deem necessary. Another is that as far as its technique is concerned it might have been written by a poet. Miss Johnston has an enchanting fashion of ending a chapter on a note of pure lyricism—for instance: "Until the pink in the west was ashes of roses and the fireflies were out." "Hagar" is enormously worth while; the woman herself is truly, as someone describes her, "a dark, rich thing with wings." [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1.40 net.

THE WAY HOME, by Basil King, who wrote "The Inner Shrine" and "The Street Called Straight," is a book of big purpose admirably wrought. It tells the story of the struggle of a man, brought up in a rector's home in New York, who rebels at what he conceives to be hypocrisy, spurns the church and sets out to make money by fair means or foul. Marrying finally the girl whom he had pursued devotedly for several years, he soon finds his attention centered on another, and a great wall of coldness grows up between him and his wife. Then his fortunes fail somewhat and, worst of all, his health. His wife had refused all mention of divorce for her own sake and that of her children; but when she finds him suffering she brings the other girl to him—her supreme sacrifice. But the man comes to his senses when the girl tells of her engagement to her young lover, innocently expecting the congratulations of her father's old friend of whom she had never thought in any other light. Then the man turns back to his wife and strugglingly, gropingly, but very humanly finally finds the deep meaning of human devotion and then grows slowly into an appreciation of the significance of God and the life beyond. T. TEMBAROM, by Frances Hodgson Burnett. What would a young man, literally brought up on the streets of New York, do with a princely fortune? Mrs. Burnett answers that question convincingly and entertainingly in one of the best novels of the season. The story has been running in The Century magazine, where it attracted deserved attention. Tambarom's father left England in a pet and later both parents died while he was still a child. He earns his living first as a newsboy and then as a reporter, and he falls in love with little Ann, a red haired girl of unusual personality who lived at his cheap boarding house. Then comes the astonishing news of his heirship to the vast estate in Lancashire. The transition to the aristocratic circles of the staid old English town is startling, but the boyish life and energy of the new "master" soon make him well liked in his changed environment—in spite of, or perhaps because of, his breezy ways and New York slang. There are frequent humorous encounters and the book sparkles with witty as well as dramatic situations, with here and there a touch of pathos. There is a big, heroic episode which it is not fair to attempt to condense here. [Century Company, New York. $1.40 net.

THE GARDEN WITHOUT WALLS, by Coningsby Dawson. Mr. Dawson has written extensively and delightfully—stories, essays and some of the most discriminating book reviews published in this country—but he has not before tackled a novel. And "The Garden Without Walls" is such a finished thing that one can't think of it as a first effort. The author describes the hero as "a clean-souled rebel, whose Puritan conscience was at war with his pagan imagination," and he leads him out of the walled garden into that garden of heart's desire that has no barriers, letting him discover for himself the emptiness therein. His first struggle is his falling in love with a married woman who refuses to ruin her husband's life; and then comes a liaison with an actress, terminated by her out of revenge. The moral is pointed without any uncertainty, but some of the story is not very pleasant reading. The tone of the book is high, however, and there are chapters, particularly in the first part, that leave one enchanted. [Henry Holt and Company, New York. $1.35 net.

The Custom of the Country, by Edith Wharton, leaves the reader somewhat impatient because its subject matter impresses one as scarcely worthy of having Mrs. Wharton's brilliant talents expended upon it. Through the mire of unscrupulous social ambitions, the divorce courts and a suicide the heroine plows her way to—shall we say—nothingness? It's all so devastating it reminds one of Francis Thompson's haunting line: "My days have crackled and gone up in smoke." Mrs. Wharton is a writer, despite the contrary minded, with a spiritual garden — witness "Ethan Frome." Why can't we have more flowers from her? [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $1.35 net.

The Dark Flower, by John Galsworthy. With all deepest and sincerest appreciation of the extraordinary art of Mr. Galsworthy's latest story, one cannot pass it by without asking, "What possible good does such a novel do?" It is the record of the love life of an English artist, done with tremendous emotional power and what must be called the poetry of prose writing; but this very beauty tends to cloud the moral issue. Mr. Galsworthy's gifts might well be—and ordinarily are—turned to a better purpose. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $1.35 net.

The Passionate Friends, by H. G. Wells, tells of a love affair between a man and woman (each of whom is married), begun on the basis of intellectual companionship and developing into a passionate completeness of love. They break no laws, and the woman kills herself in the end. The story by no means reveals Mr. Wells—who is one of the most significant of the modern English school of writers—at his best. It may be necessary to add that this is not a book to give to young people; it is extremely outspoken, even unnecessarily so. [Harper and Brothers, New York. $1.35.

The Woman Thou Gavest Me, by Hall Caine. In attempting any critical estimate of Mr. Caine's work one can only say that here is an author who knows his audience and writes to please it. In the story of Mary O'Neill, a woman who breaks the law for love and then pays the penalty, he shows unrelentingly that the wages of sin is death. But the method of pushing home the lesson is so salacious that one doubts the net result. Mr. Caine seemingly has written with his eye on the present-day demand for sex stories. [J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia. $1.35 net.

Bendish: A Story of Prodigality, by Maurice Hewlett. Lord Byron serves Mr. Hewlett as a model for an episodic but brilliant treatment of the case of the poet. The thing is painted with strokes that need no retouching —like a Sargent; and it glows and burns with the intricate beauties of Hewlett's colors. Byron is interesting material for a hand like Hewlett's. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $1.35 net.

The Coryston Family, by Mrs. Humphry Ward, from out its intensely English atmosphere breathes a very human situation that will appeal to many. Though the setting has to do largely with the question of land and inheritance in England, the theme has a wider applicability; it is the story of a domineering, intolerant woman and the harm she worked in her children by attempting to arrange their very thoughts. She was also greatly interested in politics, and the author has taken the opportunity to draw a picture of the havoc wrought by the political interests which left her no time to seek her children's confidence. Lady Coryston is a very telling picture of the result of perverted energies. The book moves with considerable rapidity, is free from superfluities and makes an interesting and suggestive novel. [Harper and Brothers, New York. $1.35 net.

Other Stories of Note

Rising Dawn, by Harold Bebgie, gives an unusual and a most adequate picture of mental darkness with its gradual flowering into light. The story is laid in the troubled days of the fourteenth-century England when papal power was at its height and multitudes were living in the most abject and horrifying poverty, Chaucer was wafting abroad his poetic fragrance and Wycliffe was spreading his gospel of freedom from papal domination. Under the influence of these two fell a sturdy young Saxon squire who knew not how to read or write and knew of the Bible only a few passages in Latin. Wycliffe kindles his mind and leads him to the light. The book isn't a tract at all; it has stir and adventure, lords' castles and peasant poverty depicted with a firm hand and a seeing eye, so that in itself it makes a good tale. But its real hold on literary life is this careful tracing of the growth of intellectual and emotional spiritual qualities out of the muck of the gross, the brutal, the miserable and tyrannical from which English liberty of person and religion finally sprang. It is the presentment of the individual development that was necessary for the mass to attain. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.25 net.

The Wondrous Wife, by Charles Marriott, is a story of a woman's love and renunciation told with a convincing simplicity that makes it unforgettable. Mr. Marriott has never revealed a finer grasp of character subtleties and complicated psychology than in drawing his present heroine, a woman of strong religious convictions and high ideals, yet humanly weak. Her dignity having been outraged beyond endurance by her husband's unfaithfulness, she seeks shelter in the home of her brother; and later a new man comes into her life who means more to her than her husband ever has. The poignancy of her struggle between inclination and duty is most vividly depicted, but on learning that her husband has been stricken with locomotor ataxia, she forgets self and goes back to him because he needs her. [Bobbs-Merrill Company, Indianapolis. $1.35 net.

The White Thread, by Robert Halifax, shows a slice of real life with a vividness that pricks vitally into the reader's consciousness. It is a very simply planned little story—almost a mere sequence of events—but its heroine (a little servant girl with a discouraged father who hangs himself, a drunken mother and a brother in the insane asylum) is worth knowing. She is weak sometimes and she makes mistakes, but no reader can misjudge her; and her struggles against the numerous temptations that threaten her, typical of thousands of girlish lives, make very absorbing reading. Mr. Halifax knows his slums, and he gives them to us not reeking melodramatically but in the clear white light of common reality. [Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. $1.25 net.

Joan Thursday, by Louis Joseph Vance, is an exceedingly well written piece of theatrical fiction, a definite departure from this author's usual type of work. It is a vividly convincing and minutely photographic picture, in the first part, of a poor but lovely girl who sets out to make her living as a clerk and of the difficulties put in her way by men. Her entrance into theatrical life and its meaning is illuminatingly portrayed, too, but from then on she develops into a mere selfish machine about whom it is really unprofitable to read. None of the book is pleasant, but it is all powerful and the first part of it has a broad significance lacked by the latter part. [Little, Brown and Company, Boston. $1.30 net.

The Will to Live, by M. P. Willcocks, tantalizes with its jerky, fragmentary procedure, and its people don't ring true. The theme is that of sex and the power a woman should exercise in choosing for her potential children the right sort of father. Along with this is frilled the idea that a woman should have more than a sex value, that she should "do" something. Miss Willcocks writes with vigor and with finish, but this book is unhappily disjointed, and she is writing on a theme that requires delicacy of treatment to be effective. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.35 net.

Watersprings, by Arthur Christopher Benson. On a theme full of vivid human possibilities Mr. Benson has built what may be best described as an academic romance, exquisite in conception but unfortunately ponderous in execution. The story has to do with a Cambridge University don, comfortably clever and good-natured, but unvitalized, who is quickened into consciousness and emotion by a young girl half his years. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $1.35 net.

The Dust of the Road, by Marjorie Patterson, is a genuine and distinctive behind-the-scenes stage story that is full of wholesome charm both in plot and characters. The heroine, a young American girl with grit and a fine sense of humor, goes to London to win fame as an actress. The hero is a red-haired sculptor who has turned actor, and their romance furnishes a delightful love story. [Henry Holt and Company, New York. $1.30 net.

Footprints Beneath the Snow, by Henry Bordeaux. M. Bordeaux's insistence is always upon abnegation and the strength of renunciation. His new story, strongly conceived and executed, has a man's forgiveness of a faithless wife and the wife's regeneration for theme. [Duffield and Company, New York. $1.25 net.

The Desired Woman, by Will Harben, revives the old question of a man's past overshadowing his future. Mostyn had lived a dissolute life, then he fell in love with a sweet, simple mountain girl but felt he was not good enough for her. While hesitating he was urged into a marriage of convenience with a girl in his own social class, which developed much unhappiness for both of them. He continued loving the girl, and under her influence bore the disasters that came upon him bravely and righted earlier wrongs which he had committed. When again he was free, however, she loved another man and he was left wholly alone. The idea is strong, but the story is told with certain crudities. [Harper and Brothers, New York. $1.30 net.

A Prisoner in Fairyland, by Algernon Blackwood, is one of the most exquisite books for the season for anyone who has an alert imagination, a love of fantasy and plenty of time—for it is a long book and it moves very deliberately. It is the simple story of a grown-up man who is still able to go back and dream his childhood dreams, of a writer with a big brood of exuberant children and of the way they all learn how the world is in need of sympathy. Readers who enjoy humanized fairy stories should not miss this joyous treat. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.35 net.

Robin Hood's Barn, by Alice Brown, is rather more fantastical than other stories of Miss Brown's, having to do with a man's emergence from discontent through the springlike influence of a charming girl. "Robin Hood's Barn" is the magic land of outdoors. Simple and sweet and beautifully done, but the illustrations are insupportable. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.25 net.

Pelle the Conqueror: Boyhood, by Martin Anderson Nexo. The author is a little-known Danish writer who has achieved in "Pelle" a masterly analysis of poverty and a triumph of boyhood psychology. This is a novel on a big scale—one that is bound to be much discussed as it becomes more generally known. [Henry Holt and Company, New York. $1.40.

Books to Be Treasured

The White Linen Nurse, by Eleanor Hallowell Abbott. Lovers of that altogether charming bit of romance, "Molly Make-Believe," will find the author's reputation as a creator of breezy, dainty, original fiction fully sustained in this new book. The fact that the sprightliness is a bit overdone in no way lessens the sustained interest of the story itself. A charming little nurse, so tired of her profession that her "noble expression ached," finds herself abruptly precipitated into the life of the gruff senior surgeon and his sour-tempered little invalid daughter. She contracts to do "heart work for two" and accomplishes at least two miracles—and some other things. [Century Company, New York. $1.

The Open Window, by E. Temple Thurston, will be particularly enjoyed by ministers, for it has a gentle old curate philosopher for hero. He tells of the happy springtimes that pass and weaves a little romance into the telling. [D. Appleton and Company, New York. $1.30 net.

The Whimsy Girl, by Charlotte Canty, is just the right book to give to someone who needs cheering up. Its heroine is lame and piteously poor, but of a spirit so dauntless that she makes happiness come true. Wistfully appealing and inspiring. [Dodd, Mead and Company, New York. 75 cents net.

Author "The Broken Halo"

The Responsibilities of Ruffles, by Margery Watson. If you want a book about a perfectly irresistible small boy you may turn to this one in confidence. Charmingly written by a new author, it presents also a company of sunshiny young people and some dear older ones. [Pilgrim Press, Boston. $1 net.

Making Over Martha, by Julie M. Lippmann. You remember "Martha-by-the-Day"—that captivating Irish charwoman with the sunny smile and the radiant philosophy. In this book she's even improved, and has a love affair. [Henry Holt and Company, New York. $1.20.

The House of Happiness, by Kate Langley Bosher. "There are some women you just want to have around!" is a tribute paid to Taska, the heroine of this wholly delightful story by the author of "Mary Cary." Also there are some books "you just want to have around," and this is one of them, so pure is it, so sweet-spirited, so filled with unselfish thought for others, and still so bright and jolly and amusing. That the author could keep this atmosphere untainted in the sanitarium setting of the story speaks well for her art. A man and a woman fight their way up through blight and discouragement to health and high happiness. Best of all, they carry others along with them. [Harper and Brothers, New York. $1.25.

When I Was a Little Girl, by Zona Gale, is so exqisite that we want our older readers to have a share in it as well as those younger ones for whom it's apparently been designed. It's the only quite recent thing within hailing distance of "Peter Pan" and "The Blue Bird"—a real fairy tale of childhood. The introduction is such a gem that one could love it for that alone. One of the year's most charming gift books—beautifully illustrated. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.50 net.

A Kingdom of Two, by Helen R. Albee, tells of a happy, idealistic existence which any two people might lead in a quiet little country home where the world of outdoors was all theirs for enjoyment. The indoors world has charm, too, as the author makes clear. She has drawn some pleasant little pictures of ordinary life, sprinkled with humor and philosophy, that will appeal very generally to lovers of quiet homes and guardians of the hearth. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.50 net.

Threads of Gray and Gold, by Myrtle Reed. This collection of verses and sketches, including several chapters dealing with the romances of famous Americans, will be welcomed by the thousands of friends who lament the early passing of a charming and brilliant woman. The selections are rich in the humor and sentiment characteristic of the author. An excellent portrait is included. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $1.50 net.

Because You Are You, by Kate Whiting Patch, blends philosophy, humor and romance in the form of a journal kept by a wornout school teacher who goes off to a quiet little village to rest up her "nerves." She has many a pleasant chat with the quaint villagers, many a philosophic meditation and finally a pretty little love story of her own. An attractive gift book. [Dodd, Mead and Company, New York. $1.25.

If You Touch Them They Vanish, by Gouverneur Morris. "If I had the power," said the Poor Boy, "I'd settle this region with innocent people who have been accused of crimes." For he had suffered that way, and he knew how terrible it was. But he came out of it so happily that it was like a dream. A delightful gift offering, exquisitely illustrated. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $1 net.

Mothering on Perilous, by Lucy Furman, tells of a woman who feels that she's come to the end of things and in desperation takes charge of a school in the Kentucky mountains, hoping that it may help her back to faith and optimism. It does all that and even more. Delightfully written. [Macmillan Company, New York. $1.50 net.

The Broken Halo, by Florence L. Barclay. Mrs. Barclay has chosen again a theme upon which she's built two or three other successful stories—the spiritual reclamation of a fallen man by a woman's tender, trusting love. It is more dramatic than "The Rosary." [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $1.35 net.

Partners, by Margaret Deland, is not of Mrs. Deland's most significant output, though it tells very delightfully of a near-tragedy in a little village postoffice. It has been beautifully printed and decorated, making an ideal gift book. [Harper and Brothers, New York. $1.

Peanut, by Albert Bigelow Paine, a powerful little sermon on the folly of attempting to transplant a clear-souled mountain boy into an atmosphere of city murkiness. Exquisite! [Harper and Brothers, New York. 50 cents.

The Little Window, by Helen Merrill Hodson, pictures the routing of a hard-hearted spinster through the efforts of a "new-thought" lecturer. [Thomas Y. Crowell and Company, New York. 50 cents net.

Laddie's Choice, by Mary Thurston Dodge, has an unworldly old organist, some convincingly natural boys and two delightful lovers among its attractions. Very human and appealing—a good gift book. [Dodd, Mead and Company, New York. $1 net.

The Destroyer, by Burton E. Stevenson, is founded on the destruction a few years ago of the magnificent French battleship La Liberte as it lay in harbor at Toulon. A unique romance in which an American newspaper man is the principal figure. [Dodd, Mead and Company, New York. $1.30 net.

The Eagle's Talon, by Georges Ohnet. Napoleon, the Bourbon conspiracies, the republicans, the grim struggles of France in one of her most feverish eras—this is the setting. A famous woman spy serves as heroine. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $1.25 net.

The Ripple, by Miriam Alexander. An eighteenth-century romance whose author knows the period thoroughly. Deidre loves the dissolute Maurice de Saxe but marries another man who loves and understands her. [G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. $1.35 net.

The Desire of the Moth: A Romance of the Italian Lakes, by Maxwell Gray. A great love, a terrible misunderstanding and a hero big enough to remain unembittered make up Mr. Gray's new story. [D. Appleton and Company, New York. $1.35 net.

The Spare Room, by Mrs. Romilly Fedden, is a keenly entertaining comedy laid in an Italian villa, based upon the unexpected acceptance of several guests to occupy the single spare room. [Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. $1 net.

The Point of View, by Elinor Glyn. Given, a beautiful English girl, reared by an old clergyman and his wife whose point of view is extremely restricted, engaged to a conventional curate. Comes a rich young Russian nobleman—and Mrs. Glyn has the material for an argument in behalf of following love's leadings. [D. Appleton and Company, New York. $1.25.

Samantha on the Woman Question, by Marietta Holley (long known as Josiah Allen's Wife) retails that humorist's attitude toward the woman question and incidentally Josiah's in the same manner which have moved her many readers to laughter in the years gone by. [Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. $1.

Dave's Daughter, by Patience Bevier Cole, reads like a fairy tale of the things one would do if he had a million dollars. Christabel is known as "the billion-dollar girl," and oh! the magic she puts into the lives of needy people. A sweet and splendid story. [Frederick A. Stokes Company, New York. $1 net.

Behind the Beyond, by Stephen Leacock. Diverting sketches of experiences with the photographer, the dentist, the barber, with philanthropy, magazines and Paris, by a well-known humorist who has been referred to as "the Canadian Mark Twain." [John Lane Company, New York. $1 net.

The Terrible Twins, by Edgar Jepson, tells of two young people who terrorize the neighborhood, playing hair-raising pranks (of rather questionable humor) and devising numerous ways of being mischievous without disobeying their mother. [Bobbs-Merrill Company, Indianapolis. $1.25 net.

Another Man's Shoes, by Victor Bridges, is a fascinating tale of a masquerade. Two men swap identities, and the marvelous adventures that result remind one of the days when such tales were more common. London is the scene. [George H. Doran Company, New York. $1.25 net.

The Book of Evelyn, by Geraldine Bonner. Evelyn is a cultured and charming young widow who has to live in a second-rate New York apartment house. A small triumph in characterization involving several distinctly interesting artist characters. [Bobbs-Merrill Company, Indianapolis. $1.25 net.

The Twins of Suffering Creek, by Ridgwell Cullum, describes life in a western mining village and the anxious efforts of the miners in caring for the twins whose mother has deserted them and their father for a dashing easterner. [George W. Jacobs and Company, Philadelphia. $1.25 net.

The Dominie of Harlem, by Arnold Mulder, has an interesting locale and a strong motive. A modern minister enters a colony of conservative Michigan Dutch people and has a severe struggle in bringing them to accept his ideal of Christianity. [A. C. McClurg and Company, Chicago. $1.25 net.

Sis Within, by Harriet Hobson, author of "Jinks's Inside." Shall a man who has sinned be forgiven? This is the heroine's problem, and her love helps her to solve it. The regenerated hero reaches the height of manhood. [George W. Jacobs and Company, Philadelphia. $1.25 net.

The Argyle Case, by Arthur Hornblower, is founded on the play of that name by Harriett Ford and Harvey J. O'Higgins in collaboration with W. J. Burns—which means of course that it is a clever detective story. [Harper and Brothers, New York. $1.25 net.

The Business of Life, by Robert Chambers, is saturated with absurd sentimentality, though its attitude toward the marriage problem is sound. It deals with a girl who works and her marriage with a social lion. [D. Appleton and Company, New York. $1.40 net.

Youth Will Be Served, by Dolf Wyllarde, has for its problem a discussion of the extent to which a mother owes her life to her children. It is ingeniously conceived; it is not erotic; and it will make one think. [John Lane Company, New York. $1.30 net.

Captain Protheroe's Fortune: A Story of the Sea, as told to the author by George Henry Grummet, mate of the schooner Effie Dean, by Oswald Kendall. Of the "Treasure Island" variety, though not of its quality. [A. C. McClurg and Company, Chicago. $1 net.

The Open Hearth

An Offer to Tithers

Have you ever known anyone who was less happy, less generous or less financially prosperous from being a tither?

A "yes" or "no" answer to the above question and statement that you are a regular reader of The Continent and interested in tithing will bring you by early mail an eighty page book on tithing comprising the following pamphlets: "What We Owe and Why We Owe It," "What We Owe and Objections to Paying It," "What We Owe and Results of Teaching It," "The Pew to the Pulpit" and "Tithing Reminiscences." The latter has been brought down to date. This offer will stand for only four weeks from its appearance in this issue. The above offer has been sent, requesting publication, to all the Presbyterian papers in this country listed in the newspaper directory.

As a test I desire to make three additional offers to the readers of The Continent. Heretofore I have been publishing only pamphlets on tithing for general circulation. While this will be continued as in the past I have for greater convenience condensed the entire series of now eleven pamphlets into two booklets of about eighty pages each and two pamphlets of sixteen pages each.

1. For the regular price per hundred I will send to churches or individuals a sufficient number of sets comprising the two booklets and two pamphlets to furnish a set of each to every family in the church. If the conditions regarding their circulation are complied with, I will refund all the money paid for them if the contributions to home church support, the boards of the church and other church benevolences for 1914 are not greater than those of 1913 by at least five times the cost of the tithing literature.

2. Before the close of 1914 the pastor will, as far as he conveniently can, have a private conversation with each tither regarding his or her experience. If the pastor reports to me that any of them say that in their own opinion they are less personally happy, less generous or less financially prosperous from being tithers, I will return one-half the money paid.

3. If at the close of 1914 there is not a gain in the congregation of at least two new subscribers for The Continent over the previous year, I will refund $2 of the money originally paid.

The reason for this last offer is that all the facts I can collect go to show that tithers are much more interested in church work than nontithers. I want to learn if their increased interest leads them to take a religious paper and thus become familiar with the Master's work outside their home field. These offers will remain open until April 1, 1914.

The conditions referred to above are not onerous. The most important is that the pastor shall be a tither.

If you cannot avail yourself of these offers and yet desire the booklet, please answer the question at the head of this article and I will send it promptly. If your pastor is a tither and you are interested to the extent of a desire to investigate with a view to accepting the offer if the conditions are satisfactory, let me send a sample set of the literature with a printed contract and the conditions.

Temperance Rules at Lafayette

Temperance restrictions for Lafayette College students are rigid. The faculty has the same attitude toward students that corporations have toward workmen, realizing that the use of intoxicants impairs the efficiency of the drinker, develops habits that will injure character and exerts an evil influence upon his fellow students. The college laws forbid the bringing of liquor upon the campus and exclude liquor from fraternity houses. The faculty encourages the erection of fraternity houses upon the campus, as an additional protection for the undergraduates.

Faculty class officers acting under the dean give helpful suggestions to the student body. They meet every Monday morning and talk to the students about study, hazing and conduct generally. The senior class, being the smallest number and having the bad element mostly weeded out, have only one faculty officer. Freshmen, being raw and undisciplined generally, have four faculty officers. These members of the faculty request the hotel men not to sell to students. Some Easton hotelkeepers refuse to sell drinks to any freshmen, who are easily recognized by their green caps, lest they should occasionally sell to a minor.

While students, many of whom are of age and some of whom are accustomed to drink at home, are not absolutely prohibited from purchasing liquor at the city hotels, all such conduct is discouraged and one noticed frequenting a barroom is admonished by the class dean who acts "in loco parentis." If such counsel has no effect the student's action is regarded as a misdemeanor and he is promptly suspended. Return is doubtful. If a student comes back it is upon a promise not to repeat his misconduct.

Naturally the campus environment is wholesome and helpful. No longer does the janitor report the finding of beer bottles. Of the 550 students less than 10 per cent are drinkers to any extent whatever. Only one or two cases of discipline due to drink occur annually. In one or two years there have been none.

ALFORD KELLEY.

A Notable Contrast

In Philadelphia on the last Lord's day of September, with "a cloud of witnesses," I saw a Roman Catholic Holy Name Society's parade escorted by eight bands of music.

The third week of October it was my great privilege to be present at the convention of the Pennsylvania State Bible School Association in the city of Williamsport. On Thursday evening of that memorable occasion I was a delighted eyewitness to a five-mile procession of men—Bible class members and Bible school workers.

A significantly instructive fact is to be deduced from a notable contrast between these two parades. There were in the Roman Catholic procession more than 40,000 men. Not one of the thousands did I see with a copy of the Bible or anything pertaining to "the word of God." In the procession of the Bible school convention every one of the great host of men had a copy of the Bible for either teaching or learning. The banners and mottoes displayed were all of Biblical significance.

When the Church Moves Out

I wish to commend the leading editorial of Oct. 9, "If the Church Struck." It occurred to me that history tells what would occur if the church "struck" or moved out. Take Israel in Egypt. Joseph, prime minister to Pharaoh, found a refuge for those who were heirs of the Abrahamic covenant and represented the kingdom of God in the world. After 430 years Egypt, then in her glory, expelled them. In that motley mass of Israelites who went out there were four men who especially represented the kingdom of God on earth, namely, Moses, Aaron, Joshua and Caleb. We may say the church or what typically stood for the church moved out or struck. But what of Egypt? Today and for ages past a land of ruins and the football of other nations.

Passing over the centuries of Hebrew history after this colony from Egypt had made Canaan a veritable land of promise and Jerusalem, the capital, the envy of other nations, then what? The fullness of time had come and the real King of Israel was born in Bethlehem. He was despised and rejected. They crucified him. Now what is the record of history from that day to this? "The nation that will not serve God shall perish." Not in a day, but lack of salt is followed by decay. Our God is long-suffering and patient. The Hebrews are scattered over all the world without a country or a capital.

A Problem in Moral Mathematics

It takes a ready mind to solve a problem in mental mathematics, but it requires a quick conscience to solve one in moral mathematics.

Problem:

How can 686 widows of deceased Presbyterian ministers, whose names are upon the Roll of Ministerial Relief and Sustentation, buy the bare necessities of life for themselves and sometimes for dependent children upon

$3.37 a Week?

Trial Answer No. 1

Let their grown children help them; let their husbands provide for them, while the former are still living; let them be very frugal and careful.

Trial Answer No. 2

Though their grown children ao help them, and though some of them have small incomes besides the $3.37 per week ($175 per year) which they receive from the Board of Relief and Sustentation, many of them must live upon what the Board is able to give. Therefore, let them make ends meet the best they can.

The Correct Answer

God only knows the measure of their sacrifice and patience in making such pitiful ends meet. The church ought to know. When the church does know she will solve their problem by giving them adequate relief and sustentation.

THE FIELD OF CHRISTIAN EFFORT

PLAN FOR BIG RALLY AND BANQUET

Dedication of Occidental College Buildings Will Bring Together Many Presbyterians—Consider Question of Prohibition Amendment.

LOS ANGELES—Presbytery has appointed a committee to prepare for a great Presbyterian rally in December in honor of the moderator of General Assembly, Dr. John Timothy Stone, and Dr. John Finley, commissioner of education for the state of New York. The occasion of the visit of these men to the coast is the dedication of the new buildings of Occidental College. The tentative plan of the rally contemplates a banquet at which at least a thousand covers will be laid, to which all Presbyterians of Southern California will be invited as guests of presbytery.

Will Give Free Instruction—The Los Angeles Bible Institute is making preparations for a greatly enlarged work in giving free instruction in the English Bible to young men and women in training them for Christian work. A building which will accommodate nearly 700 students, besides the necessary classrooms, is being erected at a cost of about $1,000,000. Charles M. Stimson recently deeded income property valued at $100,000 to the insitute, the proceeds of which are to be used for the maintenance of the work. Dr. R. A. Torrey is dean and Rev. T. C. Horton superintendent.

Consider Prohibition Campaign—A call has been issued for a convention of Prohibitionists to meet in Blanchard Hall Nov. 19 and 20 for the purpose of considering the advisability of beginning a campaign for statewide prohibition by constitutional amendment. Delegates from all organizations opposed to the liquor traffic, including local Anti-Saloon leagues, will be seated in the convention.

SMALL CHURCH REBUILT CHEAPLY

Northville, Mich., church, Rev. J. E. Webber pastor, has just completed the reconstruction of its edifice and affords a splendid illustration of what may be done in the way of rebuilding an old church without entirely destroying its style or beauty. The church was a solid brick structure of old style, built over fifty years ago. Twenty-six feet of wall was taken from the center of the side walls and set out six feet on either side, thus making possible a circular style of seating. A deep colonial porch and tower were also added. An addition was built at the rear providing commodious quarters for kitchen, dining room and classrooms, also making possible the erection of a gymnasium at some future date on the second floor.

Looks Like a New Church

The expense was $8,000, which not only includes the changes, but also eleven memorial windows, solid oak woodwork, new pulpit furniture, new pews, velvet carpet and decorations.

The church is the equal in beauty, convenience and durability of a new church costing twice as much.

When finally completed it will be free from all incumbrance, the pledges made previously being more than enough to pay the cost. The extra financial burden has not lessened the contribution to the missionary or other benevolences and twenty-seven have been added to the church during the year. A pipe organ is a probability in the near future.

ADOPT PRESBYTERIAN PLAN

The National Council of the Congregational Church, which met in Kansas City, Mo., has adopted the sustentation plan of providing for its aged and disabled ministers, their widows and orphans. The previous Council appointed a committee composed of some of the leading ministers and business men of the denomination to consider this plan, which was adopted by the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in 1906 and put into operation, under a charter granted by Pennsylvania, in 1909. After a careful consideration of the provisions of this plan the committee unanimously recommended its adoption by the Council. Dr. J. R. Sutherland, the originator of the sustentation plan, was invited by the committee when it had the matter under consideration to a conference in New York City, as was also George A. Higgins, actuary of the Presbyterian Sustentation Fund.

The Evangelical Association, one of the leading German denominations of this country, has adopted and put into effect the sustentation plan, as has also the Free United Church of Scotland, and the English Baptist Church has appointed a committee to consider the matter of its adoption and has written to Dr. Sutherland for full information regarding it. Other Protestant denominations in this country have the matter under consideration.

SPECIAL MEETINGS IN SEVEN CHURCHES

Kansas City Preachers Conduct Own Services—Moderator Stone at Denominational Gathering—Student Volunteers Will Meet in Six Weeks.

KANSAS CITY—Presbytery is now in the midst of a well-organized evangelistic campaign. The standing committee on evangelistic work is working out the plan. There are now in progress seven special meetings, all of which are being conducted by pastors. The presbytery is not adverse to the so-called professional evangelist, but this campaign will be carried through very largely by the exchange of pastors.

Dr. Stone Guest of Honor—The semiannual banquet of the Presbyterian League was held in the Coats House Nov. 11. A strong effort was made to make it the great Presbyterian event of the year. Dr. John Timothy Stone, moderator, was the guest of honor. The Park College glee club sang. Dr. Stone was scheduled to address the students of Park College the same day.

Care for Parish by Districts—At a recent communion of Grace church four-fifths of the membership partook. This parish is divided into eight districts, each with a captain and four lieutenants. All the care of members and all the aggressive work of the church in every department is to be done through these districts. Regular meetings are held of all district officers for reports and discussions. It is resulting in effective training of a large number of the laymen.

Students Will Bring Stimulus—The annual meeting of the Student Volunteers will be held in this city Dec. 31 to Jan. 5. There is much interest and enthusiasm over the coming of this great meeting. It is expected that there will be between 4,000 and 5,000 delegates. The meeting will be held in the convention hall, which seats 17,000 persons. Ministers and churches are expecting a great uplift and quickening as a result of this meeting.

Has 100 at Prayer Meeting—Parkville church under the leadership of Dr. John C. Miller has an average of more than 100 in regular attendance at the prayer meetings. Charles C. McGinley.

EVANGELISTS WIN MANY

Iowa—Rev. U. L. Leinbach of West Bend recently assisted the pastor, Rev. B. F. McMican, in a two weeks' meeting at Paton which was very successful.—Dana church recently enjoyed a two weeks' meeting with Rev. J. W. Huber of Gilmore City.

Pennsylvania—During four weeks of the campaign of Dr. W. E. Biederwolf at Chambersburg over 1,000 conversions were made. One evening 300 persons came to the meeting from Waynesboro. Closing of the local stores by merchants so that employees could attend special services was one of the features of the campaign.

Illinois—Rev. C. W. Estes, pastor at Neoga, during recent special services sent a circular letter to the men outside the church during the campaign. It urged their attention to religion. Mr. Estes recently assisted Rev. A. W. Denny with meetings at Lerna.—Evangelist Toy recently began a series of evangelistic meetings at Elgin in the Presbyterian church.

Michigan—Evangelistic meetings to continue the rest of the month started Nov. 9 in First church, Battle Creek. The pastor, Rev. George E. Barnes, preached during the first week.—Evangelists Hart and Magann conducted a union tabernacle campaign with the churches of Caro, in which there were 750 conversions and an awakening throughout the entire county. Card playing was one of the greatest pastimes and hindrances to the churches in that city, yet the influence of the meetings was such as to make it unpopular in the future. On the closing night of the meetings there were over 100 conversions.

Dr. S. Hall Young is back at Home Mission headquarters in New York City from his hunting trip in the Arctic seas. Dr. Young celebrated his sixty-sixth birthday by shooting a magnificent caribou. He also got a walrus on the trip, but no polar bear.

WHY
The American Standard Bible
(Edited by the American Revision Committee)
IS BEST FOR HOME AND STUDY

All scholars are agreed that this is the most accurate translation of the Scriptures, as it embodies the results of Biblical research in the last 300 years, during which time a greater number of authentic manuscripts have been brought to light than in the thousand of years preceding.

Those who cling to the old version voluntarily deprive themselves of all that Christian Scholarship has gained in exact knowledge of the Bible during the last 300 years.

Then, too, the exact thought of the sacred writers is given in readily understandable language in this version—hence its readings are much more interesting and instructive to the entire family.

The American Standard Bible is made in several editions especially suitable for home and study use, combining large type and compact size. Over 200 styles to meet every requirement. Prices, 35 cents to $50.00.

Just let us send you sample pages and price list, that you, yourself, may see what a wonderful Book it really is.

On the Temperance Battle Line

ILLINOIS WOMEN HELP DOWN TRAFFIC

Recent Elections Decided in Some Places by the New Voters—Twelve New Towns Banish Liquor —Big Fight Next Spring.

In town elections held Nov. 4 women in parts of Illinois for the first time had a real opportunity to exercise the right of suffrage granted by the last legislature. Through their vote and influence it is claimed that a number of towns which voted "dry" would otherwise have permitted liquor to be sold in their boundaries. One town, which went "dry" by eleven votes, will be used as a basis for a suit to test the constitutionality of the legislative act. According to the returns twelve towns which now have saloons were captured by the temperance forces. In ten other places which were already "dry" the saloon forces were denied entrance. In only five towns, previously "wet," in which the temperance question was again before the people, did the saloon element win. A large proportion of Illinois is now in the "dry" column.

Most of the towns in which the temperance battle was fought at the polls were comparatively small. Next April it is expected the saloon question will dominate all other issues in 300 places, including such cities as Decatur, Mattoon, Bloomington, Rock Island, Galesburg, Sterling, Elgin, Freeport, Waukegan, Pontiac and Kankakee. The Anti-Saloon League is laying plans to enlist women in the campaigns of these cities.

The influence of the women was felt fully in a number of towns, as is shown by a comparison of the vote this year and on the occasion of the last similar vote. In Jacksonville, the largest place voting this fall, the women voted 2,981 dry and 654 wet. Corresponding votes in other large cities next spring will carry even Springfield for temperance, as it went "wet" by only 1,000 votes when the question was up before. In some towns there were no "wet" votes among the women and in towns with many foreign women, the majority was for the "dry" side.

YEAR'S CAMPAIGN DRIVES OUT SALOONS

Monthly Letter to Voters by Pastor—Liquor Interests Attack Temperance Worker—Women Help by Petition.

There were some unique and suggestive features in the no-license campaign by which Wheatland township, adjacent to Rochester, N. Y., was carried into the "dry" column Nov. 4. Wheatland has a population of 2,500, contains the two larger villages of Scottsville and Mumford, smaller hamlets, mines, mills, factories and a considerable rural population. The town has been "wet" for eight years.

Almost a year ago R. T. Miller, Jr., president of a school of correspondence, Chicago, and publisher of The Technical World Magazine, whose boyhood home was in Wheatland, laid before Dr. Robert C. Hallock, pastor of Scottsville church, the proposition that he would finance a year-long campaign if Dr. Hallock would do the work. The proposition was accepted; and Dr. Hallock mailed every month to every voter a carefully prepared letter—not just general temperance material, but dealing definitely with local issues. At first there was much public impatience at "stirring things up so soon," and Dr. Hallock was advised again and again by friends and foes to "drop it" or to "wait until near election." But the campaign of letters went steadily on, showing the condition of the town, informing the rural residents upon the lawlessness in villages and keeping the whole "no-license" issue before the minds of the people.

WORKS ALL DAY
And Studies at Night on Grape-Nuts Food

Some of the world's great men have worked during the day and studied evenings to fit themselves for greater things. But it requires a good constitution generally to do this.

A Georgia man was able to keep it up with ease after he had learned the sustaining power of Grape-Nuts, although he had failed in health before he changed his food supply. He says:

"Three years ago I had a severe attack of stomach trouble which left me unable to eat anything but bread and water.

"The nervous strain at my office from 6 a. m. to 6 p. m. and improper foods caused my health to fail rapidly. Cereals and so-called 'Foods' were tried without benefit until I saw Grape-Nuts mentioned in the paper.

"In hopeless desperation I tried this food and at once gained strength, flesh and appetite. I am now able to work all day at the office and study at night without the nervous exhaustion that was usual before I tried Grape-Nuts.

"It leaves me strengthened, refreshed, satisfied; nerves quieted and toned up, body and brain waste restored. I would have been a living skeleton, or more likely a dead one by this time if it had not been for Grape-Nuts."

Name given by Postum Company, Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in packages. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true and full of human interest.

Slowly sentiment veered; the saloon men helped the reaction by ever increasing lawlessness, and their lawyer intensified the feeling by attacking Dr. Hallock in the public press. The registering by the saloon men of forty members of a state road construction gang, as a desperate effort to control the election, aroused indignation as soon as a letter to voters set the facts before the town.

Then, as election day drew near, Dr. Hallock enlisted hundreds of women in the town to sign a petition to voters, which was printed and mailed to each voter to reach him the day before election. Judge H. F. Remington of Rochester was engaged as legal counselor; he and Dr. Hallock obtained appointment as authorized watchers at the polls; the women served a lunch; automobiles were hired, large banners and posters were put up, no stone was left unturned. Feeling was intense; practically every available vote on both sides was got to the polls.

Result: The town went against saloons by a majority of seventy-five and all other licenses were refused by safe though varying majorities.

Conduct Women's Temperance Fight

Mrs. Lillian M. N. Stevens of Portland, Me., was reelected president of the national W. C. T. U. at the recent Asbury Park, N. J., convention. Miss Anna A. Gordon of Evanston, Ill., was appointed vice president at large. Other officers are: Mrs. Frances B. Parks, Evanston, Ill., corresponding secretary; Mrs. Elizabeth P. Anderson, Jamestown, N. D., recording secretary; Mrs. Elizabeth P. Hutchinson, Evanston, Ill., treasurer.

TWO NEW CHURCHES NEAR COMPLETION

Detroit Presbyterianism Advancing—Rich M. E. Church Robbed of $300—Ministers Plan Means of Social Intercourse for Officers.

DETROIT—Two new Presbyterian church buildings are nearing completion in Detroit—Olivet church, the successor of Fort Wayne church and Woodmere mission on West Fort street, and Gratiot Avenue church, the most recently organized church in Detroit. Neither of these churches is able to erect its own building. Olivet is being largely financed by the church extension committee and Gratiot Avenue by First church. The roof is going on both churches this week and it is hoped that at least the basements will soon be occupied.

Crack Church Safe—Central M. E. church on Woodward avenue and Grand Circus Park, the most prominent corner in the city, was robbed on a recent Saturday night and its safe dynamited with a cash loss of about $300. This is the wealthiest M. E. church in Detroit and has been robbed several times before.

Expect Dr. Boyle to Accept—Woodward Avenue church, which grew under the pastorate of Rev. Sherman L. Divine, recently resigned, from a membership of 300 five years ago to 1,600, has good assurances of a favorable reply to its call to W. H. Wray Doyle, D. D., of Lake Forest, Ill. This church occupies a strategic situation and is manned with a corps of paid workers.

Plan New Social Organization—Since the decadence and practical suspended animation of the old Presbyterian Alliance, through the emergence of the church extension committee, there has seemed no medium of social intercourse between the officers of the churches. A committee of ministers has been appointed to plan for a new organization that will remedy this defect. J. F. Fitschen, J. M. Barkley, J. Brittan Clark and Hugh Jack are the committee.

Protest Against Russian Acts—A mass meeting of over 6,000 citizens was held in the Light Guard armory Nov. 2 to protest against the conduct of the Russian government in the Mendel Beiliss case. Resolutions were passed and sent to Secretary Bryan, asking for American intervention. Roman Catholics, Jews and Protestants were speakers at the meeting.

A LOOK AHEAD

WITH THE CONTINENT FAMILY

He believes that service to man is divine service

Wilfred T. Grenfell will act as best man at the coming marriage of a daughter of the president of the United States. This man is known as a friend and helper by thousands of fisher folks on the bleak shores of Labrador.

In early issues of The Continent this famous missionary gives his idea of Christian service. No better definition of the much discussed "social service" has been given than that expressed by this voice from the far frozen north.

"I had thought service, as far as God was concerned, meant unattractive conventional gatherings which I loathed, and went to sleep in if I could," he says. It was D. L. Moody who called him to Christian service. "Moody taught the one and only thing that could have interested me and that was that God Almighty really wanted such work as I could do to help Him out."

The service of Grenfell to God has enriched the lives of the sturdy men who make a precarious living gathering fish "on the Labrador," and who exist through the winter in desolate communities shut off from the rest of the world.

Dr. Grenfell's articles in The Continent in the past have been among its strongest features. The coming articles from him will appear nowhere else.

The Continent costs only five cents a week and brings to your table each week a fresh revelation of the acts of modern apostles in all parts of the earth.

PRACTICAL SPIRIT OF BROTHERHOOD

Buffalo Churches Open to Unitarian Convention—Begin New Series of Evening Meetings for Inquirers.

BUFFALO—The spirit of tolerance characterizes Buffalo Presbyterianism. The recent National Unitarian Convention held two of its sessions in Presbyterian churches, and was welcomed by two Presbyterian pastors. The Christian Science people have just opened a beautiful church edifice; it is nearest neighbor to a leading Presbyterian church, the pastor of which last week in a happy vein introduced the lecturer on Christian Science. No one was left in doubt as to his convictions, and as he afterward said, "I find it better to meet our neighbor with an open hand than with a closed fist." Another pastor has just returned from conducting a week's mission in which the Universalist, Episcopal and Presbyterian churches of the village united.

Start Open Forum—Quite in keeping with all this tolerance is a series of open forum Sunday evening meetings now being held in Calvary church. "The purpose of these meetings," said the pastor, "is to promote democracy in religion by social intercourse and by frank discussion of issues to which religion is vitally related." Rev. Paul Moore Strayer of Rochester was the first speaker. His topic was "How to Christianize a Hopelessly Competitive World." After the sermon anyone present was invited to ask questions. Persons of many divergent beliefs immediately responded. There were no bitter words, just a fair statement of honest convictions. The audience was large.

Preaches in Theater—Dr. Holmes the same evening began a series of eight Sunday evening services. This is the eighth year of these Sunday evening theater meetings for the people under the direction of Westminster Club. The general topic announced for this year is "What Is Christianity?" The particular subject the first Sunday was "Mistaken Notions: A Word with the Man on the Street." The singing was led by a male chorus made up from the men of Westminster Club. As in former years, the theater was filled.

PIONEER BIBLE SOCIETY CELEBRATES

Old Organization of Cincinnati Remembers Birth—Girls Plan Aid to Churches—Men of Norwood at Work.

CINCINNATI—As a preliminary to the centennial anniversary next year, the Young Men's Bible Society of Cincinnati—forerunner of the American Bible Society—celebrated its ninety-ninth birthday anniversary by a party at the new rooms, 422 Elm street. This was one of the notable events of election day. Flags of all nations into which the Bible has been carried were prominent in the decorations. There were some distinguished guests of honor—Dr. William I. Haven of New York, Dr. S. H. Kirkbride of Chicago, Rev. A. F. Ragatz of Denver, Rev. J. P. Wragg of South Atlanta, Ga., and Rev. George S. J. Browne of Cincinnati. The late Chief Justice Salmon P. Chase was one of the early presidents of the Cincinnati society. E. P. Bradstreet is now the presiding officer.

Girls Help Churches—At the Church of the Covenant a carol choir composed of girls from 12 to 16 years of age has been organized to enrich the Sunday school music and assist occasionally in other services.—The Sunshine Girls of Norwood, seeing the necessity of increased classrooms for the Sunday school, are to give a colonial concert and thus create a nest egg for the cause of equipping a room for the younger men.

Ministerial Changes—The usual coming and going of clerical timber is reported. Rev. Herbert M. Moore leaves his Covington charge to accept a call to the student church of Cornell at Ithaca, N. Y. Rev. Charles F. Lownie has come from Delmar, Iowa, to take charge of Mason and Bethany churches and Rev. Charles W. Blake of Wichita, Kan., is in pastoral charge at Madisonville.

Men Plan Reception—Norwood Chapter of the Presbyterian Brotherhood believes in action. Plans have already been outlined for a New Year's reception to the congregation. The men will do all the serving of refreshments.

MINISTERS JOIN TO HELP SETTLE STRIKE

Indianapolis Pastors Cooperate with Other Bodies—China Campaign Team Moves to Other Cities of the Hoosier State.

INDIANAPOLIS—The practical benefit of the local church federation, of which Rev. Morton Pearson is secretary, was revealed in two resolutions of the union ministers' association last week. The first referred to a simultaneous evangelistic campaign to be undertaken by the individual churches of all English Protestant denominations after the new year, publicity for which will be given through the daily press in the manner suggested by The Continent some time ago. The other action was the appointment of a committee to cooperate with other civic bodies in a peaceable settlement of the street car strike.

Prepare for Celebration—The seventy-fifth anniversary of the organization of Second church is being anticipated by Dr. O. D. Odell in a series of addresses upon the life of Henry Ward Beecher. The dates of the celebration are Nov. 19 and 20, at which time a tablet containing the names of the charter members will be unveiled. Several former pastors have accepted invitations to be present, including Hanford A. Edson, D. D., Scottsville, N. Y.; J. A. Milburn, D. D., Pilgrim Congregational church, Chicago, and James McLeod, D. D., Cape May, N. J.

China Campaigners Leave City—The China emergency campaign under the leadership of J. C. Gerritt, D. D., of Nanking, China, assisted by six other speakers, ended Oct. 27 with a farewell luncheon given by the local brotherhood. Other special features were the "Travel Talks" with stereopticon by Dr. C. E. Bradt and Rev. Charles E. Killey. Other cities of the state are soon to be visited.

Elections Show Advances—The city elections in many cities of the state revealed a tendency to divorce national and municipal politics. Many "citizens' tickets" (independent) were in the field and a number of victories won. This city was not so fortunate owing to ambitious partisans and a solid machine "well oiled" with brewery money. Dr. C. E. Woods, the local candidate of the independents, made a remarkably strong fight.

Confer on Business Management—Announcements of the meeting of presbytery next week include a conference on "Business Methods in Church Management" looking to spring plans for the every-member canvass.

SAY THAT PRESBYTERIANS ARE LEADERS

Evangelistic Work Attracts Attention of Other Denominations—Unveil Tablet in Memory of Dr. McCook of Tabernacle Church.

PHILADELPHIA—Dr. Robert E. L. Jarvis of Bethany church, who has recovered from his illness, presided as moderator of Philadelphia Presbytery at its November meeting. Rev. Albert S. McGarrah conducted a conference in the matter of the every-member canvass. In accordance with the call of General Assembly recently published in The Continent the presbytery resolved to devote an hour of its session in December to prayer for the blessing of God upon the work of the church. In the report for the year of presbytery's evangelistic work the secretary, Dr. W. P. Fulton, said that other denominations gave Presbyterians credit for leading in evangelistic campaigns. A committee was appointed to attend on Thanksgiving Day the dedication of Second Italian church in West Philadelphia; also a committee to attend the dedication of Emmanuel church.

Remember Dr. McCook—A beautiful tablet to the memory of Dr. Henry C. McCook, placed by a committee on the wall of Tabernacle church, was unveiled in the presence of a large congregation on Sunday morning, Nov. 2. The service was in charge of Dr. Charles Wadsworth and addresses were made by Doctors Wadsworth, Benson and Brownson. The inscription is on a bronze plate and three seals, designed by Dr. McCook, are in bronze and placed above the inscription. The center seal is that of General Assembly and overlies the two seals of the church, one of the session and one of the trustees.

Pastor Dies in Hospital—Rev. William K. Preston, for sixteen years pastor of Neshaminy church, Philadelphia North Presbytery, died in German hospital Nov. 3, following an operation. He was at the time of his death pastor at Elysburg, Pa. Funeral services were held in Neshaminy church of Warwick.

Dr. Charles Erdman Popular—Professor Charles R. Erdman of Princeton, who has been the popular afternoon speaker to railroad men at the Pennsylvania railroad department Y. M. C. A. in West Philadelphia for the past twenty years, received a most cheerful greeting at the opening of the present season, Nov. 2.

Brief Items—Rev. Ted Hetzel Copp, pastor of Cohocksink church, continues to hold çlinics certain afternoons of the week for nervous patients and counsels with those having difficulties and troubles.—A unique demonstration of the interests of the daily vacation Bible schools, of which seventy-five representing fourteen denominations were held the past summer, was given recently in Witherspoon Hall. Bishop Thomas J. Garland presided. —Woodland church, Rev. J. R. Swain pastor, has adopted the budget system for benevolences. The question of free pews is under advisement.

Son of Pastor at Celebration—Lawndale church, Dr. J. H. Boggs pastor, received pleasant greetings from many friends on the recent celebration of a twenty-fifth anniversary. The son of the pastor, Rev. H. Alfred Boggs of Princeton church, presided and addresses were made by Dr. Alexander Henry, Rev. H. W. Bloch, Rev. W. H. Wells and W. W. Biggin.

Two Churches Lose Elders—Princeton Church, Rev. H. Alfred Boggs pastor, mourns the loss by death of its senior elder and clerk of session, Thomas J. Tash. H. H. Walker, an influential elder of Calvary church of Wyncote, Dr. W. B. Lower pastor, has also been removed by death.

STRONG TEAM OPENS MISSION CAMPAIGN

Women of Pittsburg in Mass Meeting Hear Speakers—Grand Jury and Ministers Unite in War on Vice.

PITTSBURG—The united missionary campaign was launched in Pittsburg Nov. 8 with a mass meeting of the women's missionary societies in Second church. Sunday there was an interdenominational exchange of pulpits in many sections, and in the afternoon seven district meetings addressed by members of the special committee consisting of J. Campbell White, J. E. Norcross, D. D., A. L. Wiley, D. D., A. F. Agar, D. D., and George Innes. On Monday the union ministerial meeting was held in Second church and addressed by Mr. White. Missionary conferences and district meetings were held Monday afternoon and evening. The campaign closed with a banquet at McCreery's Tuesday evening.

Seminary Committees Still at Work—The fund for the new administration building of Western Seminary amounts to $132,000. The five committees are still at work and every effort will be made to secure $200,000 from Pittsburg before going to the outlying districts.

Fighting Saloons and Gambling—Pittsburg is waging a campaign through its different agencies and the grand jury for better regulation of the liquor traffic and a suppression of gambling in the downtown sections. The grand jury brought in a number of indictments last week and many suggestions concerning the enforcement of the law. A committee of fifteen men, representing the Union Ministerial Association, with Rev. George Shelton as chairman, are preparing a petition to the license court urging shorter hours for saloons and suggesting that the hours be made 8 a. m. to 9 p. m.

New Y. M. C. A. Building — Greensburg dedicated a new $135,000 Y. M. C. A. building Nov. 2. The residue of the David S. Atkinson estate amounting to $200,000 was given for Y. M. C. A. work, leaving $65,000 for endowment.

Campaign Plans Progress—Headquarters for the "Billy Sunday" evangelistic campaign have been established in the Central Y. M. C. A. building. Every effort is being made to get single street car fare from all parts of the city and the B. and O. railroad will establish a temporary station near Oakland. Reports from churches indicate a large guaranty fund.

P. W. Snyder.

WILL FINISH WORK ON 70TH BIRTHDAY

Dr. Burkhalter to Retire After Long Pastorate—New Buildings Mark Growth in Various Parts of Iowa.

IOWA—His seventieth birthday will mark the close of the pastorate of Dr. E. R. Burkhalter at First church, Cedar Rapids, Iowa. Dr. Burkhalter is one of the oldest pastors in Iowa, having served the Cedar Rapids church for forty years. He will become pastor emeritus for life Dec. 21, 1914. First church has large obligations in the downtown district by reason of the withdrawal of other congregations and the pastor will retire in favor of a younger man.

Many New Buildings in State—A Sunday school building which will be one of the best in Iowa will soon be started by Muscatine First church. It will cost $30,000 and it is expected that the full amount will be raised before the contract is let.—Park Avenue church, to cost nearly $7,000, has been started for Presbyterians of the south side, Des Moines. It will seat 240 persons and will be completed by Christmas. Rev. J. B. Howard is pastor.—E. M. Bell, D. D., was installed as pastor of Lake City church Oct. 28. Rev. R. C. Mitchell of Estherville, Rev. F. H. Gamel, former pastor, and Rev. D. J. McCord took part. Plans are on foot to enlarge the church building.—The new $20,000 church at Rockwell City, which was begun last spring, will be completed in a few weeks. The date for the dedication will probably be Nov. 30 or Dec. 7.

Will Have Presbyterial Evangelist—Rev. F. M. Dowlin of West Liberty has been invited to be evangelist for Iowa City Presbytery. The appointment of this new worker is possible through the recent permission of synod to devote 80 per cent of home mission gifts to presbyterial work.

Dr. Bess Begins Work—The induction of Dr. E. A. Bess as university pastor at Iowa City, Iowa, occurred Nov. 9. The sermon was by President John A. Marquis of Coe College. Dr. D. W. Fahs of Cedar Falls, Dr. R. C. Hughes of Madison, Wis., Dr. D. W. Wylie of Iowa City and President J. G. Bowman of the state university had parts in the program.

Confer on United Missions—A united missionary conference was held in Mason City Oct. 26-27 under the auspices of the Laymen's Missionary Movement. The team was: Dr. J. W. Aitchison, Chicago, leader; C. W. Williams, Galesburg, Ill.; Rev. Frank Garrett, Nanking, China; Rev. John H. Booth, Kansas City, and Rev. Wilbur H. Clapp, Waterloo. Mass meetings were held Sunday afternoon and evening. The conferences on Monday were followed by a supper, attended by 300 men.

Plan Care for Immigrants

It is expected that arrangements will soon be completed for the operation of the immigrant station in Chicago which was authorized by congress. Hitherto the government has done little for the newcomers to this country except to see that none entered who did not comply with the law and that they brought no disease. The government now is to establish headquarters in Chicago and employ fifteen to eighteen assistants to care for the immigrant on his way to his destination and assist him on his further journey.

Dr. J. Milton Greene, missionary superintendent of Cuba, has been visiting his son, Rev. Clinton J. Greene of Westminster church, Peoria, Ill.

STUDY WORK AND FIELD OF MISSIONS

Church Extension Board Puts Acid Test to Congregations—Endeavorers Plan for 1915 Convention—Y. M. C. A. Helps Immigrants.

CHICAGO—The policy of the Church Extension Board in regard to missions and churches under its control involves the serious examination of all of the work of local centers to see if they are doing the kind of work necessary for the community. Study of local surroundings will be made to determine how the type of effort is adapted to the need and whether the building now used is the sort required. In many of the communities now reached by Presbyterians the type of people is changing and modifications must be made of the work now in progress. The movement of people to the suburbs will also be studied by the board this year to ascertain where additional churches are needed.

Plan for 1915 Convention—H. H. Marcusson, a former president of the Illinois C. E. Union and of the Chicago union, will be chairman of the committee in charge of the international C. E. convention in this city in 1915. The vice chairman is C. E. McBurney; secretary, Oliver R. Williamson; treasurer and chairman finance committee, Walter R. Mee; publicity and promotion committee, E. P. Gates and A. G. Fegert.

Fights Saloons in East—Dr. James K. Shields, for some years Anti-Saloon League superintendent in Illinois, has now entered upon similar work in New Jersey. For the last year he had been doing special work with the Methodist home mission society in Chicago.

Aids Survivors of Wreck—Nineteen survivors of the burned ship Volturno arrived in Chicago a recent Sunday morning and were met by the immigration secretary of the Y. M. C. A. and assisted with food and money to their destinations in the Northwest. During the past month there have been 9,972 immigrants met by the association at the local railway stations. Of this number about 7,000 remained in Chicago and vicinity. Each month a large number of cards are brought by incoming immigrants from association secretaries at immigration centers in this country or abroad.

Makes Strong Address—Dr. C. F. Wishart of Pittsburg Seminary made a strong address on the "Passion for Christian Unity" before the Social Union at its first meeting a week ago. The quartet from McCormick Seminary supplied music.

Pledge Definite Work—A group of fifteen men of Millard Avenue church, following an address by Dr. Francis M. Fox, brotherhood secretary, pledged themselves to attend the three regular services of the church each week, to look out for strangers in the congregation and call upon them and to report every other week at the close of prayer meeting.

Additions to Church Work—Two choruses have been formed at South Park church, one of intermediate boys and the other of intermediate girls. Each sings two Sundays a month at church services. —Shower baths and locker rooms have been installed at Austin church for the young people.—Repairs are to be made at once to Emerson Street church to adapt it better to the institutional demands upon it.—The children's morning chapel meeting at the Sunday school hour at Ravenswood church is meeting with good success.

Brief Notes—Dr. Robert Watson of Cincinnati conducted evangelistic meetings this week at the West Side Y. M. C. A.—William H. Peterson is chairman of the finance committee which expects to raise $100,000 to defray expenses of the convention of the International Sunday School Association, which meets here in June.—The Christian Endeavorers of South Park church are studying the question of moral training in the public schools. —Dr. C. B. McAfee speaking before the weekly meeting of Presbyterian men recently pointed out that only five members a day for the 31,000 Presbyterians in Chicago were added to the church on confession last year. He said the church at large lost 1,000 members a week from its rolls.—Churches of Chicago did not contribute a new pupil to the Chicago Training School this fall, according to President H. B. McAfee, who spoke of the school before presbytery recently.

Will Complete Edifice—Calvary church is proceeding with its preliminary canvass to secure funds for the completion of its edifice, with encouragement for early results. The reception of over forty members last Sunday, more than half of them on profession, brings the membership to 560 and adds a strong argument for enlarged facilities. The evening services conducted by the pastor, Rev. Ralph D. Kearns, are exceptionally well attended.

GIVE 117,000 BIBLES TO IMMIGRANTS

The New York Bible Society, according to the recent annual report of Dr. G. W. Carter, has distributed a larger number of Bibles and portions of Scriptures than ever before. The distribution of Bibles amounts to 338,404 volumes in forty-one languages. More than 117,000 Bibles were given to immigrants entering the country at Ellis Island. Bibles in raised type have also been supplied to many blind people and nearly 16,000 volumes were given to sailors and seamen on different vessels in New York harbor. The New York Bible Society is the only organization having for its sole work Bible distribution in the city and harbor of New York. Its work is directed by sixty managers, representatives of churches in Manhattan and the Bronx. Over 160 New York churches have contributed to the support of the society during the year. The following officers have been reelected: President, John C. West; vice president, Everett J. Esselstyn; secretary, Charles W. Parsons; treasurer, James H. Schmelzel.

MINISTER PRESIDES AT POLITICAL RALLY

Fusion Meeting Draws Clergy and Laity—Extension Committee Needs Aid—Unique Devotional Service at Seminary.

NEW YORK CITY—Saturday evening before election 4,000 people attended the clergy and laity fusion meeting in Carnegie Hall. The gathering was addressed by District Attorney Whitman. Nearly all denominations were represented. Dr. Edward S. Young of Bedford church, Brooklyn, presided and Dr. John F. Carson of Central church, Brooklyn, offered prayer. Dr. Carson took an active interest in the political campaign this fall.

Dr. Grenfell at Fifth Avenue—Dr. Wilfred T. Grenfell spoke at Fifth Avenue church, Dr. J. H. Jowett pastor, last Friday night. The meeting was under the auspices of the young people's society.

Church Extension Committee Asks for Aid—The church extension committee has just issued in a small pamphlet an appeal for larger contributions. In a brief statement setting forth its work and its needs, it says that fifteen churches under the committee's care received 416 members on confession of faith last year. This number is about one-fourth of all additions in the presbytery for that time. The $1,000,000 Kennedy bequest is bringing an income of $50,000, but with the rapidly increasing demands this sum is entirely inadequate. Pamphlets and full information may be obtained from the secretary, Dr. Jesse F. Forbes, 156 Fifth avenue.

All Day Conference on Prayer—The Morning Watch Movement, William Ralph Hall president and William B. Oliver secretary, will hold an all-day conference on prayer in Brick church Nov. 17. Dr. Robert E. Speer, Bishop Luther B. Wilson, Rev. Henry W. Frost and Dr. James A. Francis of Boston will be speakers.

Various Brooklyn Meetings.—Tonight, Nov. 13, the superintendents of Brooklyn Sunday schools meet for their annual dinner in the Nostrand Avenue M. E. church. Afterward a reception will be given to the retiring president, Edward R. Carhart, and to the new president, Charles E. Francis.—The fall convention of the Brooklyn C. E. Union is being held today and tomorrow in Bedford church, Dr. S. Edward Young pastor.—On Thanksgiving morning at 7 o'clock the Christian Endeavorers of the sixth division of Brooklyn will hold a sunrise meeting in South Bushwick Reformed church. The president, J. B. Payne, will speak.

Y. M. C. A. Secretaries on Steamships—The Young Men's Christian Association announces that the Royal Mail Steamship line has granted the association permission to place secretaries on board the company's vessels to conduct schools for immigrants. The association reports that 190,000 immigrants attended the lectures given in twenty-five European ports this last year. Negotiations are being forwarded to place secretaries on the vessels of other steamship lines.

Personal Items—Professor R. B. Hummel, who has been teaching 550 boys in a mission school at Lolodorf, Africa, is in the Presbyterian hospital suffering from almost complete nervous prostration due to overwork on his field.—Ralph W. Brown, one of the secretaries of the Y. M. C. A., spoke at Central church last Friday night.

Observe Anniversary of Alliance—The twenty-fifth anniversary exercises of the Lord's Day Alliance were held in Sotch church Nov. 9 and the following afternoon in the Board of Trade assembly hall. Addresses were given Sunday by Rev. H. L. Bowlby, secretary; E. A. Eggers, representing postal employees, and Dr. David G. Wylie. Mr. Bowlby was formally elected general secretary in place of Dr. George W. Grannis, who has become general field secretary with headquarters at Long Beach, Cal.

Brief Items—At the regular Monday meeting of the Ministers' Association Nov. 17 Dan Crawford will speak.—The New York Bible Society has announced Sunday, Dec. 7, as Bible Sunday. It is requested that all New York churches, and churches throughout the country, set aside the first Sunday in December for this observance.—The West Side Y. M. C. A. is conducting in the automobile school a class composed entirely of young women.

Devotional Day at Union—Carrying out a plan which the faculty has had in mind over a year, all class work and lectures were suspended in Union Seminary Nov. 6 in order to make way for a day of devotion. The faculty and students met together in chapel—a company of nearly 200—and spent together the entire day from 8 o'clock in the morning until 9 o'clock at night in devotional fellowship and celebration of the communion. In addition to students and faculty only Dr. George Alexander was present and he describes the occasion as characterized by a depth of spiritual feeling which he has scarcely ever experienced elsewhere. The professors and students participated in both prayer and the expression of spiritual aspiration spontaneously and on perfect equality. There were no set addresses.

Will Formulate Social Service Creed

The joint committee on Christian faith and social service representing the Presbyterian Church North, the Southern Presbyterian Church and the U. P. Church met at the Fort Pitt Hotel, Pittsburg, Nov. 5. The committee consists of nine members, three from each denomination. Dr. W. S. P. Bryan of Chicago is chairman of the Northern Church committee, Dr. J. K. McClurkin of the U. P. and Dr. Lyons of Richmond, Va., of the Southern Presbyterian. The committee is planning to submit to the different churches a new statement of its faith and creed along the lines of social service.

Duplex RICHMOND PATENTED D E TRADEMARK
The Robert Raikes Duplex System
TRADE MARK
For the Sunday School

This System, first offered to the Sunday Schools only a little over a year ago (under the name Beginners' Duplex), is now training tens of thousands of young people in the habit of making weekly offerings to Missions as well as to Local Support. Every day brings us letters such as this:

"We are much pleased with the results attained, and expect at the end of the School year to show a substantial increase in offerings. We feel that the largest benefit has come, however, from the educational value of the envelopes. At least twice a week (when the contributions are placed in the envelope, and when it is put on the plate) practically every pupil's thought is turned to others, and Missions is a constant presence."—L. S. Freeman, Roslindale, Mass.

We selected the name "Robert Raikes" for our Sunday School Duplex in remembrance of the founder of the modern Sunday School.

The Duplex System for the Church and the Robert Raikes Duplex for the Sunday School are both fully explained in "DUPLEX CHURCH AND SUNDAY SCHOOL METHODS." Write for it and for free ROBERT RAIKES UNIT No. 39. We shall be glad to send also particulars of the Graded Duplex System for the Sunday School, recommended by Rev. George H. Trull. CONSIDER REGULATION OF MARRIAGES

Cleveland Ministers to Stand with Other Protestant Pastors—Presbyterian Rally Well Attended—Talk Over Evangelistic Plans.

CLEVELAND—At the monthly meeting of the Presbyterian Club the eugenic problem was discussed and a resolution adopted to stand with other Protestant bodies in case, under guidance of the Federated Churches, a consensus of policy can be reached as to performing marriage ceremonies.

Presbyterians Rally—The annual Presbyterian rally was held Sunday evening, Nov. 7, in Calvary church. There was a processional of clergy, followed by elders of churches. The main speaker was Secretary J. E. McAfee of the Home Board. The Chamber of Commerce banquet room, accommodating 540, was crowded Tuesday evening, Nov. 9, with elders, trustees and deacons of the churches to whom the church extension committee and the Presbyterian Union tendered a reception. Dr. Wilton Merle-Smith of Central church, New York City, delivered an address. Dr. Merle-Smith has served as associate pastor with Dr. Haydn in Old Stone church.

Confer on Evangelism—An evangelistic conference has been arranged for Tuesday afternoon and evening, Nov. 18, in Old Stone church. Dr. George G. Mahy, secretary of General Assembly's committee on evangelism, and John R. Davis, D. D., of Philadelphia, will be the principal speakers, local pastors taking minor topics.

Personal Notes—Old Stone church has lost another faithful office bearer, Elder Alfred Eyears, who passed away Nov. 5 in the eighty-second year of his age. Coming to this city in 1835, he has continued in active business life until the time of his death.—Rev. William P. Thomas, who was recently installed pastor of Phillips Avenue church, came sixteen years ago to Boulevard church when it was only a mission Sunday school and for ten years was pastor of that congregation. The last five years he has served Mayflower church as stated supply and now becomes the first pastor of a new church, whose territory was adjacent to that of his first charge.—Rev. J. V. Axtell, formerly of Hamilton, N. Y., now pastor-elect of the Wickliffe church, has entered upon his new work and will soon be installed.

Would Extend Country Life Work—Presbytery recently adopted a resolution "most heartily indorsing the splendid work being done by the department of church and country life of the Home Board under the influential leadership of Rev. Warren H. Wilson, Ph. D., its superintendent, and trusts that the fine services of Dr. Warren and his associates will be strengthened and advanced."

CLOCKS INDICATE CAMPAIGN PROGRESS

In order to show the progress of the money raising campaign for the Y. M. C. A. and the Y. W. C. A. begun Monday, Nov. 10, two enormous clocks have been put up, one in the new Morgan building at the corner of Wall and Nassau streets and the other in the Metropolitan tower at 23d street, New York City. The hands on these clocks are moved around as each thousand dollars is secured. The clock in the Metropolitan tower is illuminated at night and can be seen from all parts of the city and far out in Jersey.

One of the main objects of the pending campaign is to get money for new homes of the colored branches of the two associations. Both branches for years have been handicapped by being compelled to do their work in temporary quarters. Dr. J. E. Moorland, international secretary for the colored Y. M. C. A., is in charge of the colored division of the building campaign as lieutenant to Charles S. Ward, in charge. Both associations are teaching the colored people to help themselves by making the individuals more efficient. The colored branch has done a great deal toward taking the colored boy off the street corners and is teaching him to be provident.

SELL SHARES OF CHURCH DEBT

NEW JERSEY—Forest Hill church, Rev. Frederick Lewis pastor, hit upon a novel plan to pay off the indebtedness upon its new building. The debt, $36,000, is to be divided into 1,200 shares, each to be sold at $30. These shares are to be paid in five years at the rate of 50 cents a month. If any subscriber finds it impossible to complete his payments he can cancel his pledge and the stock will be sold to someone else.

Morristown Items—The Morris ministerial association passed resolutions of sympathy for Mrs. Elijah Stoddard, whose husband recently died.—It is expected that the new Y. M. C. A. building at Morristown will be formally opened some time during Thanksgiving week.

Sermon by Old Friend—At the funeral of Dr. Elijah W. Stoddard in the church where he had been pastor for half a century at Succacunna the memorial sermon was preached by Dr. David R. Frazer, who was himself for a generation pastor in First church, Newark, and who had been an intimate friend of Dr. Stoddard. Another touching tribute was paid by a kinsman, Dr. Charles Augustus Stoddard of New York City, well known to former readers of The New York Observer for the "Augustus" letters. Prayer was offered by Dr. James M. Buckley, former editor of The New York Christian Advocate, and several messages of appreciation were read, among them one from Dr. Francis Brown, president of Union Seminary.

TELLS STARTLING FACTS AT DINNER

For the thirtieth year the international committee of the Y. M. C. A. invited its friends to dinner in New York Nov. 6 at the Waldorf Astoria. More than 400 guests were present. Chairman Alfred E. Marling, head of the international committee, presided and speeches were made by nine international secretaries and by George W. Perkins, chairman of the joint committee which is now hard at work in New York raising $4,000,000 for association work.

The secretarial speeches in particular were packed full of interesting facts, among which the following may be mentioned:

The association is now at work in 2,500 rural communities.

Fourteen secretaries under the direction of the international committee are traveling in European countries to instruct prospective emigrants to the United States in what will be expected of them as citizens of the New World.

There are eighty special associations now in connection with industrial plants and camps. To the maintenance of these the corporation owners are paying $175,000 annually and employees as much more.

Secretaries working on American battleships report 1,500 professions of faith in Christ among the sailors in the past year.

Tuskegee Institute, Booker T. Washington's college for the colored people, had 1,000 men studying the Bible under association auspices during the last session.

Seven hundred conversions were recorded in Iowa as a result of meetings conducted by college students going out from their institutions on evangelistic deputation work. In one Iowa town a meeting held by students doubled the membership of every church in the village.

The international committee now has 180 men engaged in the conduct of Christian associations in the cities of nineteen missionary countries. It sent out forty new men last year, ten of whom went to India, ten to South America and fifteen to China.

In America eight years ago the total property of the association amounted to $30,000,000. Today, due very largely to the whirlwind financial campaigns inaugurated by Charles S. Ward, the total holdings of the association in this country amount to $81,000,000.

RECENT SUNDAY SCHOOL NEWS

Former Governor Speaks—Former Governor Yates made an address at the Rally Day exercises of Rushville, Ill., Sunday school.

Have Big Parade—All of the Protestant churches and Sunday schools of Peoria joined in a Sunday school parade last Sunday. Nearly 8,000 pupils and teachers were in line.

Will Use Motion Picture Machines—A motion picture machine has been added to equipment of Westminster Sunday school, Toledo, Ohio. Fourth church, Chicago, is about to make a similar purchase.

Drive Out Slot Machines—Following complaints made by the Lake county, Illinois, Sunday school association concerning the use of slot machines, notices have been sent by the sheriff instructing local officers to throw all slot machines out.

Will Have Fresh Air Camp—The seventy-fifth anniversary of Monroe, Michigan, county Sunday school association was recently observed at Ida. Thirty-one schools were represented. It was determined to hold a fresh air camp on the lake during the summer.

Have Interdenominational Contest — Sunday schools of Mount Ida Presbyterian and Berea Congregational churches, Davenport, Iowa, are engaged in a contest. Points are credited for attendance and collection.—The schools of First Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist and Congregational churches, Evanston, Ill., are in a friendly rivalry for regular attendance and new pupils.

Dr. C. D. Jacobs, pastor of Central church, Joliet, Ill., was sent by his session to the Anti-Saloon League convention at Columbus.

Financial Situation

Bond Prices Nearly Down to Low Level of 1907 —Municipal Securities Favored by Those Whom Income Tax Will Touch.

Men and women who have on hand $2,000 or $3,000 to invest and others are looking with interest at the present prices of high grade bonds. Many bonds are now near the low price of the panic of 1907. This is more nearly true of the securities issued by railroads than those issued by industrial concerns. The drop from previous prices has been brought about through a discounting of the liability of disturbance to business conditions through the currency bill. This measure is in fact being watched closely by business men of all classes. In whatever shape the bill is passed it is expected, however, that it will affect business but little. Prospect of war with Mexico is also a disturbing factor. Baltimore and Ohio railway 4 per cent bonds due in 1948, which were at the low-water mark of 88 in 1907, are now 92. In the same way New York Central 4 per cents, which were 86 in 1907, are now down nearly to 90. Other railway bonds have declined in a similar manner. It is probable that the issuance of high grade securities bearing 5 per cent interest may also have something to do with the lower prices of the 4 per cents.

Income Tax Booms Municipal Bonds—Immediately following the passage of the income tax there was a considerable boom in municipal bonds. This class of security is exempt from this tax, so that the federal law in effect put the premium on municipal bonds. Philadelphia bonds, composing a large new issue, which could not be sold at all a few months ago, have recently been taken at par. Buffalo, N. Y., issued $950,000 in bonds bearing 4½ per cent interest and sold them at a premium. New York City bonds bearing the same return were sold at 105. In Chicago, where an effort has recently been made to sell municipal bonds over the counter in the city hall, the demand has been slight. This is attributed, however, to the fact that the smallest denomination is $1,000. New York City has recently issued bonds in $10 denominations. This is in keeping with the policy of the countries of Europe, where the peasants very frequently are owners of bonds, the denominations there being very small.

The Value of a Thousand People to a City—The Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco has announced after careful investigation that each thousand people added to the population of that city increases the yearly business $2,436,000. This thousand people will use during the year $225,000 of manufactured goods. Of this amount the wholesale clothier and haberdasher will receive $6,445 and the retail dealer in goods of this line $17,910. The banker receives from this addition to the population $133,510. So far as reports have gone no one has attempted to discover what are the advantages to a city's churches from the addition of a thousand people to the population. It might be possible to discover the proportionate increase to missionary causes as the population grows.

Imagine Yourself a Seller—The prospective investor in any sort of security can oftentimes clarify his mind in regard to the desirability of investing money where it is proposed by imagining himself trying to sell the same stock. No one wants to put his money into something where the possibilities of obtaining the capital again are remote, no matter if the dividends are very large. It is very easy to buy stock, but not nearly so easy to sell some of it. Careful bankers advise against women investing in the stock of any concern,, especially in companies whose securities are not listed on the New York or Chicago exchanges. The owner of stock is virtually a partner in the concern and theoretically at least ought to be in a position to oversee carefully the action of the officers in charge. Dividends upon stock depend on the earnings of the company. Bonds and mortgages in counterdistinction to stocks constitute a lien upon the property of the company issuing them. If the company has assets ample to cover the securities issued, the possibility of loss on such classes of security is not great. Stock, however, becomes almost valueless unless the company is earning dividends, and dividends are liable to great fluctuation.

MEN AND THEIR ACTIVITIES

Iowa—A committee of seven of the men of Third church, Dubuque, was recently appointed to lay plans for the organization of a brotherhood.

Colorado—Brotherhood work in Twenty-Third Avenue church, Denver, started with a dinner to the men. They are planning to increase church attendance by advertising and greeting strangers. They will also push the men's Bible class in Sunday school.

Michigan—L. J. Davies, secretary for Michigan of the Laymen's Missionary Movement, recently addressed pastors of Pontiac in the Presbyterian church.—The employers' liability law was discussed at a recent meeting of the men's club of First church, Battle Creek.

Illinois—The men's league of Wilmette, a Chicago suburb, is divided into groups which take turns holding "sings" at the homes of various members of the congregation. Neighbors are invited to these informal affairs.—Dr. Francis M. Fox, brotherhood secretary, was the chief speaker before the men of Manteno church on a recent Monday night.

ATCHISON CHURCHES TO FEDERATE

To prevent unnecessary scattering of energy and to make more helpful and effective the work of Christian teaching, worship and influence of the two churches, a federation of First Presbyterian and First Congregational churches of Atchison, Kan., has been effected. The two congregations will worship together and the sessions of the Sabbath school will be together and to all intents and purposes be one, except the offerings of each church go to its own benevolent boards. William I. Alexander, D. D., pastor of the Presbyterian church, will be pastor of the federated church.

The worship and work of the federation is to be managed by a joint committee consisting of the pastor, Sunday school superintendent, the federation secretary and eight additional members, five from the Presbyterian church and three from the Congregational church.

Both churches have splendid church buildings and they will both be available for use as the joint committee may determine.

This is a city of 20,000 and it is likely that some features of institutional work will be taken up in the Congregational church building.

LIKE PRESENT POLICY OF BOARD

COLORADO—Synod by an overwhelming vote recently adopted the report of the committee which commended a continuance of the present policy of the Board of Home Missions.

Discusses Modern Thought—"Satan, the Great Promoter of Modern Religious Systems," is the title of a series of Sunday afternoon sermons at Twenty-Third Avenue church, Denver, by the pastor, Rev. Perry V. Jenness. All of the modern new thought theologies are being discussed.

Founds Many Churches—The importance of the work of the Sunday school missionary on the frontier is shown in the report of the missionary in Boulder Presbytery. In 1898 there were nineteen churches in the presbytery, which included the whole state of Wyoming. There are twenty-eight churches in Boulder Presbytery as now constituted. Twelve of these grew out of Sunday schools established in early days. Of these twelve churches eleven have buildings worth $26,200 and two have parsonages. Eight home missionaries are working on these fields now.

Travelers' Aid to Be National Organization

The Travelers' Aid Society, New York City, is planning to form a national organization. Gilbert Colgate has been elected president and Dr. Francis Brown is one of the vice presidents. Among the directors are William S. Bennet of the Home Mission Board, Dr. A. E. Keigwin, pastor of West End church, New York; Miss Grace Dodge of the national Y. W. C. A., and John Wanamaker of Philadelphia. The society, which is nonsectarian, devotes its care largely to women and girls traveling alone. Women agents meet trains and steamers and conduct inexperienced or confused travelers to their destinations, or otherwise care for them. The work is supported wholly by voluntary contributions.

SCHOOL AND COLLEGE

Student Pastor at Boulder—Colorado Synod has authorized the employment of a student pastor at the state university at Boulder. Rev. Ralph C. McAfee, son of President McAfee of Parsons College, will be appointed.

Start Campaign with Roll Call—The roll of the 1,026 graduates of Hanover College will be called Nov. 25 at the rally service in the Presbyterian church at Hanover, Ind. The college has entered on a two years' campaign to raise $250,000 and the graduates are being asked to have a share in the larger work of the college. At the exercises the sermon will be preached by Dr. O. D. Odell of Indianapolis. Rev. H. T. Graham is endowment secretary.

Turned Away Many Boys—Mercersburg, Pa., Academy has entered upon one of its most successful years. The academy opened with a crowded enrollment of 410 boys. About seventy-five boys were refused because of lack of room.

MINISTERIAL OBITUARY

Dr. Robert Gibson McNiece lived thirty-six years in Salt Lake City—his entire ministerial life. This is a record which has scarcely been equaled by any other Protestant clergyman in Utah. The non-Mormon daily papers of Salt Lake paid him remarkably affectionate editorial tributes after his death. Dr. McNiece was born in Vermont in 1839. He farmed and taught school before he went to college, so did not graduate from Dartmouth until his twenty-eighth year. He was principal of a high school and then newspaper editor in Fort Wayne, Ind., and did not become a minister until 1877. On graduation from Princeton Seminary, he accepted the call to First church, Salt Lake City, which he served for twenty years. During this time the congregation grew from a handful to 350 members. In 1897 his deep interest in education culminated in his resigning to build up an evangelical college for Utah. This work has since eventuated in the establishment of Westminster College at Salt Lake, to which Dr. H. W. Reherd has just gone as president.

Dr. Edward G. Thurber, pastor of the American church in Paris for sixteen years, died Nov. 7 at his home in New York City. Dr. Thurber, who was 77 years old, after graduating from Hartford and Union Theological Seminaries served for twenty years as pastor of Park church, Syracuse, N. Y. He resigned his pulpit there in 1888 and went to Paris, where he remained as pastor of the American church in that city until 1904, when he returned to his native country. Before entering the theological seminary Dr. Thurber was graduated from the University of Michigan.

MR. GATES AND THE CODY CHURCHES

Following the death of the well-known millionaire, Charles G. Gates, at Cody, Wyo., newspaper reports alleged that he had paid the debts of the churches in that city just before his demise. The facts as furnished to The Continent are:

"Mr. Gates came to Cody in October. He went into the mountains for big game and returned to Cody after a successful hunt. During his stay at Buffalo Bill's hotel he became generally liked on account of his unconventional, "jolly good fellow" behavior. Members of his party were taken to a clothing store and fitted out with $250 fur coats. While in the store he expressed a desire to see the pastors of the three churches. The Episcopal rector and the Methodist pastor went to him, but demurred at taking anything from him. But he pressed upon the rector $1,000 more than the total indebtedness of the church, about $1,500. The Methodist pastor told him he would see him the next day, but before leaving the store a $250 fur coat was ordered for him. The store proprietor, a Presbyterian trustee, informed him that his church's indebtedness was about $750 and he turned to his secretary and told him 'to put it down with the rest.' No checks were given and Mr. Gates died the next day."

Comes from Syria for Bride

Friday, Nov. 14, there will occur in First church, Yonkers, N. Y., a quiet wedding attended only by near relatives which will have a very wide interest throughout the church. The bridegroom will be Rev. William Jessup of Lebanon station of the Syria mission, son of the late Dr. H. H. Jessup, the mission's famous founder. The bride will be Miss Katherine Prime, daughter of General Ralph E. Prime of Yonkers, an eminent elder whose name is known throughout the denomination. The ceremony will be solemnized by Dr. John Fox, secretary of the American Bible Society. On Saturday Mr. Jessup and his bride will sail for Syria. Mr. Jessup's whole stay in America on this trip will be barely ten days, for he landed in New York Nov. 5.

"Bradford Horton"

In the advertisement of the Fleming H. Revell Company in The Continent of Nov. 6 a typographical inadvertency presented the title of Dr. Holmes's last story as "Badford Horton, Man," instead of "Bradford Horton, Man."

The American Tract Society, New York, N. Y., announces the publication on the 15th inst. of "Bees in Amber" by John Oxenham of London, England, author of "White Fire," "God's Prisoners," "Hearts in Exile," etc.

Major Scott of Croyden, England, says "Bees in Amber" is an exquisite little volume. Its high seriousness, delicate fancy and haunting loveliness will insure for it a place in the hearts of thousands. Many will place the volume on the shelf of their bedside favorites.

"A Little Lost Sister"

DEAR FRIEND:

We venture to write about Miss Julia R. in the hope that what has been done for her may enlist your sympathy and aid for other girls whose needs are just as urgent and keen.

Julia is nearly sixteen and quite attractive. She was induced to leave her home town by a procuress who promised her fine clothes and an easy time. Her sisters appealed to us for help, after they had tried to enlist the police and failed. The girl was located in a city a thousand miles away, and rescued. The procuress was arrested and prosecuted and Julia, heartbroken and penitent, was restored to her family.

There are many thousands of girls in America just like Julia, ready to become the easy prey of white slave traders. They are not bad. Some are ignorant. Others are foolish. They all crave nice clothes, but cannot afford to buy them. Still others are trapped like animals and sold to keepers of vice resorts.

Over 25,000 girls and women enter a life of sin each year. Many could be saved by proper warnings, and a little timely help. There are 2,000 men and women employed by the vice resorts who are on the watch for ignorant, foolish, discontented, or careless girls, for the purpose of dragging them into the underworld. Many homes are in the shadow of a great sorrow this Thanksgiving time because of a missing wife, sister, or daughter. We are protecting such girls by the thousands by exposing the methods used by vice promoters.

YOU MAY NOT ALWAYS BRING BACK THE WAYWARD ONE, BUT YOU CAN HELP PREVENT VICE PROMOTERS FROM DRAGGING OTHER INNOCENT GIRLS INTO WHITE SLAVERY.

This is an appeal for a Thanksgiving gift. We need $1,000 for immediate use. Ask neighbors to help. Ask your church, Bible class, Sunday school or other organization for a collection.

Will you be one of 100 to send $10 each? You can at least send a Thanksgiving dollar.

Small Church; Big Gifts Per Capita

An example of what a small church may do in the way of home mission gifts is that of Donaldson, Mich., church, an organization of but fifteen members, which during the past year led the entire Michigan Synod outside of Detroit in per capita gifts to home missions, $1. Lake Superior Presbytery for the second time led the synod except Detroit in home mission gifts. Increases were made as follows: Menominee, $23 to $150; Soo, $55 to $278; Escanaba, $45 to $120.

New Journal for Ministers

"Monday Morning" is a new magazine of stimulus for the preacher, issued on the first Monday of each month by George H. Doran Company, New York City. The first number has an article by Dr. Jowett, "The Preacher in His Pulpit," and a special message by Gipsy Smith to ministers. The magazine will contain each month the notices of some of the best recent books of interest to preachers.

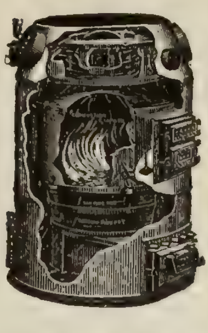
BOVEE FURNACES



At Manufacturers' Prices

THE BOVEE FURNACE HAS DOUBLE THE HEATING CAPACITY OF OTHER FURNACES FOR AMOUNT OF FUEL CONSUMED. They are made very heavy, of the best of material.

Measure the fire pots and combustion chamber and then note the long travel of heat through the compound radiator before reaching the chimney. Compare these measurements with those of all other first-class furnaces, and you will see WHY the Bovee Furnaces require so little fuel and last longer.

Send plans for our special winter prices. We save you about one-half on the price of a first-class heating plant.

Lafayette Gives Thanks

on this Thanksgiving Day for the splendid gift of $90,000 for a Chapel

This is another evidence that Presbyterians are interested in their largest College, and of their desire to make it worthy of the great Church with which it is connected.

Lafayette needs an additional Endowment of $1,000,000 to meet its opportunities. It will welcome small gifts or large.

$2,000 will found a scholarship in memory of a friend or a pastor, or some one who has helped you in some way.

Are you interested in such a memorial? Would it not be a practical evidence of your thanksgiving for what they have done for you?

Peloubet's UNIFORM LESSON Quarterlies

¶ The editors and publisher of the Peloubet Series of Quarterlies have ever united in striving to make this series unexcelled.

¶ The entire series is edited on a careful, systematic, and graded plan, and commencing with the smallest child moves steadily forward up to the most studious adult, each Quarterly being closely adapted to suit the specific needs of its grade.

¶ We also publish a series of TEACHER'S QUARTERLIES, which contain helpful material for the teacher to use in preparing the lesson, and which have become indispensable during the past years.

¶ We have made these Quarterlies for over thirty years, and continue to put them before the religious world, feeling confident they will, as in years past, be appreciated by all discerning minds.

¶ We shall be glad to send free samples and catalogue giving full details to all intending purchasers.

To Begin Your Winter's Reading

Two Excellent Juveniles

WONDER OAK

Bertha C. Porter

Size, 8vo (5 7-8 x 8 inches). Pages, 163. Binding, cloth. Gold top. Price, $1.00 net.

"Wonder Oak," by Miss Bertha Currier Porter, with illustrations by Miss May Aiken, is an altogether delightful nature fairy book for the little folk. By means of fairies representing birds, flowers, etc., the outdoor life of a year in the woods is depicted in a truly charming manner, and while the child listens or reads in breathless interest, all unconsciously he is being educated in nature lore.

THE CHILDREN OF THE SHOE

E. M. Jameson

Size, 12mo (5 1-4 x 7 inches). Pages, 154. Illustrated. Binding, cloth. Price, 75c net.

Who has not been interested in the fortunes of the family of the "old woman who lived in a shoe"? This attractive little book, by E. M. Jameson of London, satisfies our curiosity. Miss Jameson is a story-teller well known on both sides of the sea. This beautifully told and interesting little story will be eagerly welcomed by the children, and by all grown-ups who love children and still keep the child-love of mystery.

IT IS NOT LAWFUL

Arthur H. DeLong

Size, 12mo (5 x 7 1-2 inches). Pages, 353. Binding, cloth. Price, $1.25 net.

The many dramas, romances and tales based upon Biblical incidents are eloquent testimonies to the enduring power of the Old and the New Testament writers. "It Is Not Lawful," by Arthur H. DeLong, is a romance, the interest of which centers about the love stories of John the Baptist, Mary Magdalene and Salome. His descriptions of the life and customs in the time of the Baptist are of idyllic beauty, and the character sketching is clear and strong.

FREEDOM OF THOUGHT IN RELIGIOUS TEACHING

Richard J. Cooke

Size, 12mo (5 1-4 x 7 3-4 inches). Pages, 141. Binding, cloth. Price, $1.00 net.

It is evident that there is a wide difference of opinion as to the liberty of utterance permissible in religious teaching. Bishop Cooke's book is a careful, critical and scholarly discussion of the entire subject. Like other controversial works by the same author, this new volume is compelling in argument, but a gem of literary eloquence. It is a strong declaration of unity, liberty and charity.

PLAIN THOUGHTS ON FAITH AND LIFE

Wellesley P. Coddington

Size, 12mo (5 x 7 3-4 inches). Pages, 225. Binding, cloth. Gold top. Price, $1.00 net.

This author has an unusually clear conception of truth, and furnishes very vigorous and helpful suggestions as to the proper manner of reaching a sure foundation for our faith and hope. Anyone reading it will desire to return to it when perplexed by the persistent tendency to sink down to the pessimism so prevalent in the literature of the day. It shows beyond question that well-grounded convictions are essential to personal comfort as well as to permanent progress in the spiritual life.

THE CALL OF THE HILLS

M. B. Van Leer

Size, 12mo (4 7-8 x 7 1-4 inches). Pages, 163. Binding, cloth. Gold top. Price, $1.00 net.

"The Call of the Hills," by M. B. Van Leer, is eminently a story for boys, though it will be read by girls with absorbing interest. The scene is laid in the Ozarks. The hero struggles between the claims of duty and the call of ambition. The two love stories running through the tale are sweet and simple. The action is vigorous and the whole style and tone strong and wholesome.

A ONE-SIDED AUTOBIOGRAPHY

Oscar Kuhns

Size, 12mo (5 x 7 3-4 inches). Pages, 236. Binding, cloth. Gold top. Price, $1.00 net.

This is an intimate revelation of the play and power of books upon the inner and deeper life of a man. We esteem ourselves fortunate in presenting this volume by Professor Kuhns. In a simple and fascinating way he tells the story of his love for books. It is indeed a window through which one may see the development of a very bright and genial intellect. The book is in every way worthy of study.

PERSONAL RELIGION AND THE SOCIAL AWAKENING

Ross L. Finney

Size, 12mo (5 x 7 3-4 inches). Pages, 147. Binding, cloth. Price, 75c net.

The purpose of Professor Finney's "Personal Religion and the Social Awakening" is to harmonize the divergent tendencies of personal religion and social religion; to show that they are mutually supplementary; to make it clear that we need the ideals and ends emphasized by the social awakening to motivate our personal religion, and that the social awakening needs the emotions and enthusiasms of personal religion to vitalize it. The book is in brief a plea for personal religion as the basis of the social readjustment, and for the social ideals as a motive for personal religion.

Around the Shop

When it comes to a choice between lazy people and those who are fussy, the Around-the-Shop Man will be found placing his little campstool alongside the person who is honestly lazy.

You know, don't you, that there is quite a difference between those who are honestly lazy and those who are just lazy? The man who is honest about it serves a useful purpose by contrast; he is sometimes picturesque, and the contemplation of his enjoyment of not doing things is restful to other kindly men of active habit. The "just lazy" fellow lies about his laziness and lives to make other folks uncomfortable.

One of the magazines blames its version of this story on Arkansas—just as a matter of habit; but it really happened in New Jersey, if it happened at all:

> A man and his wife were one day sitting on the porch when a circus parade passed the house. The man was comfortably seated in a chair which was tilted back on its hind legs against the side of the house, and was engaged in whittling on a piece of wood. As the parade proceeded he said:
> "I hear that that there circus parade's 'bout the biggest that's ever been held around here, Maggie."
>
> "Just passin' by now, ain't it, Bud?" queried his wife, making no effort to move.
> "Yep!" Bud answered.
> "I'd downright like to see it," said the woman. "What a pity I ain't facin' that way!"

Here's one we'll credit to Arkansas:

> The grocer was sitting with his feet reposing on a cracker barrel, with a newspaper spread over his head to discourage the friendly fly and its over-sociable companions.
> "Please, Mr. Jones, ma wants a pint of sorghum."
> "Run along, little girl; come in some time when I'm standing up."

We have never found Presbyterians reluctant to "turn around and look" when a first class religious paper is presented to them, or to get up and come half way when a profitable and helpful proposition of that character is presented. If we had found them so, the Around-the-Shop Man would not have retained his abiding faith that each and every reader of these lines could increase The Continent's family by at least one this very week if he really set out to do so. Your friend is just waiting for you. Why not do it? Some of our folks have the habit of doing it, and you simply can't break them of it.

NEW MACMILLAN BOOKS. THE BEST HOLIDAY GIFTS

"A book of world-wide interest"

Col. Roosevelt's Own Story of His Life

THEODORE ROOSEVELT: AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY

This exceptional story of a life replete with human interest, told in Col. Roosevelt's characteristically vigorous and easily flowing colloquial style, is one that will make a strong and satisfying appeal to every class of readers. To the lover of the strenuous life as well as to the student of contemporaneous history, to the young people of the country particularly, who all find a special attraction in personal narrative of active achievement, this autobiography will afford keen satisfaction and high inspiration. From his boyhood days in New York, his adolescent youth at Harvard University, his young manhood days in the Wild West, and through a diversified public career which led to the Presidency of the United States, Col. Roosevelt was a learner as well as a born leader. In this book he tells of the many things which he learned and how he learned them, relating them primarily with a view to the help they may give others. Taking the initiative in many of the most important events of our times—both national and international—his autobiography is a unique record of men and events, and of a career of almost unparalleled interest.

Thanksgiving and Immigration

GIVE THANKS FOR THE IMMIGRANTS!

This is the extraordinary suggestion which the Home Missions Council puts to Protestant churches for Thanksgiving of 1913.

The current week has been designated by this same agency as "Home Mission Week," and a host of churches no doubt are devoting it, as the council requested, to special study of immigration.

But now the council reaches out into the week following and points to the coming Thanksgiving Day. It asks the churches what they expect to give thanks for specially this year. Then this proposal: "You have just been studying about the immigrants and what it means to have them crowding into this country of ours. Now give thanks that they are here."

Rather stunning audacity, is it not? And a new idea—very new, For the dominant note in discussing the immigration problem in the United States, considered either civilly or religiously, has been, from time immemorial, anything but a note of gratitude.

Concern, alarm, dread, or pity, social interest, religious sympathy—all these have been voiced and revoiced in the constant eddy of American talk around the immigrants.

But who ever heard of a minister or a church member standing up in church to say: "I am thankful for these immigrants"?

Is there any chance that anybody will learn to say it—honestly, out of the heart, not for mere effect—on Thanksgiving Day, 1913?

One thing is sure: It is easy enough to get an American to give thanks for immigration if only you start him in far enough back.

Any American who is religious in any degree whatever is ready to thank the Lord effusively for the immigration of his own ancestors. It pleases him mightily that the transfer of his family line to America happened before he came on earth.

And the whole country is prepared to be grateful for the immigration of the original colonial stocks—Pilgrim, Puritan, Cavalier, Dutch Huguenot, Swede, German, Scotch-Irish and all the rest—albeit when these rival nationalities were struggling for their first footholds amid American forests, each was very well convinced that all the others were threatening factors in the new land.

But before a century had elapsed they had all together begun to appreciate that the developing country needed them all; that each race of men and element of society had something of strength and facility to put into the compound out of which was to come the force of the world's newest and most aspiring nation.

And if at different times the various components of the American people have for a period failed to value one another, experience has soon renewed the old lesson—that united America gets its unique power out of the diversity which it unifies.

So the broad-minded American today has no difficulty about being thankful for the early multiplexity of immigration to these shores. The only question is how far down along later history he can make his immigration gratitude reach.

It must be acknowledged that the bulk of current immigration comes in ignorant and uncouth. But who can say that the primitive immigration of which America is now so proud was greatly different? Only a few among the nation's first fathers brought with them from Europe learning and polished manners.

The enormous majority of the men who began America had as much mud on their boots as the laborers of a Hungarian or Polack construction gang have today. Yet that does not disqualify them now for a lofty place on the genealogical trees of America's "best families."

And if disgust is excited by the criminals who creep in among the "hordes" arriving nowadays from southern Europe, it is but fair to remind ourselves, before we become either too contemptuous or too pessimistic, of the hosts of convicts from English prisons whose arrival here scandalized many of the original colonists.

In a word, is there anything but short-sightedness and prejudice to make the contemporary American so sure that the present-day immigrant is bringing to this new home of his nothing but menace?

Ahead a hundred years from now will not discriminating social writers be saying that the Hebrews who came into the country late in the ninteenth century and early in the twentieth, reinspirited the nation's love of classic learning, and the Italians added new grace to the national life, and the Bohemians and Poles and Hungarians furnished to American fiber a fresh ruggedness—and so on through all the roll call of the peoples?

May it not even be then said that this inflow of new foreign elements made religion in America more cosmopolitan and spacious than it had ever been before?

And certainly if the nation and church of a hundred years hence are going to be thankful for the immigrants whom America is receiving today, we who are alive today want to be live enough to anticipate and take part in that gratitude.

Nothing in the possible attitudes of posterity is less agreeable to contemplate than that our descendants should look back at us pityingly to say:

"Poor blind people, they wailed in terror over the very blessings with which the Lord was enriching the land."

"Immigration Thanksgiving" in 1913 might save us this discredit.

At least there is one way in which this Thanksgiving, wherever Christ's spirit prevails, should spontaneously include a thought for these alien newcomers.

The gospel command is, "Rejoice with them that rejoice."

If the churches do not yet see far and clear enough to give thanks for the immigrant, they can surely give thanks with him.

How touchingly grateful the most ignorant and stupid of these people are for the privilege of getting to America! Some of them are having a frightfully hard time to live here, but they love the country nevertheless and their chief pride is to be its citizens.

Assuredly no church of Christ can be so churlish as to refuse to thank God on behalf of these men and women that he has opened to them such a door of gladness and hope.

Even if they are a trial and a risk to the nation, what generous Christian heart can begrudge them their thanksgiving for America?

Besides, there is the chance to preach the gospel to these multitudes. That alone would have made a full Thanksgiving Day for a man like Paul.

Is the church capable of such Pauline gratitude?

The World

Indications That Huerta May Fall of His Own Weight

Provisional President Huerta last Sunday ousted one of the few remaining members of his cabinet credited with the possession of conservatism and sound judgment, Minister Aldape of the interior department. Aldape was sent to Vera Cruz, ostensibly on his way to France on a special mission. British and German subjects in Mexico were advised by representatives of their governments to follow the example of American citizens and withdraw from the country. An anti-American outbreak was feared which might endanger the lives of all foreigners.

Early last week at a banquet to the lord mayor of London Premier Asquith in the course of an official address expressed in behalf of Great Britain respect and friendship for America's policy in Mexico. The premier made direct denial that Britain had sought to thwart America and said he relied on the latter to protect the interests of Europe in the harassed republic. This speech of the premier was followed with a statement by one of the governmental newspaper organs that the British policy of nonintervention is likewise the policy of every other European power. Dictator Huerta's funds have been running low of late and several financial doors have been closed in his face. Rebel or constitutionalist victories in the north have been more numerous and important and there were evidences that Huerta's power is tottering—possibly he might fall of his own weight without the pressure of outside military force.

Culiacan, capital of the state of Sinaloa, has been captured by the constitutionalists. Juarez, a city of importance just across the river from El Paso, Texas, fell into the hands of 2,000 rebels led by General Francisco Villa. It was the sixth time in the last three years that Juarez had changed governments. Federal officers and soldiers who defended the place were executed without mercy. The states of Sinaloa, Sonora and Durango, with the territory of Tepic, form a great wedge capable of expanding southward and eastward into a confederacy under the leadership of General Carranza which would overwhelm the party in power at the City of Mexico.

William Bayard Hale, as confidential investigator for President Wilson, spent some time conferring with Carranza at the latter's temporary capital at the village of Nogales. He found Carranza earnest, serious and sober-minded—in contrast to Huerta, who is reputed to be a wine-bibber—but to Mr. Hale as to other interviewers he is said to have declared unalterable opposition to mediation by any foreign nation. A correspondent of The London Times asserts Carranza is "certainly honest," something of a student and an idealist, deliberate and decisive. He may soon loom larger in current Mexican events.

The new congress whose election Dictator Huerta ordered after he had broken up the last one by arresting a large number of the deputies met in Mexico City Saturday in spite of President Wilson's request to the contrary. The subservient character of the new chamber of deputies may be judged from the fact that it included on its roll all the members of Huerta's staff, the minister of war's chief aid and also his secretary, many detectives and numerous others more or less closely identified with the administration. None of the Catholic senators were present Saturday, which the dispatches say was in accord with an agreement of their party against participation in senate sessions. Therefore the senate lacked a quorum.

Jewish Defendant Acquitted of "Ritual" Murder Charge

Russia has partly redeemed herself in the eyes of the civilized world by the verdict of the peasant jury in the courtroom at Kiev acquitting Mendel Beiliss, the Jew, of the charge of murdering a Christian boy for sacrificial or ceremonial purposes. The verdict was indecisive in that while acquitting the humble defendant it did not dispose of the "ritual murder" rubbish and in the Russian duma there was talk of a possible revision of the trial in a further effort to clear the mystery of the crime. One member of the duma introduced a resolution urging the appointment of a committee to draft a bill conferring upon all Russian subjects equal rights before the law. The motion was rejected by a decisive vote.

The "blood accusation," of which the Beiliss case is the most recent instance, is well described by the editor of the conservative Springfield, Massachusetts, Republican as "the most remarkable example in history of the fatal persistence of a lie—a criminal falsehood directed against a whole body of adherents of a great and ancient religion." Leaders of other religions, including popes, have declared the charge of ritual murder wickedly false. Even Russian czars of the last century called the accusation impossible. During the course of the puzzling Beiliss trial a Russian newspaper, The Kievlanan, denounced the indictment as claptrap and warned the authorities that it might prove a boomerang. But the Black Hundreds, a powerful anti-Semitic organization, professed to regard the charge against the brickyards watchman with all seriousness.

The court of appeals at St. Petersburg has ordered the prosecution of 120 members of the bar of that city who signed a protest against the Beiliss trial.

Conspiracy Verdict Adds Chapters to Lorimer Scandal

Two more chapters in the Lorimer senatorial scandal were written last week. Clarence S. Funk, whom The Chicago Inter-Ocean comprehensively describes as "a good citizen"—which opinion has universal reenforcement—had the satisfaction of seeing a jury convict an influential lawyer, Daniel Donahoe, of a criminal conspiracy to defame Mr. Funk's reputation, and impose as punishment for the crime a fine of $2,000. Following this verdict Mr. Funk offered a reward of $5,000 for information leading to the arrest and conviction of the principals behind the convicted lawyer—"the men higher up" whose identity is not known but suspected. There is a hope that they may be brought to the daylight. Mr. Funk's offer of a reward was later supplemented by smaller proffers from admirers of the sturdy battle he made to defend his own integrity and protect his family from disgrace.

The undisclosed rascals furnished the funds for the conspirators who framed up a despicable and utterly bogus alienation suit against Mr. Funk in an effort to ruin his character and revenge themselves for his testimony in the final Lorimer investigation. It was this testimony which really caused the ousting of William Lorimer from his seat as United States senator from Illinois and helped to bring about a political revolution in the state and country at large. In coming forward with this evidence in 1911 it was acknowledged that Mr. Funk rendered a distinct public service, and gratification is now correspondingly great that the plot to besmirch his good name completely collapsed. It developed that the man and woman named in the humbug lawsuit had no acquaintance with him nor had he seen them until they came into court and confessed the sham.

Chicago newspapers praise Mr. Funk's "manly determination" for first exposing political corruption when it had been forced upon his notice and next in following up the vicious and vengeful attack on his moral standing. Had the conspiracy met with even partial success, its bad influence would have been far reaching; on the other hand its overthrow has had a salutary and heartening effect on the friends of decency and truth.

Strikes of Miners; Secretary Wilson's Views

Bitter strikes among the coal miners of Colorado and the copper miners of Michigan have been in progress for many weeks, marked by violence, fatalities and suffering and by a dogged and unyielding spirit on both sides. The strike in the Calumet district of Upper Michigan began last July and soon developed into a struggle for existence on the part of the union, backed by the Western Federation of Miners and the American Federation of Labor. The mine owners have demanded that any man returning to work shall renounce his union membership and they are criticised for taking this attitude by a recent writer in The Survey. The employers are also criticised for bringing in outside "gunmen" of low character.

Last week it was said that it would be necessary for the troops to remain indefinitely in part of the district. With no hope of a settlement in sight the strikers are preparing to carry their fight through the winter. Winter in the Keweenaw peninsula is long and severe and the strikers and their families are facing a painful prospect in spite of the financial aid they are receiving from their parent organizations. If the miners lose this fight it is prophesied that they will turn to the sabotage and lawless methods of the "I. W. W."—an organization which preaches and practices anarchy.

In the Southern Colorado coal fields numerous pitched battles have been fought in which mine guards and union men have been killed and wounded. Clashes have occurred at Ludlow, Aguilar, Berwind, Tabasco, Hastings and Trinidad. The state troops were ordered out and martial law was declared. A fatal encounter occurred a few days ago. At Washington resolutions have been introduced in Congress for investigations of the situation in Colorado and in Michigan.

A member of the cabinet, William B. Wilson, secretary of labor, in addressing the annual convention of the American Federation of Labor at Seattle scored the attitude of the Michigan copper mining companies and asserted that gigantic profits had been made by most of the successful mines on comparatively small original investment. According to his figures the largest copper corporation in the Michigan district was organized in 1870 with an actual investment of a million and a quarter dollars and in forty-two years had declared dividends of $121,000,000, besides $75,000,000 of reinvestments. Secretary Wilson also told the convention that he wished to see created a bureau of labor information, to be handled on much the same lines as the United States weather bureau, which would give general information concerning opportunities for employment throughout the country, with local details as to wages, trade unions and strikes. This information in condensed form he would have posted on a sheet in every postoffice in the United States. He also stated that the department of labor will cooperate with the trade union movement in its effort to elevate the standard of human society.

Secretary Wilson's criticism of the mine owners elicited a telegraphic protest addressed to the President by 150 Democrats of the copper country demanding the secretary's removal.

Women Protest Against Tendencies of Fiction

One of the most important organizations of women in the country, the Chicago Woman's Club, at a meeting last week discussed recent reprehensible tendencies in fiction, particularly the overemphasis of sex problems. A score of leading women made impromptu but evidently heartfelt speeches against those American novelists who devote their talents to dressing up the questionable, the meretricious, the immoral and the painly vulgar. Mrs. Edwin Theodore Johnson of Old Park, whose critique drew forth the discussion, characterized the new literature as not art and not even slices of life, "but rather a ragged hole in life into which the authors have poked an instrument."

Among the authors whose late work is open to criticism on moral grounds the club women cited Winston Churchill, Hall Caine, Mrs. Wharton, Robert Herrick and Robert Chambers, though it was not assumed that the list was hardly more than begun.

According to one speaker, "The fault lies largely with changing conditions. The young people become drunk with the freedom which was prohibited us in our day and in our parents' day. The sudden matter-of-fact discussion of hitherto tabooed problems has not allowed our youth to get their bearings. It is hard for them to maintain their wisdom. The sex novels augment the harmful effects of the situation."

"I believe it is time that our organization should take a stand against present day American fiction," said another aroused member. "The fiction of our day not only is corrupting the imagination of the youth of the present day, but will form a harmful influence upon the next generation."

Several members of the American Academy and the National Institute of Arts and Letters, in joint session at Chicago, were interviewed by The Daily News of that city, and for the most part agreed that there was "too much sex" in the novels of the day as well as in the modern drama.

Work to Decrease the Dangers of the Sea

Twelve nations, including the United States, were represented at the meeting of the International Conference on Safety at Sea last week in London at the British foreign office. The president of the board of trade welcomed the delegates in behalf of the British government, and Lord Mersey, a noted jurist, was made chairman. He pointed out that while the aims of the conference were simple the means by which they were to be attained were far from easy. While the practical requirements of business must always be borne in mind, at the same time he suggested that wherever doubt existed the tendency should always be to lean toward the line of safety rather than toward the line of economy. King George of England, who has had experience as a sailor, sent a message voicing an earnest hope that the efforts of the conference to obtain an international agreement on measures necessary to remove or decrease the perils of the sea would be crowned with success.

—Terrific gales on the Great Lakes last week drove scores of ships to disaster. A late estimate placed the loss of life, mostly of sailors, at 256, of whom 195 perished on Lake Huron, nearly fifty on Lake Superior and the remainder on Lakes Michigan and Erie. The property loss is estimated at more than $5,000,000.

To Wipe Out the Saloon

Anti-Saloon League Launches Campaign to Put Prohibition Into the Federal Constitution

THE FINAL STAGE! One caught his breath at the calm, confident tone in which General Superintendent Purley A. Baker of the National Anti-Saloon League attributed this momentous character to the plans adopted by the league's tremendous national convention at Columbus last week—plans calculated to secure an amendment to the United State constitution forever prohibiting the liquor business within this nation.

Considering how long and bitter has been the fight against the saloon and how often to all but the heroically faithful it has looked like a hopeless conflict, the hearer found it hard at first to credit the belief that the end of the war is near enough for the "final stage" to be in sight. But as the power of the convention's earnestness culminated, conviction grew that Dr. Baker had not been too sanguine. How long it may take to arrive at the day of the saloon's final overthrow neither he nor any other discreet man would venture to predict. But at the end of a series of meetings certainly surcharged with measureless potentiality, it seemed not at all rash to believe that the last crushing victory over the saloon lay ahead on a straight road from this Columbus starting point.

A Mighty Host of Mighty Men and Women

The Anti-Saloon League's biennial conventions heretofore have been attended for the most part by specialists in temperance reform work. But to the Columbus meeting, which marked the end of the second decade of the league's work, vigorous publicity and a steadily growing public interest had brought an attendance of 5,000 or 6,000, representing all parts of the nation, but especially the central stretch of territory between New York and Denver. And the stamp of character on the faces of this mass of men and women signified more than their numbers. These delegates at Columbus, eschewing sound and fury, stood up, straight, clean-muscled, cleareyed and strong, and their oath to put away the drink traffic out of the land was the convincing word of those who know they in themselves and in their God can do what they will.

Superintendent Baker said from the platform that the Anti-Saloon League had never entertained any ultimate purpose other than national prohibition. But its deliberate policy has been to approach the goal by stages. It has fought many local and preliminary battles. But it has never consented to rest in camp inactive. When, therefore, the great climax of several years' battle was reached last winter in the passage of the Webb-Kenyon interstate commerce act the immediate question was, What next? And with unanimous accord the governing board of the league determined to fight for national prohibition. So the convention of 1913 was summoned to lay out a campaign plan wherein all temperate and free-spirited citizens might unite to compel a change in the nation's fundamental law outlawing the trade in intoxicants henceforth throughout the country.

The Prohibition Question Up to Congress

The convention responded with a militant spirit that thrilled through every vital chord of loyalty and decision. When with songs and shoutings the convention adopted what ex-Governor Hanly of Indiana called the "new Declaration of Independence"—declaring for liquor's "national annihilation"—the thing seemed almost achieved already. Dr. Baker declared that hereafter every candidate for Congress will be asked whether he favors the constitutional prohibition of all intoxicants and defiantly declared that any party which does not want a fight on its hands will have to name men who can and will answer "Yes" to this question.

The superintendent further remarked that in placing the proposed constitutional amendment before Congress the league will probably ask that the ratification of it in the states shall be prescribed according to the original method—that is, by act of conventions which the people elect for this particular purpose instead of by vote of legislatures. This program will make the amendment, when sent down by Congress, virtually a referendum submitted direct to the people. Dr. Baker told the convention that he had observed to Speaker Champ Clark that Congress would find it hard to find a reason for refus-

New Feature in Christian Endeavor Program

The United Society of Christian Endeavor has decided to make a permanent feature of the "lifework covenant" which Dr. A. L. McAfee of Berkeley, California, presented to the Los Angeles convention last summer. The covenant, as Dr. McAfee formulated it and set it before the convention in the "decision hour" at a climax of those great meetings, read as follows:

"Feeling myself called by the Holy Spirit, and trusting in the Lord Jesus Christ for strength, I promise him that I will from this day forth strive to shape the plans of my life so that I may give myself wholly to the service of Christ and the church."

On the card, besides blank for name and address, was an invitation to designate to what work the signer felt at the moment called—whether the ministry, mission work at home or abroad, the secretaryship of Young Men's or Young Women's Christian Associations, social settlement service or Christian Endeavor field work. On that occasion in Los Angeles 192 young men and women moved to the platform and put their names to this pledge.

Since Los Angeles, the covenant has been presented to the Ohio state convention at Lima and there seventy-five young people signed the cards. In the further promotion of this appeal for the Christian callings it is now proposed that a "life decision hour" be observed in every Christian Endeavor convention and that all the signers be enrolled as "Christian Endeavor Lifework Recruits." Moreover, it is hoped that similar proposals will be pressed in the local societies during what is to be known as "Christian Endeavor week," the first seven days of February, 1914, which will include the thirty-third anniversary of the founding of the first society.

Home Mission Survey of North Dakota

Soon after the return to New York of the deputation of home mission secretaries who went West last fall to survey neglected fields, the interesting report on Oregon was published. Now appears the deputation's report on North Dakota.

It is rather surprising to find that North Dakota, though a rural state which outlaws the saloon and is noted for a high average of morality, has a considerably smaller percentage of church members in its population than has the United States at large. In the continental territory of the American republic, 39 per cent of the people are communicant members in one or another church—24 per cent being Protestants and 14 per cent Roman Catholics. In North Dakota the total church membership is but 34 per cent—21 per cent Protestant and 13 per cent Catholic.

Out of the 2,000 school districts in the state it appears that at least a third are totally without religious service of any sort. This deficiency is due, of course, to the sparse settlement of many districts, but in other localities so many different languages abound among the immigrants that it is practically impossible to get a sufficient support for services in any one language. In such cases the farmers often drive to adjacent districts to find worship in their own respective tongues. But many settlements—particularly of Russians and French Canadians—have been neglected altogether, even by the churches of which they are nominal adherents. Practically half of the churches of the state conduct services in German or in some Scandinavian tongue.

The strongest denomination in the state is Lutheran, which holds 39 per cent of the total church population. The Catholics stand next. The Methodists rank practically abreast of the Catholics and the Congregational and Presbyterian Churches, which stand next in order, are virtually equal in membership. Three-fourths of the congregations have regular services every week, one-half have resident pastors. How many of these churches are supported by home mission funds from outside would have seemed to be an inquiry very vital to the purpose of the survey, but the investigators have failed to estimate this. From a hundred churches which admitted receiving such aid it appeared, however, that the average home mission appropriation was $220 per year.

A few of the communities which are without churches report a well developed social life centering in granges, farmers' clubs and secret orders. More, however, lament the loneliness and isolation of the country districts. The immense size of North Dakota is frequently complained of in the reports which the survey collected. This condition separates widely the families that own the farms and the tenant families change often and are usually put out of communication with their better circumstanced neighbors.

"An Hearty Desire to Pray"

THERE IS an old prayer from the Gregorian sacramentary which runs in this way: "And grant that we to whom thou hast given an hearty desire to pray may by thy mighty aid be defended and comforted in all dangers and adversities."

That central clause sticks in one's memory. So often we question whether we need to pray or whether there can be any use in prayer. All such questions and objections drop away when we have a sufficiently hearty desire to pray. We can all find good reasons for doing what we genuinely want to do. If anyone finds himself weakening on the theory of prayer, he ought to ask very carefully whether it is not really a weakening in the desire to pray.

There are three feelings that move us to prayer. The first is a strong sense of obligation to pray. The command is as plain as any command. We are not advised nor recommended to present our petitions to God; we are explicitly told to do so. There comes the time in the lives of most men when there is that sense of obligation that tides them over the weakening of their spiritual enthusiasm. They ought to pray. They may not be clear about the results nor the theory of it, but they cannot get away from the feeling that a dependent creature owes it to God on whom he depends to present humbly his submissions and his petitions.

There is, secondly, a deep sense of the need to pray in the lives of many of us. We feel about it as has been said about the sense of God: "If there were no God, it would be necessary to invent one." If we had not the obligation to pray, we should have to pray anyway. That sense is deepest in times of great burdens or distresses, but no one who has the habit of prayer can fail to realize the deepening sense of his need for prayer. He cannot keep his heart light without it; he cannot keep his hands strong without it; he cannot keep his head clear without it. It appears in every great emergency of life; everybody prays when the ship is about to sink.

There is, however, a third feeling in many hearts, the feeling of a joyous sense of right to pray. When Dr. Charles E. Jefferson was a young man planning to go into the ministry, he went to see Phillips Brooks and asked him if as a Christian he was compelled to believe in the miracles. Brooks replied, "I should not say that you are compelled to do so; I should say that you may do so." Dr. Jefferson tells that this made a change in his whole outlook upon the miracles. It changes the outlook of many of us on this matter of prayer to feel that neither obligation nor need is the real moving force for prayer.

No matter whether we ought to pray or need to pray, this is sure: We have a right to pray. Having such a God as we have, with such love as he feels, no laws of nature and no fixed purpose could possibly take from us the right to come into close fellowship with him. We do not pray because we are told we must, or because we feel we need to pray; we are at our best when we feel "an hearty desire to pray."

Professor Knight has given us a beautiful prayer which many of us may use in our time of weakening in prayer:

"O thou who hast taught us to continue patient in well doing, and dost assure us that in due time we shall reap if we faint not, help us to welcome whatsoever thou ordainest; and, though our road wind up-hill all the way, may we persevere to the end, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen."

The prayer road of many of us winds up-hill, yet we find in ourselves a hearty desire to persevere to the end. That desire grows more and more mighty until the deepest joy of life is our laying before God the burdens that are on our hearts.

Race Respect Without Race Prejudice

In every discussion of the racial problems which affect America from so many angles, it cannot be too scrupulously remembered that race prejudice is always incompatible with genuine religion. That is to say, there can be no Christian consideration of racial problems except with all prejudices sincerely repudiated and to the best of spiritual ability eliminated. Race prejudice is in essence a fictitious and groundless pride. Neither in reason nor in revelation is there the slightest encouragement for any man to believe that God has a preference for the color of his skin or for his own particular line of descent from Adam. God sees too deep into man to mark any such superficial superiorities, even if the superiorities are real. And certainly no Christian can contend that there is any criterion of rank worth insisting upon which the Creator of man is unable to descry.

This is not saying by any means that a Christian is committed beforehand to any particular theory of social adjustment, nor debarred from seriously inquiring what allowance for racial differences among men it is for the mutual benefit of all concerned to recognize. Certainly the appreciation of varying racial characteristics and the preservation of them, as well as the encouragement of racial self-respect and racial independence, are provisions that sound social science has abundant cause to value. But the point here is that, in order to be Christian, these racial distinctions are to be maintained with honor for the best that is in all races, and not upheld as tokens of contempt on the one hand or as incitements to envy on the other. This is where the prejudice comes in, and this, too, is where prejudice will have to be cast out before any racial problems are successfully solved in the United States or elsewhere.

The Door That Hides Life Beyond

To hear Madam Schumann-Heink sing Salter's "Cry of Rachel" is to feel that one has sounded with her the last and remotest depths of pathos in a human heart. It is truly a new "De Profundis." As the singer repeats the cry, "Death, let me in," now thundering it forth with pitifully imperious impotence, and now wailing it out in long-drawn tremors palpitating with anguish, the accumulating tragedy of it all becomes almost insupportable. And yet this supremely pathetic burden of the song carries in itself its own sure note of triumph—its invincible echo from that faith which sorrows not as those sorrow who have no hope. "Rachel weeping for her children" and refusing to be comforted, is yet revealed, by the wonderful singer's dramatic power, as lifting her soul to a vision which can foresee even death swallowed up in victory. For though death will not listen, while she wails to him, Rachel knows he cannot always keep her out; the day will come when he must "let her in." And she is beating at the door not of a charnel house, dark and cold and full of corruption, but of a vast and glorious domain where her children have sooner than she attained to the fullness of life. Death is the warder of a gate which holds the greatness of all being beyond it. The conquest of the keeper will come not through locking his door so that he can never open it again, but through throwing the portal open forever, so that the eyes of the faithful, seeing through and beyond it, may note no hindrance there as they pass on their way to the Father, nor ever think it a barrier between them and those who have crossed its easy threshold before. "Death, let me in!" No, that is not despair; it is only a lonesome heart's call when allurements beyond have, for a little, broken down the patience that barely abides the remaining moments of waiting here.

By Way of Good-By to a Friend

The removal of Everett Sisson, so long publisher of The Interior and The Continent, from Chicago to Oakland, California, only confirms, so far as the operation of this paper is concerned, the unhappy necessity of working on without him which the breakdown of his health more than two years ago imposed on associates enlisted with him in the weekly preparation and circulation of The Continent. The restoration of his health to a degree which affords promise of long and comfortable years ahead of him (even though no sufficient ruggedness to risk the strains of relentless work to which he formerly subjected himself) creates the deepest thanksgiving in the hearts of all his friends. But nothing of these satisfactions quiets in the least the pain of parting from one who commanded from all his fellow workers a loyalty and affection which few men are gifted to attract and hold. The good-by of The Continent to Mr. Sisson as he goes to his new home in California is a loving acknowledgment that his fellowship has been a high inspiration to enjoy and will be priceless treasure to hold in memory. In his new home may a host of new friends learn to value him for what he is, as old friends, bound to him by many affectionate associations, have valued him for long years past.

—An Indiana pastor tells The Continent that he has found a great field of real spiritual ministry in lecturing to women's clubs on the Bible. The women in these clubs may think that their interest in the Bible is purely intellectual, but the lecturer who passes by the literary and critical incidentals to proclaim the spiritual authority of the old book is assured, out of the experience of this pastor who has tried it, that the eager grasping of hungry souls for scriptural nourishment will justify the risk of his innovation.

—A country pastor reminds The Continent that our recent editorial charging suburban Christians with forgetful ingratitude toward downtown churches where they formerly worshiped applies in principle just as strongly to all kinds of city Christians who have forgotten the needs of the old country churches where they attended in boyhood or girlhood. Most of those country churches are in just about the same plight as the downtown city churches and for the same reason—not because the people are gone but because the people surrounding them today are a new class, tenants instead of owners, and therefore unable to meet financial necessities as the former population did. The debt owed to country churches by their own children who have now moved away to the prosperous cities is morally inescapable and it ought to be paid in cash and by regular installments.

—Rev. Mr. Watts-Ditchfield, who for many years has served the church of St. James the Less in Bethnal Green, London's worst sinkhole of woe and vice, has been lecturing to divinity students at Cambridge, and the thing which he urges most is persistence in following up "hopeless cases." He says that he called the hundredth time on a man who had ninety-nine times refused to have anything to do with the church or Christ; and that hundredth call captured him. In another instance the vicar discovered that a certain man was greatly in love with a pet squirrel. So the minister hurried home and read everything the Encyclopedia Britannica says about squirrels. Next time he called he talked nothing but squirrels to the squirrel owner. The following Sabbath the man appeared at the men's service in the church..

—Since a few missionaries have ventured into Tibet, it is rather common for missionary speakers to say that the whole world is now open to the gospel. But pleasant as it is to say such a thing, it has the disadvantage of not being true, for Afghanistan is closed as tight against missionaries as ever, and in spite of the predominant British influence in Baluchistan, there is no missionary work in that territory save at the town of Quetta, where the distribution of the Scriptures is the main item of possible activity. In both Afghanistan and Baluchistan the ancient Mohammedan penalty of death for abandoning the faith of the prophet is still enforced. No care of the resident British consuls is sufficient to avert the stealthy fate that overtakes a Moslem convert to Christianity.

—Urging every member of a church to contribute to the church's support is sound emphasis on an essential Christian principle—the duty of the believer to uphold the means of propagating the gospel. All free-handed men will agree that nobody deserves reprobation more than the skinflint who can give to the church and won't. But one danger must be recognized as running along with all efforts to enforce these ideas—the danger that men and women may come to be valued in the church as contributors rather than as workers. The only safe attitude in these matters is a stout keeping foremost of Paul's standard—"the willing mind." In all churches the same apostle's rule ought to prevail always: "If the readiness is there, it is accepted according as a man hath, not according as he hath not."

—When the laymen of the United Presbyterian Church in March, 1912, canvassed all of the thousand congregations in their denomination, their effort brought out an advance of 30 per cent in benevolences. The per capita mission giving of the members of that church was thus jumped up $1.12 in one year. In 1913 the Reformed Church in the United States and the Southern Presbyterian Church tried the same plan with corresponding results. That is the reason why the united missionary campaign has been launched this year with the object of bringing about this same sort of canvass in all the Protestant churches in March, 1914.

—Rev. Jonathan Verity, a Methodist minister in Ohio over 80 years of age, has volunteered as a missionary to China. Last year he traveled around the world as a tourist and preached in several Oriental cities. What he saw of the power and progress of the gospel in those regions set him on fire with eagerness to have a stated part in the work, and he came home to offer himself for the field. His conference was so impressed with the veteran's zeal that it voted to request the Methodist Board of Foreign Missions to waive its rules and commission the old man as a missionary.

—The eucharistic congresses held by Catholics to glorify the sacrament of the mass are becoming coordinated into a sort of worldwide campagn. There is a permanent committee in existence wholly devoted to promoting them. They are planned for years ahead, and it is now announced that the congress of 1914 will convene at Lourdes, France; of 1915 at Sydney, New South Wales; of 1916 at Palmero in Sicily, and of 1917 at Lima, Peru. And each of these is expected to draw its attendance not from adjacent countries merely but from the whole circle of the continents.

DR. JOWETT'S MESSAGE

Comfort as a Talent

THE APOSTLE PAUL emphasizes the obligation incurred by all sorts of possessions. He interpreted the parable of the talents as including spiritual gifts and graces. Any endowment bestowed upon the soul conveyed a corresponding obligation. Every form of strength was imparted for some form of service. The gift of mercy imposed upon a man the duty of being merciful. The grace of forgiveness ought to be invested in the forgiveness of others. The gift of peace ought to be employed in peacemaking. The gift of light imposed the obligation of enlightenment.

And even the gift of comfort was laid upon the soul in order that the comforted soul might minister comfort to others. That is the teaching of the great apostle. Our graces are talents which are to be used in higher service. Every spiritual benefit is intended to make us spiritual benefactors. Our experiences of the grace of God are to make us missionaries of his grace. But in this article I am more concerned with the grace of comfort that was given to the apostle, and which he regarded as imposing upon him the sacred privilege and duty of ministering comfort to others.

And, first of all, how did comfort come to him? His life was crowded with experiences, it was heavy with storm, full of stress and strain, hedged about with enmities and antagonisms, often darkened with disappointment and failure, and persistently harassed by the world, the flesh and the devil. And yet he was comforted of God! How was the comfort given to him?

Well, in the first place, comfort was given in the ministry of assured companionship. He had the ceaseless comfort of a never failing Presence. We know the value of a human presence in human relationships. A calamity is greatly lightened when the loneliness is broken by the presence of a friend. A passing boat on the high seas breaks up the sense of desolation by the suggestion of human fellowship. Even a passing bird across the waters transfigures the waste. A shepherd on a moor, a companion on a lonely road, a friend in a dark and chilling hour, all minister a gracious comfort by breaking up the loneliness.

But we can realize the surpassing value of this experience only in the comforting presence of the Lord. Paul had seen it manifested in the martyrdom of Stephen, when in the hour of brutal antagonism his face was like the face of an angel. And what Paul had seen in Stephen he had experienced himself.

The Least of Common Cheer Is from the Lord

And then, in the second place, comfort was given to the apostle in the ministry of common cheer. The apostle recognized the common occasions and incidents of life which brought refreshment to his spirit as of the Lord's appointment. When there came to him the kindly influence of a friend, acting upon his life and speech like a tonic, he traced the impulse to the Lord. "The Lord comforted me by the coming of Titus." That sentence shows us how the apostle's mind interpreted his experiences. He regarded Titus as coming on the impulse of the Almighty, and, therefore, with this interpretation, Paul had a very busy, comforting Lord, inciting friends here, there and everywhere. If a letter came to him from Aquila or Priscilla or a cheery note from Philemon he interpreted it as sent by the God of all comforts. To this great apostle his common street lamps, as well as the stars, were kindled by his Lord.

And, thirdly, comfort was given to him in a wonderful ministry of unveiling. We can see the lifting of the veils in the apostle's life. The Lord lifted the veil from the promises and revealed their astounding and immediate wealth. "All the promises of God are yea and amen." The comforting ministry brought to his remembrance stores of honey in the ancient Word. And then the veil was also lifted on his past experiences. The haze that so often falls upon our yesterdays was removed and the Lord reminded him of the mercies and triumphs of past days, until his soul sang aloud in thanksgiving. So it was with Christian in "The Pilgrim's Progress." The Lord kept his yesterdays clear and clean in order that he might see the triumphs of grace. God comforts us by thus unveiling our yesterdays and from the past he brings the honey of hope.

And yet again the Lord lifted the veil on the apostle's morrow. "We know that if the earthly house of this tabernacle be dissolved we have a building of God." The apostle was feeling like a rickety tent in a tempest. He felt all failing and going to pieces. But there was given to him the steadying vision that, although the tent was trembling to disaster, he had "a building of God, eternal in the heavens." These were all ministries of comfort given to the apostle Paul—the firm, assured sense of a Presence, the inspiration of common cheer, the kindling of common lamps and fires and the lifting of the veils, dispersing the haze from the promises, the darkness from the yesterdays and the morning mist from the morrow of hopes and glory.

Blessings That the Receiver Must Reinvest

But I have said that the apostle interpreted his comfort as the equipment of a comforter. He was cheered in order that he might cheer others. He was encouraged in his afflictions in order that he might be a knight to other children of affliction whom he might meet on the difficult way. We cannot comfort like Christ, but we can be Christlike comforters. We cannot take the place of the Holy Spirit, but we can be his spiritual helpers, and as we have been comforted by his presence we may surely use our comfort to help others to his blessed feet. A soul which has received the comforts of grace can surely speak about them to the disconsolate until the desolate soul begins to long for the Lord as the mouth may water for fruit, or as a thirsty pilgrim longs for the springs.

And surely, too, as so much comfort is carried about in common cheer, we can be messengers and vehicles of consolation in the ways of common life and duty. We can go about lighting common lamps as they have been lit for us. We can send a few flowers or write a letter or do some little bit of practical kindness which will be like oil given to a smoldering lamp. And we can even be fellow ministers with the Lord of comfort in the removing of veils. Cannot we unveil a promise to eyes that are perhaps blinded with tears? Cannot we remind desponding people of their past triumphs? Cannot we tell the bereaved something about the wealth of the land beyond? Surely children of light have the privilege of lighting lamps along a dingy road. Because we have been comforted we can carry the comfort to others.

A ministry of this kind, if carried out by the disciples of the Lord, would make a church a radiant witness to the power and grace of God. The tragedy is that so many people think only of receiving, and the grace fades away even in its reception. Unshared bounty is speedily lost. God never bestows gifts for selfish use. Everything, I say, is a talent and is to be invested again for the good of others. And, therefore, even in the life of the spirit, our goodness is dependent upon its currency. It is like water; it must be kept flowing if it is to be kept sweet. Stagnant graces forfeit all their worth. Grace that is shared reveals hidden glory of which we had never dreamed.

The Harp of the Ages

BY CHARLES LEMUEL THOMPSON

America's genius—faith-lifted, far-eyed—
Over mountains and deserts, prophetic she cried:

I will build me a harp for the world's last song
To sound forth the triumph o'er passion and wrong;
To summon the nations to ultimate peace,
To give a world's sorrow its final surcease.
Over far-away seas I will summon its wires
That are tempered to fineness by liberty's fires.

One drawn from the hills of Italian vines,
And one from the crags of the Apennines;
A quivering thread from the Slavic lands,
And one from the North sea's quivering strands;
A heavy string from the heights of the Rhine,
And one where the flowers of France entwine.

From the Grampians far to the hills of Nippon
I will gather the wires—one by one.
From Appalachian heights I will string them far
To the mountains pricked by the evening star.
And then I will wait—with the patience of God—
Till the ages their glittering pathways have trod.

Then—then as the winds of the centuries play
Through the dawning sheen of earth's ultimate day—
At last shall our national anthem arise
With the notes that once broke down the Bethlehem skies—
A world's peace and glory and Heaven's amen
By the blending of chords from the lands of all men.

THE THANKSGIVING SONG

BY JOHN CLARK HILL

ONLY TRUE RELIGION sings songs of thanksgiving. Religion of some sort is everywhere, but not everywhere does it inspire the thanksgiving song. Idolatry knows no praise, atheism writes no oratorios, infidelity inspires no psalms. The scriptures are full of song and incite the devout believer in his worship to voice his praise and thanksgiving.

We find the drum, the gong, the bell, all over the world associated with religious rites; but they do not produce music—that heaven-born art, divinely inspired melody with harmonic aid. Outside the sphere of Christian influence worship music, if we may so designate it, is only rhythmic noise. It is not rendered as a sacrifice well-pleasing to their gods, but is purposely made as discordant and hideous as possible with the intention of scaring away spirits that are the ministers of evil.

RELIGION REVELS IN MUSIC

NO, there can be no true religion without music. Music is of God. Music furnishes most convincing proof of the being, the character, the wisdom, the designs of God. Hence, true religion demands, yes, fairly revels in music. Nothing can take its place. It is the stirring of the Holy Spirit in man. It is suitable for solitude, but we see its most potent effect in the great congregation. Neither heathenism nor infidelity knows of rapturous bursts of joyous song welling up from the hearts of a congregation pouring out praise and thanksgiving.

Some one has said: "Music is the elect art of religion. It speaks of God, from God and to God. . . . The other arts materialize the spiritual; music spiritualizes the material." Max Muller in the same strain says: "Is there not in music and in music alone, of all the arts, something that is not entirely of this earth? Harmony and rhythm may be under settled laws, and in that sense mathematicians may be right when they call mathematics silent music. But whence comes melody? Surely not from what we hear in the street, or in the woods, or on the seashore, not from anything that we hear with our outward ears."

GOSPEL AWAKENS SONG

THE Book of Psalms is a book without notes. There are "songs without words," but nowhere else is there music without notes. Gladstone said, "All the music of the human heart is in the Psalms," for music and God are inseparable. The prophets taught the people songs. The schools of the prophets were also schools of music. These old Hebrew songs continued to be the means of the expression of human gratitude in divine tones until a new era of music and of blessing began upon the earth when the angels sang the song of the Messiah's birth. Wherever the gospel has gone it has awakened song and the people have been lifted by song into the harmonious relation with God.

But the song is not only for the ears of man, it is also for the ears of God. He who revealed music to his children delights in their praises. We are tempted to declare that the highest function of Christian music is to voice thanksgiving in an acceptable form to Jehovah.

In recent years we have been so overwhelmed with pious ditties, and vainly repetitious refrains scarcely removed from doggerel, that we have been misled; we have almost forgotten that the greater function of sacred song is Godward, rather than manward.

SONG AND PRAYER ESSENTIAL

IN view of all this we ought to feel that the great thing on Thanksgiving Day should not be a sermon, but the songs and the prayers. The importance of the sermon really should be minimized, subordinated to the real thanksgiving on the part of the people in their offerings, praises and prayers. The sermon should be merely a suggestion, a help in the giving of thanks, a modest stimulus to thought so that the hearts of the people may be prepared for the real purpose for which they assemble. It would therefore be a blessed and helpful innovation, were the sermon put almost at the beginning of the service and then followed with a joyful service of songs and prayers.

PRESIDENT URGES PRAYER

IT is worth while noting that the President's Thanksgiving recommendation says nothing about preaching but a good deal about thanksgiving and prayer. Really about all the preaching that is needed is the Proclamation of the President. He is a preacher of no mean order himself, and as loyal Americans we have signal cause for thanksgiving to God that he has given to this nation as President a man of the noblest type. Think if you can what a blight upon this land it would be to be cursed with an ungodly man in that high office! Let us then thank God for our President.

The products of our fields and forests, our herds and flocks are great. Our marvelous mines continue to yield their seemingly unfailing riches. And this has gone on year after year; prosperity is added to prosperity by the lavish hand of our gracious God, who seemingly, at times, gives us more than we need. So continuous has been this amazing prosperity that we are, perhaps with a good deal of truth, characterized as "money mad."

FOR THESE THINGS, THANKS

WE believe in God as the giver of every good gift. We thank him for life with all its powers and possibilities. And we thank him:

For making us in his own image:

For granting us to share as children in his knowledge and love, in his work and joy.

We thank him for all the good things in this world, for food and raiment, for home and friendship, for useful tasks and pure pleasures.

The God we thank is Jehovah—He who was, is and shall be the supreme ruler of the Universe, the one in whose hands are the destinies of the nations.

Then joyously sing his praise and give thanks with the heart to him.

BACK AT THANKSGIVING HILL

BY WILLIAM CHALMERS COVERT

ORDINARILY THE CLOUDS hang high on Thanksgiving Hill in the bright days of late autumn, for the latitude insures a lingering September mildness. The gusty breezes, laden with the odor of frosted gardens and ripened corn, go traveling in great cone-shaped eddies athwart the fields; rattling maple leaves from the high drifts at the woods fence climb the dusty spirals of the tiny cyclone.

Belated harvests of pumpkins shine like gold nuggets in the parallel corn rows; the assembled fodder stacks stand everywhere like the tepees of tenting thousands of long-gone red men. Enveloping the gentle slope of the hill, the green of the winter wheat puts the verdure of spring into the brown autumn landscape. Along the roadway rumbling wagons piled high with yellow ears carry a bountiful crop to be converted into gold in the markets of the town. Sleek cattle stand at the water's edge of the pasture stream in the dull sun of the autumn noon, calm in ignorance of their early destiny at the shambles of the smoky city. Apples shine in scarlet heaps under trees now entering on well earned rest and bevies of flickers tipped with autumn colors of crimson and gold fly and feed and call to one another under the bare boughs of the orchard. Downy woodpeckers bore for larvæ all day long in the toughened bark of the roadside trees. Whirling columns of crows offend the ear by their raucous cries but please the heart by the bravado and familiarity they show in the barnyards of the Hill. On the sunny side of rambling sheds and stacks of hay the hens gather in contented companies to sing drowsily or ruffle their feathers in convenient dust piles, while on the edge of the fields bronze turkeys cautiously spy out the land, forage on scattered grain and pretend to be disturbed when the strutting gobblers with red wattles and black beards just below their collar buttons speak the language of the alarmist and gobble, shaking their heads and bluish sinewy nosepieces violently. The winter pause is coming and the fowl, as well as things of larger breed, are making ready. Over the whole land the blue haze of Indian summer has hung for its appointed time and the scenes are soon to shift.

THIS day plumes of smoke wave over the chimney tops of the comfortable farmhouses set amid a rare wealth of rich acres. The imagination, recognizing the hint, falls to picturing the savory blessings of the familar kitchen where there is always enough and to spare. Today hospitality sanctified by gratitude makes the season a festal one. The home-coming of children grown and long gone from under the old roof adds a joy to the day that is often spiritualized by tears. The old church on the hillcrest stands where for eighty years it has glowed in the landscape like some pillar of cloud before the people. The men of the Hill loved it as their own life. Their fathers set it there amid the forests yet unblazed and put about it the school, the manse, the glebe, the shelter for the horses of worshipers and on the sunny slope near at hand a place where the dead might lie. The years have seen but little change. The holy spell of the early men and women has never been broken. They being dead yet speak. Of course the cemetery has widened its bound and gray stones stand thick above the sacred dust of those who loved every inch of the soil in the warm bosom of which they were laid by loving hands. The schoolhouse has taken on airs and wears a classic cupola and there are plate-glass windows that look forth across the lawn. Modernity is in evidence; wagons filled with township children arrive every morning. But the hearts of men on the Hill are the same.

Today there is the voice of Thanksgiving in the old church, as the patriotic men of prayer gather to remember their mercies. The call to gratitude from the nation's chief executive has in it for these of the simple faith the echo of a divine call. Long lines of teams, with a half dozen automobiles, have found their accustomed places at the hitching rails or in the long, low shelter behind the church. There is a solemn gladness everywhere. The whinny of neighborly horses as they gather in the sheds breaks in on the quietude with a shock, while the honk of the auto horn is positively irreverent. The elders in black with white stiff linens assemble in the seats of honor, where their fathers before them sat. They are grave, bearded and undemonstrative, but feel the meaning of the hour down to the bottom of their hearts.

Little children abound. The babies have never been left at home in all the fourscore years of the rural church's history. The proudest moment in the career of any young mother of the Hill is the day of the first appearance at church of her newborn baby. The details of the child's first entrance are all arranged by the anxious mother in the vestibule. The long flowing clothes are adjusted to their full length and the tiny bonnet and outer garments properly set after the little one has been safely lodged in the arms of the courageous but self-conscious father. The stolid march of that newly endowed father down the aisle with his precious burden awkwardly gathered in arms accustomed to encircling sacks of grain elicits approving glances from proud relatives and some suppressed merriment from jovial couples who have but recently passed the ordeal of their baby's first Sunday at church. The cooing of the little ones has long since ceased to disturb these worshipers who know the importance of bending the twig. This may explain why the old Hill church has sent so many men into the ministry.

AN ATMOSPHERE of spirituality fills the house. The hymns are long and are sung with a feeling born of understanding. The pastoral prayer has in it a tender paternalism forgetting nothing that concerns the need of the people, while the sermon leads everyone back to the Father's graces as the source of the year's bounty. It is a good day on Thanksgiving Hill. As the large group of hearty men and women stand about the churchyard after the service is over, grasping hands and exchanging glad greetings, their blood—to a large degree from veins of common ancestors—tingles with the spirit of the occasion. Joys take on a special glow, and sorrows sweeten and soften in the tender mood of the churchyard fellowship that follows the benediction.

But the day's historic program comes to a climax in the time-honored Thanksgiving dinner of the elders. Here the social life of the parish touches the top notch of its achievement. As the years go by the tables are spread in the different homes of those who rule the church. The men who have been honored by the people and ordained by the laying on of hands sit together with their wives in an annual Thanksgiving fellowship that makes the whole year sweet.

After the service on the Hill the vehicles fill the barnyard of the host, having set the women out at the stile block before the big, roomy house. The old men long in office totter into the big sitting room to be welcomed and to be put into snug seats near the big base burner that today wears a specially rosy glow. The voices of these old men are potent in the affairs of the church, and this is their day. Other of the men, grizzled and beginning to stoop under hard work, though scarcely past middle life, leisurely put their horses to the feeding troughs, for hospitality on the Hill always includes these faithful animals. The host is a busy man putting his long-time friends at ease with good cheer and plenty of kindly instructions

FOR ALL OF LIFE

BY ETHEL M. COLSON

For all life's varied works and ways,
Sun-gilded, shadow-tender,
For quiet nights and busy days,
We thank thee, Lord, the sender;
And for the pleasant common things
That lend our weary moments wings.

We thank thee for the love that spreads
On every side around us,
For blessings showered on our heads,
And friendships that have found us;
And for the gladness we may share
To make our brother's path more fair.

We thank thee for our daily task,
For play that cheers and lightens,
For hope in which tired hearts may bask,
For faith that sorrow brightens;
For powers of body, spirit, soul:
Yea, Lord, we thank thee for life's whole!

as to where to find stable room and corn or oats. The chore done, a pleasant parley about nothing specially keeps the group chatting beside the barn door till a call to the dinner on which the morning has been spent starts the procession of goodly men toward the house. The chief solicitation as to "How are the folks?" being answered in varying fashion from "Pretty tolerable" to "Nothing to complain of, I reckon," the formalities are over and a flow of sincere and unconventional conversation has begun that ends only with the departing of the last guest.

NO ONE can describe a Thanksgiving dinner of the elders on the Hill. It is a culinary event blessed by more natural bounty of garden and orchard and barnyard, sanctified by more cordial hospitality, evincing more of the grace of sincere brotherhood than all the formal dinners that society ever knew. The flavor of godliness is there. Today "Uncle John," the patriarch of the company now seated at the loaded table, spoke a quaint prayer of invocation, concluding with the desire "that their souls might all be fed with the bread of life." The glow of warm, unaffected love was in the voice of the good woman who had met the full burden of the day with perfect composure when she said, "Now, pa, see that everybody has a plenty. Won't you all just reach and help yourself and pass?" The gentle urging of the housewife was scarcely necessary. Immediate action was the order. The particular good thing in front of each hungry eater was lifted and took its place in a circle of dishes that moved from hand to hand with high compliments as to the skillful cooking that produced it. There seemed no end of food. Its quantity and variety were amazing.

How automatically things moved, and no butler within a hundred miles! Everyone found an avalanche of delicious things coming his way before he knew it. The white meat of nut fed turkeys, with the browned dressing and the crimson sauce of cranberries; the turnips like paste of gold, steaming hot, matching in color the lump of yellow butter on the huge drift of mashed potato and the tints of the sugared sweet potatoes; the silver onions in a tide of cream; corn standing baked in sweet peppers; watermelom preserves, red and clear as sunshine; bread, white and brown, with rolls that had crowded each other from the oven pan and crusted over—surely no one found it possible to discover and catalogue all the good things so magically offered and so bravely assailed. Men who work are men who eat, and when the suet pudding and the hot mince pie with steaming coffee rounded the meal to completion, the men of Thanksgiving Hill rose well fed and glad. In words of simple strength they spoke of their joy in the occasion, made more tender each year as their pioneer leaders became fewer. Then with a courtliness accompanied by no insincere words or modes, a few words of gratitude to the smiling woman who had crowned the bounteous board with the tokens of her housewifely toil, a prayer of fervent thanks by the dominie, the great day on Thanksgiving Hill was ended.

What Interested Him

Outside it was snowing hard and the teacher considered it her duty to warn her charges, says the Toronto Globe.

"Boys and girls should be very careful to avoid colds at this time," she said solemnly. "I had a darling little brother, only 7 years old. One day he went out in the snow with his new sled and caught cold. Pneumonia set in and in three days he was dead."

A hush fell upon the schoolroom; then a youngster in the back row stood up and asked:

"Where is his sled?"

What It Meant for One Man to Be a College Trustee

Successful business men usually value too highly their reputations for sagacity and business sanity to associate their names and credit with a bankrupt concern deserted by all save a few starving employees. But this is just what Robert Alexander Kirk did when in 1898 he faced the creditors of Macalester College, St. Paul, Minnesota, and put his shoulder under a debt of $180,000. He died in October, 1913, in his seventy-sixth year, after fifteen years of service as a trustee—a service so unique that we challenge colleges to show its equal.

For he lived to see his beloved Macalester pay off this $180,000 debt, raise a fund of $467,000 in 1910 for endowment and two new buildings and come within $30,000 of completing this year an additional endowment of $250,000. He saw resources grow from nothing to nearly a million dollars and student enrollment increase from 150 to 350. He saw public opinion pass from sneers to surprise, then to enthusiastic confidence. For during all these fifteen years he never permitted a deficit to last over commencement day.

Did Mr. Kirk do all this himself?

Not at all. As the head of a great wholesale hardware house he had worked out the problem of team work. He drew into the board of trustees from time to time men of like devotion, men of executive ability, large faith and large means, until Macalester's board is a rock of Gibraltar. On it are men like R. C. Jefferson, Frederick Weyerhaeuser, T. B. Janney, A. D. Thomson, Dr. H. C. Swearingen, Dr. J. E. Bushnell, Professor Thomas Shaw and eight others like them—leaders in the Northwest in commercial, educational and professional lines. His courage and faith brought assistance from the General Educational Board and a host of men.

Nor was he simply a promoter. He gave until it hurt. Although his annual income was large, his capital was relatively small. He left an estate of $110,000, but during these fifteen years Mr. Kirk gave Macalester College over $50,000 besides countless other benefactions to other local objects. Neither was this the work of leisure hours. Mr. Kirk had no leisure hours. He was the head of an immense business house and in the forefront of every religious, philanthropic and commercial enterprise.

What was the compelling motive? Not personal ambition, nor a love of praise, nor an itching for power. Mr. Kirk shunned honors, modestly preferred others, yielded to others in matters outside his experience.

It was love for Christ, his church, his kingdom that led Robert Alexander Kirk to lay on the altar of service his time, his talents, his money. To him the Christian college was the mother of ministers, missionaries, efficient laymen, true citizens. Christian education was to him the greatest thing in the world. For this he lived and for this Macalester will cherish his memory as a priceless heritage.

Schoolmaster—Now, William, can you tell me what a vacuum is?

William—A vacuum is an empty place where the pope lives.—The Toronto Globe.

Thanksgiving Day Proclaimed by President Wilson

THE SEASON IS AT HAND in which it has been our long respected custom as a people to turn in praise and thanksgiving to Almighty God for his manifold mercies and blessings to us as a nation. The year that has just passed has been marked in a peculiar degree by manifestation of his gracious and benevolent providence.

We have not only had peace throughout our own borders and with the nations of the world, but that peace has been brightened by constantly multiplying evidences of genuine friendship, of mutual sympathy and understanding, and of the happy operation of many elevating influences both of ideals and practice.

The nation has been prosperous not only but has proved its capacity to take calm counsel amidst the rapid movement of affairs and deal with its own life in a spirit of candor, righteousness and comity. We have seen the practical completion of a great work at the Isthmus of Panama which not only exemplifies the nation's abundant resources to accomplish what it will and the distinguished skill and capacity of its public servants, but also promises the beginning of a new age, of new contacts, new neighborhoods, new sympathies, new bonds and new achievements of cooperation and peace.

"Righteousness exalteth a nation" and "peace on earth, good will toward men" furnish the only foundations upon which can be built the lasting achievements of the human spirit. The year has brought us the satisfaction of work well done and fresh visions of our duty which will make the work of the future better still.

Now, therefore, I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, do hereby designate Thursday, the 27th of November next, as a day of thanksgiving and prayer and invite the people throughout the land to cease from their wonted occupations and in their several homes and places of worship render thanks to Almighty God.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the City of Washington this 23d day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and thirteen and of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and thirty-eighth.

WOODROW WILSON.

By the President: W. J. BRYAN, Secretary of State.

Thanksgiving at Cabin o' Wildwinds

BY ADA MELVILLE SHAW

PART II.

THE HEAT WANED. Cool winds blew. Ice formed on the water in the barrel. Joe hauled great fragrant logs from the timber and kept a pile of stove size beside the door. Maggie sewed and sewed and sewed. A neighbor—motherly Mrs. Jones—came to "help out" and slept on the cot in the corner behind a gay cotton curtain. Then one night Joe galloped to town and came back beside the doctor's buggy, full trot under the bright stars. When the sun streamed into Cabin o' Wildwinds he held his firstborn in his arms and thanked God. He had sent them a beautiful blue-eyed daughter, the first native born homesteader in the township, bless her!

Those were golden days.

"What a jolly Thanksgiving we shall have, Magsie! Three of us; no debts; everything going fine. I'm sure glad we're living."

"Six weeks to Thanksgiving," said Mrs. Jones, sliding a pan of biscuits into the oven. "Wait till a full grown blizzard chases its tail around the cabin."

"I should like to see a blizzard," said Maggie, snuggling Bright Eyes in her arms. "I have read so much about them."

"Take that back, Magsie," urged Joe. "You wanted to see a sheep herder. Has she told you that experience, Mrs. Jones?"

"Yes. There's all kinds of experiences on the plains. But Pete, he's sure a caution. He used to own a thousand acres of grazing land and I don't know how much stock. That's what I'm told. He was young then. He's herded other men's sheep for thirty-five years. But he swam away his good luck in whisky. Smart man—no one has a mean word to tell of him. He'll be along again one of these days. Never forgets a good turn. Some says he's batty, but you can't make them as knows him believe that."

"I hope he comes sober next time," said Maggie

"Sober or drunk, he's always decent. He's the only man I've ever met that drink didn't make more or less of a devil."

Three weeks to Thanksgiving, and Bright Eyes was three weeks old. Neighbor Jones was at home again and the trio at Ruthven ranch took up the round of daily endeavor. There might be wars and troubles "out in the states," but few echoes thereof reached the log cabin where Bright Eyes grew and thrived. Joe dwelt again and again on the coming national holiday.

"I never rightly understood Thanksgiving," said the young father, "until this year. It was a holiday and sometimes we boys went to church, and always we stuffed. But out here, helping to settle up a state, making our bread right down on good old new dirt, just us up against the whole proposition, getting our farm by sticking to it, and the baby coming this first year and all—it seems as if Thanksgiving means—means ever so much more than it used to when we spoke pieces at school and scuffled for the wishbone."

"That's the way I feel," was Maggie's answer, as she gazed into the face of her child.

But it was the very next day that a neighbor who often brought their mail out from town stopped at the gate to hand Joe a telegram. Maggie leaned anxiously over beside him to read the single type-written line:

"Mother dangerously ill—come if you possibly can."

Joe loved that mother. The bond between them was what the God of mothers and sons meant it should be. And he was her one son and she was a widow.

After the first bewilderment and shock had somewhat passed Maggie forced herself to leadership. Of course Joe should go. There was just one own mother in all of life. And just one hour of the going away of mothers. She could stay alone and be every bit all right. Mrs. Jones would come. This neighbor would carry their letters. There would be people passing if she needed anything. Suppose it was years from now and one of them was dying and Bright Eyes refused to come to them? "And just suppose it was my mother——" sobbed the loyal comrade.

Dazed and doubtful, Joe slowly yielded and before he quite realized how it was done, he was on the wagon seat, the kindly neighbor with him to bring the wagon back, and Maggie was holding Bright Eyes up for a last kiss. "Drive fast, Mr. Peterson, and you can just make the noon train. Don't worry, dear. I know I shall be all right."

Mrs. Jones was not able to companion the young mother—she was helping out another woman in sorer straits. There was no such thing as hiring help in those days even when there were the dollars to spare. After two letters came from Joe the volunteer letter carrier was called to another part of the state. Maggie was indeed alone. But the last letter had brought good news—the one that arrived just eight days before Thanksgiving Day. The mother was better, ever so much better. He planned to be at home the day before Thanksgiving and grandma was sending her granddaughter a big bronze turkey to be thankful with! "Get someone to meet me, if you can, Magsie, with lots of wraps. It may be cold and you would not want me to freeze on the way home."

"Why, the old tenderfoot!" cried Magsie joyfully, kissing the page his hand had touched. "He is getting used to warm houses and big stoves again. Bright Eyes, we must invite two or three—half a dozen if we can—of other lonely homesteaders to divide that big bronze with us. Hey?"

The next morning the little mother was awakened by sheer cold and, looking out of the window, gasped to see the plains covered with deep snow. It had been snowing silently and heavily for almost ten hours. She knew winter would come, but this first glimpse of such a boundless winter world almost frightened her. Besides, there was only a very little wood inside the house.

For two days and nights the snow came, now faster, now more slowly, and Maggie eyed the pile beside the door with an anxious eye. "If it will only hold out till Joe comes back!" The water in the barrel was fast freezing solid, but there was plenty of snow to melt, so that was not so bad. She was ashamed of her self-pity. She knew there were people looking out over that white, still world who had less of comfort and supply to meet it than she.

During those nights when the chill fingers of the frost stole through chinks she did not know existed in the cabin walls and the wind began to send a doleful fugue down the chimney, Maggie recalled the tales she had heard her great grandmother relate of pioneer days in Canada, in the somber forests. The little granddaughter, not dreaming that she should be a pioneer some day, shivered as the aged woman told of howling wolves, screaming panthers and fearsome red men. One sentence reappeared in all those stories and it came back now to the mother lying alone in the night, with her babe upon her breast: "We were so glad and proud to have part in laying the foundations of a great country that we bore it all most thankfully."

"So you see, Bright Eyes, it is not just getting a farm for us three. It is helping settle up a state. It means schools and churches and streets and shops, and boys and girls—you are one of 'em, sweetest!—growing into strong, brave men and women—women who will vote and work and teach and write and do things. And we're helping, father's beauty! Blow, old wind!—it is almost Thanksgiving and Joe is coming home!"

The mercury in the weather-beaten thermometer at the door tried to get out of sight for very shame at what Boreas was doing; 10 below, 20, 30, 40, 42. The limited wood pile was disappearing like snow before the sun. Maggie watched the road with eyes that burned in the glare, but the world seemed to be deserted of human movement—and there was very little of that on bonny days. It seemed impossible to keep the baby warm. Food on the shelves froze solid. And the wood melted.

Bundling up in all the wraps she had, the heroic little mother took a dozen trips over "the quarter" to find every burnable scrap. One day she walked a mile to a place where she remembered there was a little pile of trimmings left at the time of fence building. With the hardest work she chopped up the crude stoneboat on which Joe hauled the water barrels back and forth. But with the great smooth logs, plenty of which lay at hand, she could not do anything. The bronchos had been turned loose to graze while Joe was gone, but her town-bred hands had never touched a horse and, had she wanted them ever so much, the half wild things would not have come to her call.

"But I am sure we shall be all right!" she whispered, resting her tired vision on the breast of the great mountains. "It's God's world—I know it!"

The blizzard came, whirling down upon the solitary cabin out of the pitiless everywhere. By every ingenious device the homesteader hoarded her fuel, counting the hours till help should come. She

THE HOME COUNCIL

The Continent has long realized, and deplored, the drift of the times away from the original spirit and significance of Thanksgiving Day. It has further realized that if this condition is to be changed, there must be, first of all, a proper observance of the day in the home. Therefore letters were asked from Home Councilors, giving practical suggestions based on actual experience for making a sane Thanksgiving. The letters printed below are the best of those which came in response to this request

Five Grains of Corn

FAR BACK in the Pilgrim period of our nation it was customary for the housemother to place five grains of corn by the side of each plate on the heavily laden Thanksgiving table. These five grains of corn were intended to remind the household of the heroic struggle waged by their forbears when their daily allowance of food was reduced to five grains of corn. It was worth this struggle to found a republic on principle, where men would be free to worship God according to the dictates of conscience.

Ever since the children came to bless our home we have placed five grains of corn at every plate on Thanksgiving Day. Briefly, in simple form, some phase of the great Pilgrim epic has been told to the children. Then every member of the household, from the toddling youngster to the smiling grandma, has given five reasons for thanksgiving, one for each grain of corn. They grow mighty precious as you begin to count. You finger them hesitatingly and thoughtfully and wish there were ten! And each one realizes the relation between "think" and "thank."

This custom of placing and counting the corn, itself the greatest crop—except children—which we produce in America, has deepened the sense of Thanksgiving in our home and helped us to give it a "sane" celebration.

Try the corn! ERNEST BOURNER ALLEN.

Verses Promote Thankfulness

FOR MANY YEARS it was our custom to select from the Bible and some other good literature verses expressive of thankfulness, both in the possession of and joy in some of the many mercies and beauties and benefits which crowd and crown our lives. Each verse or selection was written plainly on a slip of paper, marked with the name of the one for whom it was intended and numbered so as to come in regular order and carry out a continuous thought. For instance, father and mother sat at opposite ends of the table. Slips were laid on plates. Father's was number 1. Children and guests read alternately across the table according to their number. Mother's number was last. Then father asked a blessing and dinner progressed with a hallowed joyfulness almost indescribable.

Of course father and mother read for the little ones who were too small to read their own slips, and short verses were given the beginners. Sometimes the entire verse was written, but more often just that part treating of the subject. For instance, in Nehemiah 8:10 we commenced with "Go your way, eat the fat, and drink the sweet," etc.; while in chapter 12:43 the thought is at the center of the verse, "For God had made them rejoice with great joy; the women also and the children rejoiced."

There is no end to the beautiful Thanksgiving thoughts available and our program was varied every year. Deuteronomy 8:10-14 is a good beginning for a service of this kind.

Back to the Harvest Home

OUR EARLIEST colonial Thanksgiving days in America were germinated by the "harvest home" Thanksgiving days of the mother country centuries ago. There this ancient religious custom is still universally observed, and in a far more devout and beneficial manner than ours with our groaning tables, our sparsely attended church services and our football games. Its spiritual significance is entirely lost sight of by many of us.

Our English brethren have a more appropriate way of thanking God for his annual bounties. September, October and November are used in all parts of the British isles and by all denominations for Thanksgiving religious observances. Some churches select one Sabbath, some another. It is most cheering to see how the Lord of the harvest is honored by the bringing to every altar and pulpit of large quantities of fruit, vegetables and grains in the stalk. The young people devote days and evenings to festooning the church interior with garlands of flowers, grape vines, hop vines and other evidences of God's love and bountiful hand. These are devoutly and gratefully acknowledged on Sundays and then allowed to remain a week or two before all the offerings are donated to the poor. Everywhere I went in England during several fall seasons this beautiful Thanksgiving custom greeted me in both city and country.

Why should not the minds and hearts of our own children and their thoughtless parents be thus redirected to the real significance of Thanksgiving Day, as inaugurated by our Puritan fathers? HENRY M. HALL.

Lonely Are Remembered

IN OUR HOME we share on Thanksgiving Day the blessings we have with those whose day would otherwise be lonely or sad. One year while living in a village we had as our guest for the day an elderly French lady who lived alone. The turkey and sauces, the vegetables, pies and fruits were as deliciously prepared and as beautifully served as if we were entertaining a royal guest, but all in a very homy way. The dear face of our friend surely expressed her happiness.

Another year we entertained a lady and her son, both sadly in need of good cheer. As usual on this occasion the spirit of Thanksgiving prevailed. We know our guests have never forgotten the day.

At another time an elderly couple were our guests. They were so alone and they were pathetic in their happiness. My husband took the auto for this dear couple and when the evening drew near we took them out to their home. This was two years ago. The old gentleman has lately passed away.

Always those whom we ask to share our home and all it offers on this day of thanksgiving are those who would not be remembered by others and who would probably pass the day unobserved without us. At this time especially do our daughters give themselves heartily to service.

These are but a few of the many happy Thanksgiving days we have spent with others less fortunate. Some who cannot come to our home we remember in other ways. Among these for several years has been an elderly French lady. We know our courtesies have renewed courage and have given thankful hearts.

Sharing Home Cheer

RECENT THANKSGIVINGS in our home have meant much to us because we have made it a practice to invite two, three or four persons, usually school teachers or scholars in private schools, to spend the holiday with us, instead of eating their usual dinner in boarding house or restaurant.

I believe there are many families who would be doing a large favor to young persons this Thanksgiving if they would invite them into their homes and entertain them as if they were their own children, not invited guests.

It is a great thing to be saturated with the home atmosphere on Thanksgiving Day, and often so simple a thing as allowing a stranger to help in arranging the table or making a bed breaks down the "formal guest" feeling and the day is far happier because the "stranger in a far country" feels for a few hours at home again. Don't invite your guests to dinner only; have them come the afternoon before and stay till at least the morning after, and if when they go away you give them a box of goodies to take back to school with them the influence of the day may reach several others who were not fortunate enough to be invited into a home. FRANKLIN P. SHUMWAY.

Place Cards and Patriotism

AN IDEAL THANKSGIVING dinner occurs yearly in a home I know. Four generations gather around the long table, at which are all ages from 90 down to 2. At each plate is a place card containing a question which relates to some season of peril to our country, deliverance from which calls for gratitude to God. The first winter of the Puritans in Massachusetts, the witch period in Salem, Indian uprisings, the winter at Valley Forge, slavery and many more.

Beforehand each child has been given a hint to prepare on some one topic and as each question is read aloud from the card up goes an eager hand—"Oh, I know that—let me tell that one!" Even the baby—a new one each time!—has a wee verse of thanksgiving. As the dinner proceeds excitement grows apace. All realize how wonderfully our loved land has developed, and the warm feeling of gratitude to our great Leader is intense, though unforced.

Such idealities as love of country and gratitude to God cannot be batted into a child—they must be inbreathed as a daily atmosphere. A casual word picture now and then, when the little one is enjoying its food, describing the strange evolvement of bread from growing wheat, or the long, adventurous journeys the coffee and pepper have made in order to grace our table, will open up a mine of wondering reflection to the child.

Realization that everything comes to us from the Father and that all thought, desire and gratitude should flow from us to him, thus making complete the circuit of love, may be—should be—the child's very breath of life from infancy. F. E. N.

Verses Old and New

TODAY!

This little strip of light,
Twixt night and night,
Let me keep bright,
Today!

And let no fumes of yesterday
Nor shadows of tomorrow
Bedim with sorrow
Today!

I take this gift of heaven
As simply as 'tis given;
And if tomorrow shall be sad,
Or never comes at all, I've had
At least
Today!

Mothballs for Chickens?

Dorothy was visiting her grandparents in the country for the first time. Seeing a quantity of feathers scattered about the henyard, she shook her head in disapproval.

"Grandpa," she told him gravely, "you really ought to do something to keep your chickens from wearing out so."

YOUNG AMERICA

Stories the Picture Told Us

[Several weeks ago the editor asked the boys and girls who read Young America to write Thanksgiving stories suggested to them by the picture printed below. Two first prizes of $3 each were offered, one for the best story written by a girl, the other for the best boy's story. Three other prizes, of books, were also offered. The following stories were chosen as the prize winners.]

Thanksgiving at Fairdale Farm

[FIRST PRIZE]

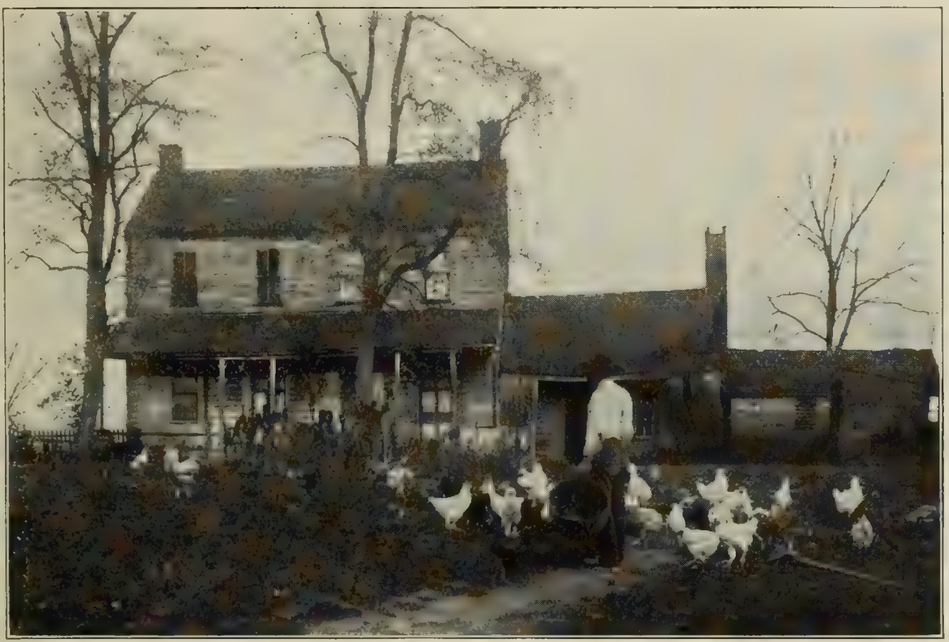
MR. SEYMOUR had just returned from his business. "I've sold the store," he announced. "Have you decided what we'll do now?" queried his wife.

"Not positively," was the reply. He took a chair, and continued, "The old farmhouse is right cozy. It looks a little shabby, but we could remodel it next spring. We might live there."

"The children would be healthier in the country," considered Mrs. Seymour.

"Yes," agreed Mr. Seymour. "If we go I'll invest in a Jersey cow and a span of horses."

The children, Stuart, Evelyn and Dorothy Elizabeth, came running in from school just then. Soon Dorothy Elizabeth was heard practicing a song which she had been asked to learn. "Over the river and through the wood," it ran.



It was almost Thanksgiving, Mrs. Seymour recollected. They decided to move to the farm and two days before Thanksgiving they did so. It was only a couple of miles, so the children walked out that afternoon, as they had already been back and forth several times on the wagons. When they reached their future home their father was feeding the pretty chickens.

That Thanksgiving Day was a happy one for the children, and father remarked that it was almost like the ones he used to spend in the same old house when he was a boy.

The sun, peeping over the New Hampshire hills, found a carpet of snow on the ground at Fairdale farm the next Thanksgiving Day. Stuart, Evelyn and Dorothy Elizabeth arose early to prepare for twelve little guests who were expected that day—the day of days. Several children from a lumber camp in Maine were coming to enjoy the blessings of a happy Thanksgiving. Their parents, rude and uneducated, scarcely knew the name Thanksgiving, and the children had, indeed, never heard of the Pilgrims and their hardships.

Fairdale farm was near the boundary line between Maine and New Hampshire, so it was only ten miles from the lumber camp. At 6 o'clock Mr. Seymour set out in the great sleigh to bring the little strangers to his home. They arrived about 11 o'clock, and spent the rest of the morning snowballing and coasting.

At the lumber camp no one had ever served such a dinner as was set before them by Mrs. Seymour.

That afternoon they popped corn, ate apples, cracked nuts and listened to stories Mr. Seymour told about the Pilgrims and the Indians. Occasionally some overgrown boy would remark, "They must 'a' had a roarin' time with them 'ar Indians," or "I wish I'd lived in 'em times, whin they carried guns roun' all the time an' could crack 'em any 'ar o' the day."

It was 5 o'clock and supper had been served to the children before Mr. Seymour took them home.

The day was long remembered by the boys and girls, and afterwards they tried to make their homes look, in at least some ways, "like it was at Fairdale farm."

Turkey, After All

[FIRST PRIZE]

HURRAH! It was a few days before Thanksgiving, and we were on the train going to the country to visit grandmother and Uncle Bob. What a dear old place it was, and how we boys did enjoy being there! How glad they were to see us! Even Don, the dog, was wild with delight and tried to give us the heartiest welcome of all.

Late on the afternoon of our arrival, when Uncle Bob went out to feed the fowls, we were disappointed to see that there were only chickens. He said that he had not raised any turkeys that year and that we would have to be content with a chicken Thanksgiving dinner. Think of that! Now chicken is good, no boy will deny that, but somehow it did not seem to us quite right to have a chicken dinner on Thanksgiving, for we had always had turkey and had got into the habit of expecting it.

Uncle Bob had an old army rifle which he had made into a shotgun. He said I might use it, but was afraid it would "kick" me if I attempted to shoot it. Of course, mother didn't know anything about this, but I made up my mind that I would use the gun if I had a chance.

Early on Thanksgiving morning, before anyone was up except the hired man, and he was down in the barn, I took the gun and went out into the woods near by, hoping to see something that I could shoot. I had been in the woods but a short time when I heard a strange noise in a tall tree, and looking up I saw a fine wild turkey in the branches. My heart beat so with joy I could scarcely take aim; then it beat so with fear when I remembered what Uncle Bob had said about the gun kicking, I could hardly hold it. Steadying myself and the gun against a near-by tree, I took careful aim and pulled the trigger. Bang! Was there ever such a noise! The next moment I was almost flat on the ground. The old gun had kicked me over and my right arm hurt awfully.

I was on my feet again almost instantly, but I could not see the turkey. I ran to the tree where I last saw it, and there in the bushes at the foot of the tree the turkey lay dead! My, was there ever a happier boy!

Wasn't I proud when I went to the house with my prize, and didn't the folks praise me! Mother forgot to scold me for taking the gun without her permission. Uncle Bob was the most surprised of all. He said that there had been no wild turkeys in that neighborhood since he was a boy.

Well, we had a great Thanksgiving dinner, after all; chicken, potatoes, apples, pumpkin pie and TURKEY! I hope that all The Continent readers will enjoy one as good this year.

What Alice Did

[PRIZE WINNER]

DAN PERKINS had been dubbed by gossip "the village loafer." He owned a farm which if properly cared for would have yielded a good annual profit. He had a large, rambling house, all the needful outbuildings and twelve acres of ground. He had a wife and two children, yet he did not care as much to stay at home as he did to stay at the "Green Inn" down in the village and gossip with his fellow men.

His wife was a gentle, meek-eyed woman with a listless step. She had brought up her two children, Alice, 12, and Jimmy, 5, as well as she could under the circumstances, and it was not a few times that she had gone to the "Green Inn" in the clouds of the morning and half dragged, half carried her husband home in a drunken stupor. She had even resorted to taking in sewing and washing to make ends meet. She was very loyal to her husband and she knew that there was no man that could work better than Dan Perkins when he had a mind to.

Her daughter Alice said to her one day, "Mamma, I wish you didn't have to work so hard. Please let me go over to Mrs. Reynolds's and mind her baby for a few days. She offered to pay me for it, and I'd love to go!"

Her mother at first refused, but after a lot of coaxing on the part of Alice she reluctantly let her go, and so Alice ran gayly up to her neighbor's house.

Baby was very troublesome that day and also for the rest of the week, but Alice kept bravely on and never lost courage. She was disappointed when, on Saturday, Mrs. Reynolds told her that she had no ready change but that if it made no difference, she would give her a couple of settings of eggs and also lend her two setting hens to hatch them.

Alice cheerily accepted, and at the end of a month she had twenty-two lively young chicks, while at the end of seven months she had eight sturdy young cockerels and eleven laying pullets. The eggs then helped her mother greatly in her efforts to make ends meet, and even her father grew interested in her chickens. He soon realized how hard she had worked with them and he took to staying home more and more. As Thanksgiving neared he secured work and gradually laid a stock of vegetables in the cellar.

The day before Thanksgiving Mr. Perkins went out to feed the chickens and as he stood looking over the healthy flock, one of which he would share in eating on the morrow, he resolved that in the future the "Green Inn" would see less of him than it had in the past.

This was the best move he had ever made, and it was all brought about by his daughter Alice and her chickens.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

November 30, 1913—Crossing the Jordan

Everyday View of the Lesson

By J. L. Scott

Lesson Text, Joshua 3:1-17; Psalm 114. Golden Text, Isaiah 41:10: Fear thou not, for I am with thee.

Palestine embraces the country lying east of the great sea, not unlike in form and extent to the state of New Hampshire. Why God should have selected it as the harvest field of his sowing is a secret known only to himself. The country was originally divided into two parts separated by the valley of the Jordan. The eastern part was largely conquered in the wars of Moses, leaving the western to be subdued by his successor.

A warrior less skilled than Joshua would have begun the invasion from the south as Israel had attempted forty years before; but Joshua made no such mistake. He made a flank movement to the westward with Jericho as the objective point. There was one barrier, however, that lay before him—the river Jordan. That name usually stands for death, but now it meant life to Israel. Joshua must cross it at the very beginning of the conquest. It separated the old from the new. The situation was similar to the one that confronted Moses on the shores of the Red sea.

The Way We Meet Obstacles Is True Test of Character

There are always obstructions in the way of progress. Sometimes we encounter them early and then again they await us further on. But come they early or late, they test character. The one who has never crossed a Jordan knows little of real life. He has watched the procession, but forms no part of it.

Joshua was now about 70 years of age. He had lived in the open all his life and was doubtless a man of great physical strength. Men lived longer in his age than they do today and one reason is self-evident—they were close friends with nature. The luxuries of life were only seen at the longest range. But a return to that mode of living would be impossible. The luxuries of one generation become the necessities of another. It is simply a part of the process of development. Joshua's army must have been like himself. Every man had been born by the wayside and was ready for the march.

The suggestion that the history of Israel is but a succession of miracles that required only a passive existence is fatal to the truth. Notwithstanding the supervision of heaven, there are a great many good men who could never have made the passage of the Jordan. Faith and reason must act in cooperation. The crossing of the Jordan, while miraculous, was in accord with the logic of experience. God had promised to be with Joshua as he had been with Moses. But the assurance was special to himself. No one else could have claimed it. We believe of certain men what we would not believe of anyone else. That Jesus should have raised the dead is in perfect accord with his nature. He was himself beyond the ordinary; therefore extraordinary things were entirely natural to him.

Accomplished by Human Effort Supplemented by Divine Strength

The passing of the Jordan becomes logical when one recalls who Joshua was and what God had determined through him. That the waters were at their flood and the current impassable by human strength adds nothing to the marvel. God had promised Joshua to be with him and it was only reasonable that he should trust that promise.

But divine help is never a substitute for human endeavor. The leader realized that and made every effort to do his part. He listened to the report of the spies as if the conquest depended entirely upon himself. And when assured that the inhabitants of the country were faint with fear he knew that the hour for action had come. The next morning all Israel was in motion. The orders were specific. The ark was to be borne in advance and the people were to follow, as their fathers had done in the desert. To lose sight of the ark was to lose themselves.

In terms of the present, one begins to lose sight of the Bible and very soon one finds himself in the water. The passage of the Jordan is not only history but prophecy as well. Sometimes the individual church is called upon to pass through trials like the harvest flood. In such times two things are essential—the presence of the ark and the constancy of the leaders. Those twelve men standing like a wall of granite were an inspiration to the people. The strength of a church lies less in its numbers than in its officers. Twelve men ready to face the roaring floods are a church in themselves.

Things happened according to Joshua's word. As the feet of the ark-bearing priests touched the water the river reversed itself and the people passed over on dry land.

Faith in Divine Promises Essential to Their Accomplishment

As to the secondary causes of this miraculous happening there has been no little speculation. The city of Adam was some seventeen miles above the supposed place of crossing. It is quite possible that the mud-soaked banks may have fallen into the channel, thus obstructing the waters from above and causing them to fail below. In that event God simply employed the forces of nature to bring about his purpose, just as he employed a "strong wind" to divide the waters of the Red sea. But no miracle depends for its force upon the method of its accomplishment. There is always an underlying purpose that gives it character and meaning. In this instance God magnified Joshua in the presence of the people. He confirmed his promise that, as he had been with Moses, so would he be with Joshua. Faith was essential to the conquest. But faith can grow only through experience and this the people realized at the fords of the Jordan.

The incident was special, and yet in many respects it touches every Christian life. God's promises are true, but only to those who act upon them. He turns back no rivers for the faint-hearted and unbelieving. The form of the promise may change, but the necessity for action in accordance with it is ever present.

The Lesson Verse by Verse

By Hermon D. Jenkins

ANALYSIS—The creator is always greater than the thing created. The natural anxieties of the servants of God are sometimes supernaturally relieved. The Bible miracles are carefully safeguarded from the charge of collusion. To achieve much we must venture much.

As Trench says, "The miracle is not a greater manifestation of the power of God than nature, but a different one. It is as great a wonder to make a man as to raise a man from the dead, to make the seed multiply itself in the furrow as to make the bread multiply itself in Christ's hands."

Nature is not omnipotent. God is. The will of man has power, up to certain limits, to overcome multitudes of natural laws in the material realm. The little child pits its infantile will against the law of gravitation and when it lifts a weight almost as great as its own the will of a child wins out as against the power of gravitation. When a ball player arrests in its swift flight the ball thrown from a fellow player, the player who arrests the flight of the ball opposes his will to the material forces operating on the ball and arrests them. If man can stop a ball without throwing the universe into confusion, God can as easily stop a sun or a river.

We do not attempt to minimize or exaggerate the miracle which accompanied the crossing of the Jordan. It had a specific object, the exhibition to the people of the continued presence (v. 7) of God. God does not employ the tricks of a conjurer to impress people. He does not employ natural means to arrest a flood and do it in a manner to make the people think it a supernatural event. We accept the miracle for what it was, a sign of the divine presence for the protection and deliverance of an imperiled host.

Verse 7—Joshua must have felt as he drew near the crossing of the River Jordan and was about to enter upon the most populous parts of Palestine—striking first its best defended city—that it was a crisis in his career. But—

> "He either fears his fate too much,
> Or his desert is small,
> Who fears to put it to the touch,
> To gain or lose it all."

Joshua was not the only servant of God who has been signally encouraged at the very moment of peril to undertake the hazard that is before him.

Verse 8—Modern thaumaturgists do everything to confuse the mind and divert the attention of the spectators when a critical test is applied. The miracles of the Bible are wrought with the most serious deliberation upon a stage open to the gaze of the world.

Verse 9—With a singular modesty Joshua refrains from repeating what Jehovah had said to him, that the miracle was to put him right before the people. The first step in the campaign, he says, shall be an augury of its final triumph.

Verse 11—Their standard was not an eagle, nor a lion, nor a bull, but an ark in which reposed the law of God, the fundamental reason of the nation's call, the indication of its purpose.

Miracle Is Safeguarded from the Charge of Collusion

Verse 12—The greatest caution is observed that no one shall be able to charge Joshua with deception or collusion. One has a right to be suspicious of the wonder worker who arranges the stage, selects the spectators and excludes all who are doubtful or skeptical or unbelieving. In this solemn act of witnessing every tribe is to be included and its members are to choose their own representatives.

Verse 13—But no wonder is vouchsafed until a reverent obedience opens the door. The Jordan was swollen at the time by the melting of the snows upon its sources in the Lebanon range (v. 15). It was not the duty of the Israelites to camp along the shores of the river until the height of the annual freshet had passed and then begin to make preparations for some easily credible intervention. Some good people who believe themselves friends of missions to the heathen do not think the church justified in sending missionaries to any country until the natives have begun some reformation on their own account. They hold it to be the duty of the church to wait until diplomacy has opened the doors and commerce has erected its warehouses and the flag is unfolded for their protection. That is not the way Joshua approached the Jordan; that is not the way in which the cross has been advanced to new conquests.

Only They Who Greatly Venture Can Greatly Achieve

Verse 14—The people were found ready to "adventure for God," as Bishop Brent of the Philippine mission puts it; to attempt great things for God because expecting great things from God, as John Wesley would say.

Verse 15—Blessed are they that have not seen, yet have believed (Jo. 20:29). Had the priests bearing the ark stopped one step short of the water, all had been lost. It is the man not too soon alarmed or wearied that wins (II. Kings 13:14-19). The priests were not required to wade in to their armpits, but they were expected to "wet their feet" with the threatening flood. When the first American missionaries landed at their first field, the Sandwich islands, chosen because they were soonest reached, they found that every idol in the islands had been burned only a few days before.

Verse 16—The way in which the waters of the Jordan were arrested has been variously explained by commentators. It is possible that a great landslide had cut off the flow of the river for a time, as the writer saw a river dammed and diverted a few summers since in the Alps. Godly men and learned men have so explained this incident. But such explanation does not seem to lie upon the surface of the narrative. Certainly the Israelites saw in their safe passage something of the divine intent worthy of commemoration. So we ought to mark for the instruction of those who are to come after us those divine interpositions by which we arrive at the promised land and the heavenly places which are ours through Christ Jesus our Lord.

This ad been brought to pass through the labors f such insignificant agents as his disciples. herefore Jesus exulted in spirt.

We speak of Jesus as "a man of sorrows," nd it is well that we should do so, for never ere there sorrows like unto his sorrows. But f we regard him merely as a man of sorrows e miss the heart and secret of his mission. He was sent to bring joy. The first word of he kingdom was joy. Angels sang together bout the manger of his birth. Shepherds and ise men were filled with gladness.

The last word of the kingdom is joy, when ll the multitudes of the heavenly hosts ascribe glory and honor and dominion and power nto our God forever. It is true that the cross ies between. But the deepest meaning of the ross is not sorrow, but joy; it is the victory f holiness over sin, of the power of the Son f God over the forces of death and hell. At he center of every pain of the Master there s a motive of joy. His sorrows would never ave been if they had not possessed the sacriicial power of an infinite love.

Indeed there never was any other life so appy as that of Jesus; for there never was nother in which there was such complete freedom. To be fully subject to the will of God s to be fully free, fully conscious of the supremacy of our wills over the things of sense, fully confident of having attained the ends of living. No one else was ever free as Jesus was. His choice was invariably right; his heart was wholly pure; his will was unalterably linked with the will of God. This harmony of spirit with the will of God gave forth a constant accompaniment of gladness to the movements of his days.

In the hour of the return of the seventy the gladness of Jesus came to clearest expression. He exulted. It was a spontaneous surging up of the soul of the Master in its infinite capacity for joy. And this great joy was an inspiration of the divine Spirit, which is not a spirit of bondage, but of freedom; not a slayer of joy, but a diffuser of light and wondrous grace. The word is a strong one. It was the same word that was used by Mary (Luke 1:47), when she sang, "My spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour." The same word was used to render Peter's utterance on the day of Pentecost, when he quoted the sixteenth psalm (Acts 2:26): "Therefore my heart was glad, and my tongue rejoiced." And it was the same word that expressed the emotion of the Philippian jailer (Acts 16:34), who "rejoiced greatly, with all his house, having believed in God." In this place Jesus "rejoiced."

He gave thanks to God for his grace in unfolding to babes, such as the disciples were, the wisdom that had been hidden from the learned and wise. The disciples evidently had this wisdom, for in their ministration to the suffering multitudes they possessed powers of healing and cleansing which the scribes and Pharisees did not possess. Nor could the scribes and Pharisees by their methods ever come to possess these powers. Their very erudition was a barrier between them and the kingdom of God.

Learning possesses danger at times. When the attention of the wise is directed to details in a corner of the field of inquiry in such a way as to close out of view the broad range of the entire field the result can only be a one-sided and ill-balanced theory, which completely fails to take account of large classes of facts. The facts of the experience of present spiritual realities need to be considered just as carefully as the facts of history. Here was the central weakness of Pharisaism. It looked ever to facts of the past and lost sight of the spiritual manifestations of the present.

There is another danger in learning, when it leaves the statement of what is and begins to speak dogmatically of what can be. This principle holds good whether the dogmatist is a Pharisee or a materialistic philosopher. What does happen in the divine arrangement is often something quite different from what the learned have decided can happen. Our senses and our reasonings can carry us but a little way in spiritual knowledge; and if these insist upon going with us as our guides, we can never arrive at the truth of Jesus.

The disciples were arriving at the truth of Jesus because they had no learned presuppositions to overcome, no definite plan of the course fixed in advance. They trustfully placed their hands in Jesus' hand and allowed him to lead the way just as a child might go with an elder brother. And Jesus led them to the Father; he showed them the Father.

All that we can know of God is in Jesus Christ. He that has seen the Son has seen the Father. For the fullness of the Godhead—all there was of God—was pleased to dwell bodily in Jesus Christ. The Father and the Son are two coextensive entities, each answering perfectly to the other. We never know all that there is in the Father; we never know all that there is in the Son. Wherever Jesus moves he bears in his humanity something that is higher than our humanity, something that defies analysis, something that suggests to our inquiring eyes the grace and glory of the Father's house. Only the Father fully knows the Son.

Only the Son fully knows the Father. We see the vanishings of God as he passes by. We see his glory through a veil. His face is hidden from our gaze—until it is revealed in the Son. Then we behold the unveiled glory of the Father. In our Saviour we look upon the unveiled compassion of the Father's heart. It is Jesus alone who has shown us how the Father loves us, and cares for us, and suffers for us, and seeks us, that he may bring us back to the light and beauty of his holy house.

Many prophets and wise men have desired to see the things which we see and have not seen them. The aristocracy of mind and learning may even be impeded by the prejudices of their theories, the restricted views of a social group, the popular estimate of their value, or their own estimate of their own value, from seeing the simple truth as it is in Jesus. This is the law of the Lord of heaven and earth (compare Rom. 1:22; I. Cor. 1:19-31; II. Cor. 4:3-4). But the unlearned, who come without any pride in what they already know, may have a more tractable heart to receive the mysteries of the kingdom of God. He who would enter the kingdom must become as a little child.

Of course the Master is dealing only in general terms, suitable to the conditions of his hearers. A man may be a very learned man and also very simple and childlike in his reception of the truth and joy of Jesus. And he may be quite unlearned and yet very prejudiced against the revelation our Lord would give. What Jesus has to say is that false knowledge will blind us to the truth and that a simple heart will enable us to understand.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S SERVICE

COMMENTS IN BRIEF BY WILLIAM T. ELLIS

November 30, 1913

"GOD AND HOME AND NATIVE LAND"

Topic—Our church at work for our country. Deuteronomy 8:1-20.

The two wings by which a nation soars are religion and patriotism. The experiment of making a country successful without religion has never succeeded. As patriotism is one of the finest qualities of the human spirit, so it needs the still finer quality of loyalty to God for its inspiration and strength.

Two women recently sought a large, historic and wealthy Presbyterian church in the center of the city of Philadelphia at which a noted missionary was to speak. They were half a block wrong in the address given them. So they inquired of several persons in the neighborohood, but none knew of the church. Two drug stores, both within a block of the church, were visited, but neither the clerks nor customers knew the church. The telephone directory did not contain the church's name. Then, recalling that the Witherspoon building was Presbyterian headquarters, the women telephoned there, only to be told that the person at the other end of the wire had never heard of the church in question. At length the persistent missionary women hunted up a Presbyterian minister whose address they knew and learned from him the exact location of this prominent church. All of which means, let us be frank to say, that this congregation has not worked hard enough for its own neighborhood to impress its existence upon the minds of the people who live within its shadow. How can it, or any other church, serve the country at large if it is not ministering to the people at its very door?

If any church is not ministering to the nation, if she is not grappling with the great problems of patriotism which are at root moral and religious, and if she is not definitely training her members in citizenship, then that church has lost her saltness; she is virtually dead.

That man's the best cosmopolite,
Who loves his native country best.
—Tennyson.

The church of today is finding her feet and her hands. I am not so sure about her voice. But this is the social service era. Work for the common welfare is made the touchstone of success for a church. Actual ministry to present needs is the new test of orthodoxy. In all her long history the church was never more expert than today in practical service.

The life is more than meat. We need to beware of the utilitarians who threaten to steal our souls in their relentless pursuit of material comforts. Nations, like men, are made by their ideals. As a country thinks in its heart, so is it. The unique and indispensable service which the church renders the nation is in keeping the torch of idealism alight. She interprets patriotism in terms of the spirit. The noblest passions are by her brought to bear upon the duties of citizenship. She fires the heart with a holy flame of loyalty to country, which is a spiritual devotion.

The highest good is imparted to a nation when it is given God.

The universal church is just as much a reality as any particular nation is.—F. D. Maurice.

The strength of empires is in religion.—Ben Jonson.

Our present problems are social and economic rather than political. The cure for them, obviously, lies in an alteration of men's minds. Only a more neighborly, brotherly spirit can create a more neighborly, brotherly state. At once we perceive that it lies with the church to bring us to this goal, for she deals with men's motives. The new mind for the new time must be the mind of Christ.

Every time the church gives the state a holy, fearless and patriotic citizen she excels the service of the makers of cannon and rifles. For the walls of our Sparta are men and women—"and every one's a brick."

What agency besides the Christian church is steadily, effectively and generally holding the nation to a consideration of the problems of immigration, of temperance, of city congestion, of probity in public men? The standards of Christianity are being inflexibly laid alongside the life of the nation; and he is a pessimist indeed who cannot see how the nation is conforming thereto.

MISSIONARY WORK

Epidemic Still Rages Among Laos

The eager desire of Rev. J. H. Freeman of Lampoon, Siam, to preach the gospel in the Laos language in "the regions beyond"—that is, in the Laos country which he explored some years ago north of the boundary between China and Siam—is now in fair way to be realized at a comparatively early date. The Board of Foreign Missions in New York City has given approval to the statesmanlike plan of Dr. Freeman and his associate, Dr. W. C. Dodd, for entrance into this Laos field in China, which remains at the moment one of the greatest unevangelized territories in the world.

Under present administrative rules the board will not authorize the establishment of a new work on Chinese soil without the indorsement of the China Council, but as soon as it obtains it—and it is taken for granted that it will be speedily forthcoming — provision will be made for occupying with a competent force of missionaries the town of Mengtsze in the province of Yunnan and work will be prosecuted from that center among the Laos-speaking population in all directions.

At the very moment when this extension is in view, however, the Laos missionaries find themselves more heavily burdened than ever in their own fields. The remarkable success of missionary medicine amid the suffering which the people have endured under the scourge of the malaria epidemic is bringing hosts of hitherto indifferent Laos to besiege the missionary compounds for more knowledge of Christ. A thousand new converts were baptized in the Laos churches last year. This year the number will undoubtedly be increased and the inquirers who should be instructed in preparation for baptism are multiplying in far greater proportions still.

Meanwhile the trial of the epidemic is by no means over. Dr. C. H. Denman, who spent twelve years ministering bodily healing to the Laos and who is now practicing medicine at 2818 Russell street, Berkeley, Cal., passes on to The Continent information which prompts an urgent appeal for still larger gifts to the special epidemic fund that has already done such vast good for these stricken people. Though the disease is classified as a malaria, it has developed many malignant characteristics totally unlike anything symptomatic of malaria in America or Europe. Its peculiar terror is the literal eating away of the vital parts which it attacks. Sometimes it simulates the effects of tuberculosis in the lungs. Other times it breaks down the liver or kidneys or even the heart. In certain cases the brain is directly attacked and violent insanity results. In the mission hospital at Chieng Mai one of the most pathetic cases treated was that of a little girl, half of whose face had been eaten away.

The graveyards of many villages have been so crowded that fresh locations for new sites have been sought for recent burials. Entire families have been wiped out, and deserted homes stand pitifully voiceless. Under native medicine, whether of herb doctors, mechanical doctors or spirit doctors, the percentage of mortality runs up to a startling figure—far more than a majority of cases. And where none but these native methods of medicine are used the epidemic is still extending and apparently even intensifying its virulence.

In contrast with this deplorable fatality under native methods, missionary medicine has had astonishing success. Even the native evangelists, equipped with scientific remedies and instructed by the missionary physicians in their use, have been able to save thousands of lives, despite their lack of professional skill. One lad had been in a comatose condition for four days when the Laos Christian preacher reached him and administered the foreign medicines. This boy was completely cured and has regained hearty vigor again. A girl of 15 was similarly restored after lying unconscious for five days.

Meanwhile the native Christians have been miraculously preserved from the scourge. It is in view of this protection of the Christians and out of gratitude for these missionary ministrations that the hosts of new converts are coming into the church. One woman who, in the throes of the fever, had been frightfully beaten at the orders of the witch doctor to drive out her evil spirit, was cured by missionary medicine and walked two miles to the nearest chaped to confess Christ before the wounds of the beating were healed on her body.

As Dr. Denman points out, these conditions make it still important that the epidemic fund to which the American churches have already contributed quite liberally should be further increased under the double incentive of saving the lives of these poor sufferers and of establishing the power of the religion of Christ in the land under circumstances peculiarly advantageous to the propagation of the gospel. Donations to this fund—or investments, as Dr. Denman prefers to say—he himself will undertake to forward to his former associates in Laos, or they may be sent to Dwight H. Day, treasurer of the board, at 156 Fifth avenue, New York City.

Six dollars per month pays the salary of one of these native Christians who can be sent around carrying both medicine and gospel and every one of them is sure to save a large number of lives every month that he works.

Immigration Tide Mounting Higher

The rush of immigrants at Ellis Island at present is greater than ever before and the proportion of immigration from Southern Europe seems to be mounting higher all the time. On a recent date there were 8,522 newly arrived travelers on the little island, in addition to all the great force of employees in the immigration station. The available dormitories were simply "crowded out" and the aliens were sleeping in seemingly impossible places. The immigration authorities attribute the amazing rush to the long disorders in the Balkans and to bad farming conditions in the country north of the Balkans. Should anything like the present rate continue for the rest of the fiscal year all immigration records at the New York port will be broken.

Ellis Island Incidents Dramatized

The Missionary Education Movement of New York has published the text of a demonstration reproducing the examination of immigrants at the Ellis Island immigrant station and at other immigrant stations in the United States, entitled "The Immigrant Gateway." It comprises the dialogue of an immigration inspector with eighteen different immigrants, full directions for presenting the demonstration and suggestions for making costumes.

Outfits of decorative and educational material on immigration, consisting of flags, charts and mounted photographs, have been prepared for rental, which may be displayed in the room where the demonstration is given. It is probable that the demonstration will be considerably used in the present home missionary campaign, the feature of which is the study of immigration. The demonstration is suitable for an entertainment or a program for a missionary meeting. The text and the outfits may be obtained from the Missionary Education Movement or through any of the home missionary boards.

Buddhist Lecturer's Duplicity

A Buddhist lecturer named Dharma Pala, from India, has been addressing Japanese congregations of his faith, and the Christian missionaries are interested to note in the published accounts of these discourses that Mr. Dharma Pala does not talk in Japan about Christianity as he did when traveling in Christian countries, where he was anxious to persuade Christians that there is no difference essentially between Christianity and Buddhism. Speaking in Chicago not long since, this wily Buddhist declared: "We want the lowly and meek and gentle teachings of Christ, not because we don't have them now, but because we need more of them." But when he arrived in Japan he had quite recovered from any disposition to say smooth things of Christianity. He began by condemning the Christian nations and asserted that "Christianity has no power whatever over the souls of people in Europe and America." Then he denounced the missionaries, saying: "They write only falsehoods; what they teach is altogether bad; they don't teach even one good thing."

To this he added a round condemnation of the Bible as a whole and capped the climax of raving and railing by assailing Christ. He said that if Christ should come to a modern city he would be put into the insane asylum because "all his deeds were like those of an insane person."

Chinese Ignore Denominational Names

Professor W. H. Gleysteen, who is just home on furlough from Peking, states that the native Christians of that city have already eliminated from their vocabulary almost entirely the denominational names which the missionaries among them still feel obliged to maintain. In Peking no Chinaman ever speaks of the Presbyterian Church or the Methodist Church. He designates these two houses of worship and distinguishes the activities of their congregations simply by the phrase, "the church at Second street" for the Presbyterians, and "the church at Filial Piety street" for the Methodists. Even the converts of the Episcopalian missions, who are taught to regard their denomination as a church in a sense which the other Protestants are not, are too little impressed with the difference to pay any attention to maintaining it. One of the adherents of the Episcopalian mission in Peking said very frankly that the people of the mission would gladly join hands with other Chinese Christians if their clergymen did not stand in the way.

Missionary Brevities

—Rev. and Mrs. James S. Cunningham, stationed at Batanga in the West Africa mission, have resigned and are returning to America.

—Professor N. C. Mukerji of the Arthur Ewing Christian College, Allahabad, India, contributed an article to the October International Journal of Ethics entitled "Martineau on the Object and Mode of Moral Judgment." Professor Mukerji is a Brahman convert.

—Burritt C. Harrington, Princeton '13, has arrived in Allahabad for work in the Junior Mission high school. The school more than upheld the excellent reputation it has had since pre-mutiny days in the annual government examinations of the past school year. Not only did it have a high precentage of passes but one of its students obtained the highest rank among all the school students from both the United and Central provinces.

—In Tengchow high school the teacher in the Bible lesson, closing the day's work after a difficult examination, talked to the girls on confession of sin. Soon after one of the girls came back to the school and said to the teacher, "I took a slip with dates on it into the examination today and was able in that way to answer the third question. I don't want credit for that question." Doubtless many an American preacher or teacher would be happy to see his religious instruction take so prompt effect.

Board Notes and Announcements

—The president of the Board of the Northwest spoke Friday morning of "the beginning of miracles," likening the emptiness of the waterpots at Cana to the failure of the law to cleanse from sin. Asked about the recent conference of the Federation of Women's Boards of Foreign Missions in the United States and Canada, in which she represented this board, Mrs. Williamson gave a brief account of it. After a letter from Mrs. Hoisington of Batanga, read by Mrs. Egan, the leader said, "If you want to get well acquainted with our missionaries in Africa read Mr. Milligan's books." The India secretary, Miss Clark, described as one of the pleasures of her late visit to Wooster a call upon Mr. and Mrs. McGaw and family in their comfortable residence during this college year at the Severance Home. Mrs. Engstrom, field secretary, told of visiting the synodical meetings of Montana, Minnesota, North Dakota, Iowa and Illinois. Miss Shasberger of Charleston, Ill., formerly secretary of the Chicago presbyterial society's young people, spoke of ways of increasing missionary knowledge in Sunday schools.

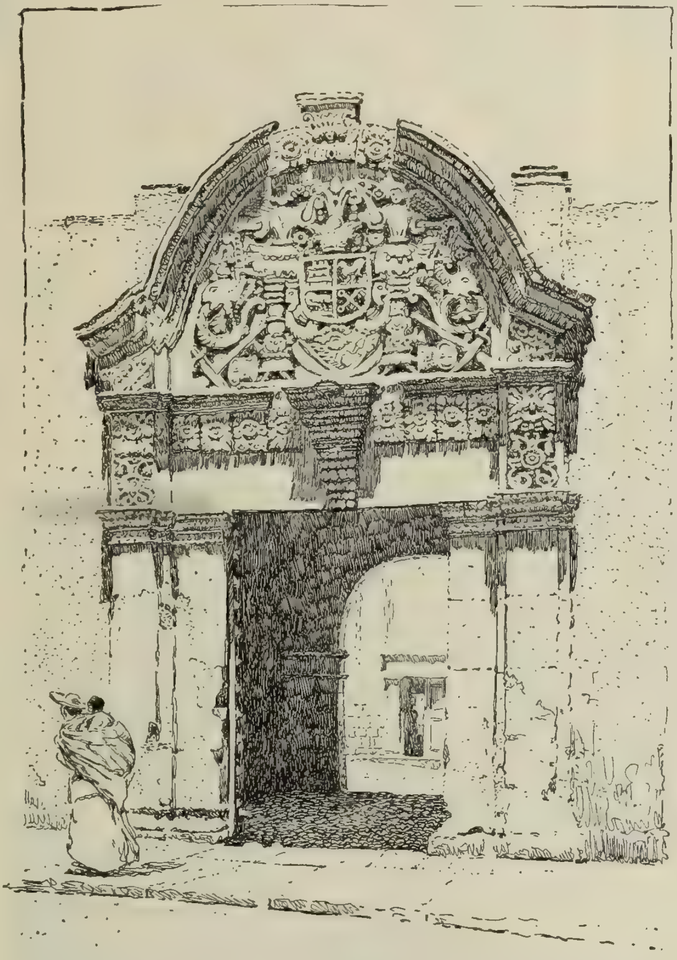
NEW BOOKS

Books of Travel and Description

Panama and Pacific Shores

THE PANAMA GATEWAY, by Joseph Bucklin Bishop, secretary of the isthmian canal commission. Here is at last a full and authoritative statement of the history and accomplishment of the Panama canal enterprise. Mr. Bishop has been for eight years secretary of the commission, having also led an important journalistic life in New York City. He has, therefore, an eye to the important thing and full access to the official records. The work traces the project from the discovery of the isthmus in 1502, tells of the opening of the first Panama railroad in 1855 (and it is gratifying to have the old legends about its terrible cost in lives exploded), follows the French effort in its disastrous failure, gives the full story of the way in which the new Panama republic came into existence, studies the period of construction, and describes the completed canal "not as a canal through the isthmus but a bridge of water over it." The statistics and popular descriptions make this section very illuminating. The facts distribute praise widely, though Colonel Goethals and President Roosevelt are most frequently mentioned. Colonel Goethals's portrait furnishes the frontispiece. There are sixty-six attractive illustrations, including a map. If one can buy only one book on the canal, this would seem to be the one. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York, $2.50 net.

PACIFIC SHORES FROM PANAMA, by Ernest Peixotto. This is the most elaborate of the season's books about the canal region. Mr. Peixotto is an artist of rare ability and has furnished the illustrations for his own text—remarkable full page photogravures of a new type, and innumerable sketches that make one wonder how two such distinct talents can exist in one human equipment. This artist-author believes that with the opening of the canal the Spanish America of the Pacific will become a favorite winter cruise. It is practically undiscovered country at present. But it's a fascinating territory; one falls very quickly under the author's spell as he describes the luxurious indolence of gliding over lazy tropical seas and the romance of the colorful Spanish cities. One chapter is devoted to Panama and is of course impressionistic. This book may be highly recommended as a gift, for it's lavishly beautiful. [Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. $2.50 net.



From "Pacific Shores from Panama' Copyright, 1913, Charles Scribner's Sons, N. Y.

THE STORY OF THE PANAMA CANAL, by Logan Marshall, is a highly technical study of the organization, construction and operation of the canal, with interesting sidelights on the attendant labor, health, political and military problems. There is nothing decorative about Mr. Marshall's book; it is intended for study, not for gift purposes, but its pictures are as interesting as any we've seen, for they contain a wealth of detailed, official information. [J. C. Winston Company, Philadelphia. $1.20 net.

The Three Americas

ACROSS UNKNOWN SOUTH AMERICA, by A. Henry Savage-Landor. If one were obliged instantly to name the year's outstanding books of travel his choice would unhesitatingly fall upon these six: Savage-Landor's "South America," "Captain Scott's Last Expedition," Stefansson's "My Life with the Eskimo," Hichens's "The Near East," Schauffler's "Romantic America" and Tyndale's "An Artist in Italy"—four are not yet quite ready, but will be reviewed in these columns at an early date. And in point of real value the first prize will be awarded by many to Savage-Landor. It's now sixteen years since this author-explorer penetrated Tibet and emerged from dangers probably unparalleled in the history of exploration. Since then he's been in the Chinese Boxer rebellion, crossed Africa and invaded the most inaccessible portions of Persia and Afghanistan; but his South American expedition is certainly as interesting as any of the others, if not more so. Mr. Savage-Landor regards it as the continent of the future. His interest was centered particularly in Brazil (which, as we're apt to forget, is larger than the whole United States, Germany, Portugal and a few other countries taken together), though he crossed the continent, traveling 13,750 miles in eighteen months. It was difficult to find European companions who could stand the journey, so the full burden fell upon the author, who says he was compelled to fill the roles of surveyor, hydrographer, cartographer, geologist, meteorologist, anthropologist, botanist, doctor, veterinary surgeon, painter, photographer, boatbuilder and guide. When he formed his party at Rio Janeiro no natives would consent to join and he was forced to engage six ex-convicts, who accepted merely because of the high pay. It was impossible to secure any aid from the Brazilian government at first, though at the end of the trip he was rewarded by it to the extent of $20,000. It's impossible to encompass the amazing interest or the geographical, economic and commercial value of this book in a review; it must suffice to say that it's a permanent contribution. And so thrillingly written! The photographs and colored plates are enormously worth examining. [Little, Brown and Company, Boston. Two volumes. $10 net.
